The French Order was founded in 1613 upon the model of the preceding by Cardinal Bérard, a native of Champagne, who wished to deepen devotion and to revive the splendour of the ecclesiastical state. He assembled a community of ecclesiastics in the suburb of St. Jacques, and formed the Order, which consisted of two sorts of persons—incorporated and associates. The former governed the houses while the latter gave themselves to the life and manners of ecclesiastics. The fathers of this French Order did not, like those of the Italian Order, distinguish themselves by their researches in ecclesiastical history, but devoted themselves to all branches of training, both secular and sacred. They belonged to the secular clergy and did not keep the canonical hours. They received the name of Fathers of the Oratory because they had no churches in which the sacraments were administered, but only chapels or oratories in which they read prayers and preached. The Order was approved by Pope Paul V. in 1613 under the title of Congregation of the Oratory of our Lord Jesus Christ in France. The founder's favourite work was the institution of seminaries for the training of priests, of which, on his death in 1629, there were six. There were altogether fifty seminaries, colleges, and houses of retreat. At the beginning of the eighteenth century several members of the society were inclined to Jansenism; but in 1746, after a hard struggle, they accepted the Bull Ugaritas. The society was broken up at the Revolution by the Civil Constitution of the Clergy; but the Oratory of the Immaculate Conception, founded in Paris in 1852, adopt the ancient rule. Among famous Oratorians we may mention Lejeune, Malebranche, Thomassin, Massillon, Jean Morin, Le Brun, and Lami.

Ordeal.—The old English word fr. Anglo-Saxon or, "out," and deal or dalle, "judgment." for the JUDICJUM DEI [q.v.]

Orders, Holy.—The estates of bishop, priests, and deacons, conferred by the imposition of hands of lawfully ordained bishops, are termed "holy orders." These orders are designated "holy" in distinction to Inferior or Minor Orders [q.v.], because of the special grace of God for the work of each, several office given by the laying on of hands of the bishop, qualified thereto by virtue Apostolical succession.

Orders, Inferior or Minor.—Offices the Church, to fill which, men are set apart by solemn commission from the bishop, which have not the same spiritual character as the offices of bishop, priest, or deacon. They originated in the need of lightening the duties which accumulated upon those high officers of the Church, and were designed to relieve them of the more secular portion of their services. Their numbers varied according to the requirements of the Church. Among them were the orders of sub-deacons (reckoned by some among the superiors), acolytes, exorcists, lectors or readers (the above are recognised in the Roman Church now), singers, fossarii, who are charged with the care of the deorum and the conduct of funerals, pareboli attendants on the sick. They were admitted to their offices without imposition of hands, and were allowed to follow secular occupations as a means of livelihood. In the Anglican Church the vicars choral and choristers, the sacrist or sexton, and the verger, answer to some of the above. The newly-revived order of lay-readers correspond to that of the lectors. Judging from the to of recent discussions, the speedy revival the subdiaconate in the Church of England no distant day may be regarded as at least probable.

Orders, Religious. [Monastics Mendicant Friars; Franciscans; Milita Orders, etc.]

Ordinary is the name given to a who exercises ordinary or immediate jurisdiction in ecclesiastical affairs. An ordinary performs all his functions in his own rig while lower orders perform them in right delegated to them from the bishop. The name is given properly only to shop who has original jurisdiction, but in wider sense it is used for all commissiones, the bishop who have judicial power. hus, in the 138th Canon of the English church it is written, "That no bishop or chanon, or their vicars or officials, or other inferior ordinaries, shall depute or have ore apparitors to serve."

Ordination. — The act of conferring holy orders. The power to ordain is, in episcopal Churches, held to be vested in the shops, as the successors of the Apostles, and the claim of others than bishops to ordain has always been repudiated by the church. In the ordination of deacons, the shop lays his hands on the person to be ade deacon; in the case of admission to the priesthood, the imposition of hands is the act of the bishop, with the priests present; while officiating bishop and bishops present are taxed in the act of consecration in the case of a bishop. It is an ancient rule that three shops at least should take part in the consecration of a bishop, but where this number is not obtained, the consecration, though regular, was held to be valid. In the Anglican Church it is required that the son to be made deacon should be twenty years of age, unless there are exceptional reasons for his ordination before that age; that every man to be admitted priest all be full four-and-twenty years old; and every man to be ordained or consecrated shall be fully thirty years of age. The times for ordination are the four ember seasons, except there be urgent occasion, and on any Sunday or Holy Day. Conforming the practice of the universal Church, the Church of England requires evidence of the soundness in the faith, of the proficiency in learning, and of the excellence of the moral character, of those who are desirous of receiving ordination.

In the Nonconformist bodies, some contend the power of ordination as belonging to the people, the exercise of which right by them constitutes a minister, and confers lidity on his public ministrations; others oppose it belongs to those who are already in the. The following is an outline of the guments on both sides.

According to the former opinion, it is said that the word ordain was originally dual to choose or appoint; so that if twenty Christians nominated a man to instruct them or the man was appointed or ordained a teacher for the time. The essence of ordination lies in the voluntary choice and call of the people, and in the voluntary acceptance that call by the person chosen and called; mutual assent and agreement are necessary to join together the pastor and people. If this is to be done among themselves: blic ordination, so called, is no other than a declaration of that. Election and ordination are spoken of as the same: the latter is expressed and explained by the former. It is said of Christ that He ordained twelve [Mark iii. 14], that is, He chose them to the office of apostleship, as He Himself explains it [John vi. 70]. Paul and Barnabas are said to ordain elders in every Church [Acts xiv. 23], or to choose them; that is, they gave orders and directions to every Church as to the choice of elders over them. The word used in Acts xiv. 23 is translated chosen in 2 Cor. viii. 19, where the Apostle speaks of a brother, who was chosen of the Churches to travel with us, and is so rendered when ascribed to God [Acts x. 41]. This choice and ordination, in primitive times, was made in two ways — by casting lots and giving votes, signified by stretching out of hands. Matthias was chosen and ordained to be an Apostle in the room of Judas by casting lots; that, being an extraordinary office, required an immediate interposition of God, a lot being neither more nor less than an appeal to His decision of an affair. But ordinary officers, such as elders and pastors of Churches, were chosen and ordained by the votes of the people, expressed by stretching out their hands, as in Acts. xiv. 23.

Some, however, on this side of the question, do not go so far as to say that the essence of ordination lies in the choice of the people, but in the solemn and public separation to office by prayer; still, they think that ordination, either by bishops, presbyters, or any superior character, cannot be necessary to make a minister or ordain a pastor in any particular Church; for they argue that Christ would never leave the subsistence of His Churches, or the efficacy of His Word and Sacraments, to depend on the uninterrupted succession of any office or officer, for then it would be impossible after the lapse of centuries for any Church to know whether it had an authentic minister. A whole nation might be corrupted, and every bishop and elder have apostatised from the faith, as it was in England before the Reformation; and to say that the right of ordaining lies in men who are already in office, would drive us to hold the untenable position of uninterrupted succession.

On the other side it is said that, though Christians have the liberty of choosing their own pastors, they have no power or right to confer the office itself. Scripture represents ordination to be the setting apart of a person to the holy ministry by the authority of Jesus Himself, acting by the medium of men in office; and this solemn investing act is necessary to his being lawfully accounted a minister of Christ. The original word [Acts vi. 3] signifies to put one in rule, or to give him authority. How did this power lodge in the people? how happens it that in all the Epistles not a single word is to be found giving them any directions about constituting ministers? On the other hand, in the Epistles to Timothy and Titus, who were persons in office, we find particular instruction given them to lay hands suddenly on no man, to examine his qualifications before they ordain him, and to take care that they commit the office only to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also [Titus i. 5 ; 2 Tim. iv. 14]. Besides, it is said, the early Christians evidently viewed this matter in the same light. There is scarcely a single ecclesiastical writer who does not expressly mention ordination as the work of the elders, and as being regarded as a distinct thing from the choice of the people, and subsequent to it.

Another question involved here is whether a man can be ordained in any other way than as the pastor of a church. In the Roman and Anglican Churches, a man receiving the imposition of hands is regarded as thereby in possession of certain powers, which he may forthwith exercise, or which may lie latent. But others hold that not to entrust with a church is not to ordain. In favour of the former view it is urged that when our Lord gave his commission [Matt. xxviii. 19], He gave no specific church, and that missionaries and itinerants cannot be ordained to particular spheres, but are ordained for the Church Universal. And by analogy we may hold that Titus and other friends of St. Paul were similarly ordained, to find their work afterwards as God might point it out to them. It should be noted that no bishop could ordain a man without title, that is, without knowing distinctly that he was to be appointed to some specific sphere of duty, either as curate of souls, or engaged in education (as fellows of a college), or as missionary.

Organ [Gr. organon].—The word in the LXX. was used for any kind of instrument, but in the Vulgate it is translated as "pipe." In St. Augustine's time it seems to have nearly approached its present meaning, as he speaks of it as an instrument in which wind was supplied by bellows. The pipes were at first generally ten, which were sounded either from a wind-magazine compressed by the arm, or by bellows whose supply was regulated by water. These were used at entertainments, and not allowed in churches, because it was thought that the soft tones spoilt the singing: but when Michael Rhangabe sent an organ to Charles the Great, it was put in Aix-la-Chapelle Cathedral, and at the end of the ninth century Pope John VIII. beggred Bishop Anno of Freising to send him an organ and some one who could play it. The keys were added in the eleventh century, and pedals in the fifteenth. The organ has never been used among the Greeks. From the time of Charlemagne organs seem to have come more and more into use in the West, though protests were made against them, and the monks were very averse to their use. At the Reformation they were discarded, being considered "the vilest remnants of Popery;" but they were reintroduced at the Council of Basle. They were so disliked by the Puritans in England that at the Restoration there were scarcely one to be found, and foreigners were brought over to play on those which remained.

Concerning the position of the organ in church, it is noticeable that in ancient time it was placed on the north side of the choir as it is generally at present. The plan of placing it over the choir screen, which now far less prevalent than it was half century ago, seems not to have become general till the Restoration. It is the custom in many churches and cathedrals in Europe for the organ to be silent throughout Passion Week, and during Wednesdays and Friday in Lent.

Oriel School.—This phrase was applicable to a religious party at Oxford, of which Archbishops Whately may be regarded as the leader. Other members of it were Davis and Copleston, the Provost of the College in fact, Principal Tulloch, in an interesting essay on this subject, Movements of Religion Thought during the Nineteenth Century, cal Copleston "the original master-mind of the movement." He was succeeded as Provost of Oriel, in 1828, by Dr. Hawkins, who survived until 1883, and maintained the liberal traditions of his predecessor. Soon after his foundation the party was joined by Arno and Hampden. The school was known as "still Noetic men," from being supposed to claim superior mental independence, and the old men of the University regarded them with deep alarm. The recall from them was one of the main causes of the Tracts for the Time started by Newman, another Fellow of Oriel who led an opposing school. [Whately; Hampden; Tracts.]

Oriflamme [Lat. auris flamme, "flame gold"].—A banner with three points or tail which had this name given it because it was made of a silken stuff, of a gold and flame colour; the tassels of it were green, and it was carried on the point of a lance. This banner belonged originally to the Abbey of St. Deni, and the bearing of this standard in war was the right of the Earls of Pontoise, or Vexin, who were the protectors of this monarch Louis le Gros was the first King of France who, in his right of Earl of Vexin, cause the oriflamme to be carried in his armies, 1124. Its use as the standard of France continued till the reign of Charles VII., when after he had ousted the English from Paris adopted the White Coronet as the chief banner of France. The original oriflamme was lost about 1382; it was kept at St. Denis in time of peace, and consecrated with much ceremony every time it was carried to battle.

Origen, surnamed Adamantius, for his unwearied assiduity in writing and teachin was born at Alexandria, A.D. 185. He was early instructed in the Holy Scriptures by his father Leonides, whom he often puzzled with perplexing questions, showing that tendency to go beyond the literal meaning, and that taste for fanciful interpretations, which afterwards strongly characterised him. These studies were followed up under Clemens Alexandrinus, and he gained, besides, a wide knowledge of many other subjects, including the opinions of the various heretical sects and philosophical schools. He had some acquaintance with mathematics and physical science, and a knowledge of Hebrew, which was unusual in his time.

When he was seventeen years old his father was martyred, in the persecution under Severus, and Origen's ardour almost led him to share his fate; indeed, his mother could only prevent him from joining his father by hiding his clothes. The death of Leonides left the family in great want, as all his property was confiscated; but they were assisted by a wealthy matron of Alexandria, who received Origen into her house. Here he pursued his studies for a short time until he was able to support himself by teaching grammar. Soon, however, he abandoned this employment, being appointed Catechist by the Bishop of Alexandria, Demetrius. In this capacity he commenced a life of great austerity. He sold his books of profane literature, and lived on the proceeds, spending his days in teaching, and the greater part of his nights in the study of the Scriptures. His zeal sometimes led him to extremes; for example, in interpreting literally Luke ix. 3 and Matt. xix. 12. His fame soon spread widely, and the number of his pupils increased so rapidly that he was obliged to commit the instruction of the newer converts to his friend Heraclas, and devote himself to the teaching of those who were more advanced. Origen did not confine himself to Alexandria. He visited Rome, and at the request of the Governor he went to Arabia to expound Christianity there. During a visit which he made to Palestine, he was allowed by Theoctistus, Bishop of Caesarea, to expound the Scriptures publicly in the church, though he was then only a layman. This irregular proceeding was objected to by Demetrius, but was defended by Theoctistus, and by Alexander, Bishop of Jerusalem. In the end Origen was recalled to Alexandria. At one time he was sent for by Mammea, the mother of Alexander Severus, who was then at Antioch with her nephew, the Emperor Helioshabalus, to instruct her in the truths of Christianity; and at another he travelled to Greece to confute certain heresies which had arisen there.

In 228, Origen was ordained priest at Caesarea by the Bishop Theoctistus. This ordination led to a serious quarrel between Origen and Demetrius. The latter, offended at this interference within his province, and envious, perhaps, of his subordinate's fame, persuaded a Council of African bishops to degrade him from the priesthood, banish him from Alexandria, and excommunicate him, on the ground that some of his doctrines were unorthodox.

Henceforward, Origen resided at Caesarea, where he carried on his work of teaching and writing. That the feeling against him was not universal is shown by the fact that he was summoned to attend a Council of Arabian bishops, A.D. 238, at which he confuted the heresy of Beryllus, one of these bishops, respecting the Incarnation, and induced its author to return to the Catholic faith.

In the Decian persecution [A.D. 250] Origen suffered severely. He was imprisoned and tortured, but the martyr's crown which he so eagerly desired was denied him. He died in the reign of Gallus, A.D. 254, aged sixty-nine.

Origen's industry was indefatigable. He is said to have written as many as six thousand volumes; but, if this be true, letters and short treatises, are probably reckoned as volumes. His great work, which occupied twenty-eight years, was his Hexapla, an arrangement in parallel columns of six different versions of the Old Testament. These were:—[1] the Greek version, made by Aquila, in the reign of Hadrian; [2] that of Theodotion, published in the reign of Commodus; [3] that of Symmachus, published in 202; [4] the Septuagint [L.X.X.] version; and [5 and 6] two anonymous Greek versions. To these he added the Hebrew text in Hebrew and Greek characters. The first four of these versions formed the Tetrapla. These are now, unfortunately, lost. Other writings are:—Commentaries on the greater part of the Bible; Stromata, in which the opinions of the ancient philosophers are compared with Christianity; a work against Celsus consisting of eight books; a treatise to Africanus on the History of Susannah, defending that book; and an Exhortation to Martyrdom, written to his friend Ambrose during the persecution of Maximin, in which the possession of property, wife, and children, is held up as an encouragement, rather than a deterrent, to the martyr, making the merit so much the greater. Origen's character has been the subject of much dispute. The praise which he has received from some is only equalled by the blame which he has received from others. It is only fair to say that his Treatise of Principis, from which the charges against him are chiefly drawn, is only known to us through the translation of Rufinus, and the original work has been so much altered by the translator and others, as Rufinus himself confesses, that there is considerable difficulty in arriving at the author's real opinions.

Original Sin.—The Ninth Article of the Church of England declares against the Pelagians that original sin is not a mere following of Adam by a free agent, but is "the fault and corruption of the nature of every man that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam; whereby man is very far gone from original rightousness, and is of his own nature inclined to evil." This passage assumes that man was created good and without actual sin, and that this original rightousness was lost by the Fall. But the position taken by modern scientific rationalism comes into collision with this view, for it assumes that man has slowly emerged out of a low physical and moral condition into civilisation, and that the traditions of a golden age are "a poet's dream, a vaunt of empty song."

This much may at once be conceded, that except in the Garden of Eden the Bible gives us no reason to suppose that the earlier inhabitants of the world were more moral or more religious than their successors, and that scientific investigation gives no trace of any but savage peoples. Yet the judgments of God as declared in Scripture are declared on the face of Nature, the soul that sins dies. Races, like individuals, become deteriorated. And thus we are brought to the conclusion that the sins of the fathers really are visited upon the children. But, unlike Nature, the religion of Christ offers hope, because it reveals that the suffering caused by sin is a discipline, that the furnace of affliction separates the dross from the gold, and that the Saviour can put away sin, and will do so in the brighter land whither we are faring. The teaching, not of St. Paul only, but of Christ, distinctly spoke of a new birth in Christ, which shall take away the death which is the heritage of man in his natural state [John iii. 5-8, 36; Rom. vi.]. The latter chapter is throughout the assertion that eternal life is a special gift of God, conferred on those meet to receive it. And this eternal life is the converse of the evil nature which produces what St. Paul calls the works of the flesh. Now, such works—injustice, oppression, lust, sensuality, cruelty—are certainly to be traced back till we find them originating in the promptings of that nature which we have in common with the animal kingdom. To gratify the various desires of the body is the law of the animal, and with this law the spiritual life comes into antagonism. Now the history of Adam and Eve may be poetic in form, but it represents a truth which Nature recognises, namely, that there was a conflict between the lower and the higher nature, in which the higher was defeated. Adam put away from him the supernatural grace which might have saved him, and it is thus with all his posterity. It has been asserted indeed that any interpretation of the Fall as an allegory throws doubt on the descent of mankind from a single pair, and that this is a direct contradiction of 1 Cor. xv. 22. To this it has been, replied that inasmuch as the relationship to Christ is a spiritual one, and we are not Christ's sons by natural descent, there is no proof that our relationship to Adam may not have been regarded by the Apostle as spiritual too.

The doctrine of Original Sin explains the Incarnation of the Lord Jesus. There was a gradual evolution of the spiritual nature from its first beginning, far back in the history of the world. It struggled for existence against foes fierce, mighty, and manifold, yet it was marvellously preserved. Evil seemed strongest yet the good lived and grew. And at length in the fulness of time, came the Perfect Man, the Example, by following Whom, and in union with Whom, good is attained and evil cast out.

Origin of Evil. [Six.]

Ormuzd.—The highest of the Persian gods. His worshippers held that he contains the principles both of good and evil, but the doctrine was afterwards degraded. He was looked upon as the representative of evil, while Ahriman, the "black god," was chosen as the evil god. [Parseeism.]

Ornaments Rubric.—The name given to the second rubric preceding the order for Morning and Evening Prayer, which ran thus:—"And here is to be noted that such ornaments of the Church and of the minister thereof at all times of their ministration shall be retained and be in use as were in this Church of England, by the authority of Parliament in the second year of the reign of King Edward the Sixth."

This rubric has lately given rise to a great deal of controversy with regard to its points, the ornaments of the Church and the vestments of the priest, but particularly the latter, which we will consider first.

[1] In 1549 the rubric referred to, which was placed at the beginning of the Communion Service, stated that the priest shall wear "white albe plain, with a vestment or cope and the assisting priests or deacons "all with tunicles." At the end of the preface "ceremonies" it was ordered that "in singing of Mattins and Evensong, Baptist and Burying, the minister in parish churches and chapels annexed to the same, shall use surplice," and that graduates shall, in cathedrals, churches and colleges, use their hoods. "At whosoeuer the minister shall celebrate the Holy Communion, or execute any other public administration, he shall have upon him, beside his rochet, a surplice or albe, and a cope vestment." In 1552 it was ordered that the minister at the time of the Communion, and at all other times in his administration, shall use neither albe, vestment, nor cope; but be it archbishop or bishop he shall have and wear rochet; and being a priest or deacon shall have and wear a surplice only." (Queen Elizabeth's accession to the throne) The rubric ordered that the ornaments should Orthodoxy [Gr. orthos, "right," and doxa, "opinion"]—Inasmuch as no one can arrogate to himself the claim of holding correct opinions on all subjects, it might seem difficult to determine what constitutes orthodoxy. It may be said that those who hold the doctrines of Scripture are orthodox; but as disputes exist as to the interpretation of Scripture this test is hardly sufficient. The Roman Catholic Church holds it heterodox to deny Transubstantiation. Protestants generally would agree to apply it to those who hold the doctrine of the Trinity and the three Creeds.

O Sapientia.—The opening words of the first of the seven antiphons formerly sung during the last week in Advent, except on St. Thomas's Day and Christmas Eve. They were appointed in the English Liturgy to be sung before the Magnificat, but were discontinued at the Reformation. The following is a translation:

"Dec. 16. O Sapientia. O Wisdom, which comest out of the mouth of the Most High, reaching from one end to the other, mightily and sweetly ordering all things; come and teach us the way of understanding."

"Dec. 17. O Adonai. O Lord and Ruler of the house of Israel, who appearedst to Moses in a flame of fire in the bush, and gavest him the law in Sinai; come and deliver us with an outstretched arm."

"Dec. 18. O Iudex Jesu. O Root of Jesse, which standest for an ensign of the people, at whom kings shall shut their mouths, to whom the Gentiles shall seek; come and deliver us now, tarry not."

"Dec. 19. O Clavis David. O Key of David, and Sceptre of the house of Israel, Thou that openest, and no man shuttest; and shuttest, and no man openeth; come and bring the prisoner out of the prison-house, and him that sitteth in darkness and in the shadow of death."

"Dec. 20. O Oriens. O Day-spring, brightness of the Everlasting Light, and Sun of Righteousness; come and enlighten them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death."

"Dec. 22. O Rex Gentium. O King and Desire of all Nations, Thou Cornerstone who hast made both one; come and save man whom Thou forneedst from the clay."

"Dec. 23. O Emmanuel. O Emmanuel, our King and Lawgiver, Hope of the Gentiles, and their Saviour; come and save us, O Lord our God."

Osculatory or Osculatorium.—A carving or painting on wood or metal, with a representation of our Saviour, the Virgin, or one of the saints, used in the ancient Church at the celebration of Mass. It was kissed first by the priest and then by the people, to whom he handed it for the purpose. It was probably a remnant of the old custom among Christians in the early Church of interchanging the kiss of peace at the agape.

Osiander, Andreas. — A German theologian [b. 1498, d. 1552] who embraced the Reformation doctrines, and became a theological teacher at Königsberg. But his doctrine was largely mixed with mysticism; he asserted the doctrine of Justification by Faith, but explained it to mean the infusion into the soul of the Divine nature of Christ. Christ, he said, could not in His human nature only obtain justification for sinners; nor can man be justified by embracing and applying to himself, through faith, the righteousness and obedience of the Man Christ. It is through the essential and eternal righteousness of Christ, the Son of God, which is united to the human nature through the Incarnation, that mankind obtains complete justification. If man had never fallen, the Incarnation would still have taken place to complete the Divine image in human nature. His passionate inculcation of his opinions led to a very sharp controversy, in which Melanchthon took part against Osiander; but the death of the latter ended it. His son Lukas was Court Preacher at Stuttgart, and author of a paraphrase on the Bible and other theological works.

Osmund, St., Bishop of Salisbury from 1078-1099. He completed the cathedral of Old Sarum. He was of Norman origin, and is said to have been related to the Conqueror, in whose train he came to England and was made Earl of Dorset. He compiled the Consuetudinaria, or Liber Ordinalis, "for the use of Sarum," which is still preserved in Salisbury Cathedral, and remained in use till the Reformation. Many miracles were said to be wrought at his tomb, and at length, in 1456, he was canonised by Calixtus III.

Osterwald, Jean Frédéric [b. 1663, d. 1747], was a pastor in Neuchâtel who wrote many treatises with the object of giving religious life a more practical character; as—A Treatise concerning the Causes of the Present Corruption of Christians, Grounds and Principles of the Christian Religion, Lectures on the Exercise of the Sacred Ministry, etc., all of which have been translated into English and other languages.

Ostarii.—One of the minor orders of clergy, their duties resembling those of the vergers of modern times. Their duty was to stand at the door and watch that no heathen came in to disturb the service, and to maintain order in the church. The office is mentioned by Cornelius in his letter to Fabius in the third century. There is still an ostiarii in the Roman Church.

Oswald, Sr., Bishop of Worcester and Archbishop of York. He was descended from an illustrious Danish family, who confided his education to his uncle Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury. By him he was made, first, Canon and then Dean of Winchester; but, finding it impossible to carry out the reforms which were needed amongst his clergy, he gave up his preferment and went to France, where he remained some time in the Benedictine monastery of Fleury, on the Loire. In 961 he returned to England, and on the recommendation of St. Dunstan, who had succeeded Odo, Edgar made him Bishop of Worcester in the room of Dunstan. Oswald is memorial for his reformation of the clergy, and for aiding Dunstan to expel the secular canons, and replace them with monks in several dioceses. He built a monastery at Westbury, to which he used himself to retire when able. A monastery was founded by Ælwin, a relation of King Edgar, at Ramsey, in the fers of Huntingdonshire, and in 972, when it was fit for the reception of monks, twelve were removed thither from Westbury. In 972, on the death of Osketil, Archbishop of York, Oswald was appointed his successor, and at the same time he retained the See of Worcester. He got rid of the secular canons by building a new church in honour of the Virgin, which he placed in the hands of monks, and attended mass himself there, till gradually the other church was deserted, and the last of the ancient clergy took the Benedictine habit and became prior. He is said to have introduced monks into six other churches of his diocese, against the will of the people; but however this may have been, it is certain that reform in the churches was greatly needed. St. Oswald died at Worcester in 999 and was buried in his cathedral.

Oswald, Sr., King of Northumberland was the second son of Ethelfrith, and on his father being killed by Raedwald, King of the East Angles in 617, he was obliged to fly for safety with his brothers into Ireland. He was converted to Christianity and baptised. His uncle Edwin had usurped the throne, but in 633 he was slain in a battle with Penda, King of the Mercians, and the Eanfrith, Oswald's elder brother, succeeded him; but was slain the next year by the treachery of Ceawlin, King of the ancient Britons. Oswald then marched against Ceawlin and defeated him, and became King of Northumberland. He at once sent to Irelanc for missionaries, and procured some monks from the island of St. Columba; Aidan, one of that number, was made Bishop of York in the room of Paulinus, who had retired. King Edwin's death, and the See was removed from York to Lindisfarne. Oswald built number of churches and founded several monasteries, and also made his own palace the resort of the poor and afflicted. The Venerable Bede relates much about his charity. Penda meantime strove to bring back idolatry, and appeared at the head of a formidable army in the plain of Maserfield, in Shropshire, where Oswald was killed, on August 5th, 642. The town near the battle-field was called Oswestry in memory of him. Many miracles were said to be wrought at the place of his death, and his memory as a saint was kept on August 5th.

Otho, St., Bishop of Bamberg, in Franconia, called the Apostle of Pomerania, was born in Suabia in 1069. He laboured for some time as a teacher in Poland, until Henry V. made him Chaplain to his sister Judith, whom he had married to Boleslaus, Duke of Poland. After the death of the Princess, Otho returned to Germany, where the Emperor made him Chancellor and Minister of State, and in 1102 appointed him to the See of Bamberg. In 1124 Boleslaus persuaded him to go to Pomerania as a missionary, and having obtained Pope Calixtus II.’s permission, he set out and converted many of the people. Having founded many churches, he made his chaplain Adelbert, Bishop of Julin, and returned to Bamberg. In 1127, hearing that Stettin and Julin had renounced their Christianity, he went back to Pomerania, till he was recalled by the Emperor Lothaire to assist at the Council of Ments in 1131. He died on June 30th, 1139, and was canonised by Clement III. in 1189.

Owen, Sr., founded the Abbey of Rebai, and became, in 640, Archbishop of Rouen. He wrote a work entitled Vita Eligii. [AUDOUNUS].

Overall, John, English divine, was born in 1559, and studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became Fellow. He was made Master of Catharine Hall, and Regius professor of Divinity. In 1602 he became vicar of St. Paul’s, was appointed Bishop of Exeter, and Coventry in 1614, and was transferred to Norwich in 1618, where he died the next year.

Bishop Overall is noted for his Convocation oik, composed when, as Dean of St. Paul’s, he sat as Prolocutor of the Lower House of Convocation. It is not known how much is his own work. It contests Papal Supremacy, and strongly asserts the Royal Supremacy over the Church and prerogative in the State. This book received the unanimous assent of the Lower House, but was never passed, on count of the jealousy of King James.

Overberg, Bernard, a great German editorialist, was born at Höckel in Osnabrück 1731, educated at Rhein-on-the-Ems, and en settled at Münster, where he was ordained priest and became Teacher and, in 1809, Director of the Episcopal Seminary. He exercised his duties with the most remarkable success and benefit to his flock, especially excelling in his good influence as a trainer of teachers. Among his books are Christkatholisches Handbuch, Katechismus der Christkatholischen Lehre, Haussegen, etc.

Owen, Dr. John [b. 1616, d. 1683], Puritan divine, honoured both for his personal piety and his high literary attainments. His father was unable to supply him with the means for his maintenance at the University, but a rich uncle did so, and at the early age of twelve John Owen was admitted to Queen’s College, Oxford, and at nineteen was Master of Arts. Two years later he was forced to leave his college for resisting the discipline of Archbishop Laud. He was at this time exercised much in his mind by doubts about his spiritual life, and this perplexity continued for nearly five years, causing a deep melancholy. Through hearing accidentally a very simple yet powerful sermon, preached by a stranger (whose name he never found out) on the text, “Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith?” he found such peace that he had from that time a serenity which never forsook him throughout his life. He became, first, chaplain to a private gentleman; then was offered the living of Fordham, in Essex, which he occupied on the principles of Independency; but after two years the people of Coggleshall, five miles from Fordham, besought him to go to them, which he did. His fame soon spread, and he was ordered to preach before the Parliament on April 29th, 1646. His sermon was a powerful appeal for liberty of conscience. Out of gratitude to the Earl of Warwick, who had given him the living of Coggleshall, he dedicated his book, Death of Death, in the Death of Christ, to him in 1643; and it was about this time that he attracted the notice of Cromwell, who heard him preach, and desired his friendship. General Fairfax was besieging Colchester, and he, too, was struck by his eloquent preaching. Cromwell, later on, insisted upon his accompanying him to Ireland, and afterwards to Scotland, where he also remained about six months, then returning to Coggleshall; but in a very short time he was appointed by the House of Commons to the deanery of Christ Church, Oxford, and the following year [1652] he was chosen Vice-Chancellor of that University, which office he held for five years. When in this high position he still retained that moderation and gentle firmness which had so endeared him to his congregation and friends. He showed no favouritism, but was tolerant, hospitable, and generous. He preached every Sunday at St. Mary’s, and often at Stadham and other neighbouring places. Probably Oxford never stood higher for learning and religion than under his rule. The book he wrote about this time, Commonion with God, corresponded with his daily life. At the Restoration he was deprived of the deanery, and from that time lived privately in London, publishing many books, amongst which was an Exposition of the 130th Psalm, and An Exposition of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which last was most valuable in refuting the errors of the Socinians. In 1678 he published a very powerful work upon The Holy Spirit, which shows his earnest endeavour to answer and refute all erroneous doctrines. His piety and learning won the respect of all, and even the King sent for him and assured him of his favour and respect. He died peacefully at his house at Ealing, having survived all his children.

Owen, Robert, Socialist writer [b. at Newtown, Montgomeryshire, Wales, 1771; d. there, 1858], was the son of poor parents, and by perseverance obtained a post in a cotton manufactory at Manchester, and afterwards at Lanark, where he met with much success. Through his benevolent schemes he largely improved the social condition of the working classes at Lanark, and published his views in 1813 in A New View of Society; or Essays on the Formation of Human Character, in which he advocated a modified Communism. With the same idea he started in 1823 for America, to found a colony at New Harmony, Indiana; but his plans failed, and he came back to England. Here he encountered fresh disappointments in the failure of two co-operative societies which he had set on foot; and another attempt in Mexico met with the like result in 1828. His Communist ideas, which he continued to advocate, had some part in stirring up the Chartists to rebellion. Owen was a freethinker, and while in America he held a discussion with Dr. Alexander Campbell on the evidences of Christianity. In later years he devoted himself to the study of Spiritualism, under the influence of his son, Robert Dale Owen. He wrote some works on Socialism, and The Revolution in the Mind and Practice of the Human Race.

Owen, Robert Dale. [Spiritualism.]

Oxford, Bishopric of.—Founded by Henry VIII. in 1546, who endowed it out of the lands belonging to the dissolved monasteries of Abingdon and Oseney. It was dismembered from the diocese of Lincoln, and had at first the abbey church of Oseney, about half a mile from Oxford, for its cathedral, until Christ church was converted into one. This was the original church of St. Frideswide's Priory. Her history is involved in legend, but her story is told by Philip, the third Prior, by William of Malmesbury, and John of Tynemouth, and is found in Leland's Collectanea. About 727 an alderman, named Didan, is said to have ruled over the Mercian city of Oxford; his wife's name was Saffrida, and they had a daughter, Frideswide who embraced the monastic life, with twelve other maidens; her father, on her mother's death, built a conventual church in honour of St. Mary and All Saints, and made his daughter prioress thereof. St. Frideswide's death took place 735-40, or later. He priory became a house of secular canons, and her remains were laid beneath the already existing tower until their first translation under Prior Philip [Feb. 12th, 1180], by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the north choir aisle. Many casualties passed over the site of St. Frideswide's ancient church before he last translation. It was wholly or part burnt in 1002, when the Danes took refuge in it from the massacre of St. Brice's Day and then rebuilt and made a dependency of the Monastery of Abingdon. A Norman church must then have taken the place of the Saxon one, and probably the door of the chapter-house may have belonged to this. About 1111 the priory was granted to Guimond, who re-established the foundation as a convent of regular canons of his own Augustinian Order, in which state it continued till Wolsey's reconstruction. Guimond died in 1141, and his successor, Robert of Crielade, began the present structure of the church about the middle of the twelfth century, and in 1180 the buildings were far enough advanced for the translation of St. Frideswide from her sepulchre to her shrine. Wolsey chose this place as the site of the new college he designed to found, and he already done much of the building, when a works were stopped by his fall in 1522. In 1532 Henry refounded the college, which he gave his own name; but in 1535 he suppressed it once more, and reconstituted the whole foundation. He then removed the new See of Oxford (erected at Oseney in 1541 to St. Frideswide's, and this last foundation was styled the Cathedral Church of Christ Oxford, and comprises a dean and canon with other capitular officers, as well as a large body of students proper to a college. The See was endowed with the revenues of the lands purchased by Wolsey for his college. The bounds of the diocese extend over the whole county of Oxford, Buckinghamshire and Berkshire, with parts of adjacent counties, and it contains 648 parishes. The value of the Bishopric is £5,000 a year.

The University of Oxford.—Though this University cannot claim the honor of having been founded by King Alfred, yet it is certain that from very early times it was the common resort of students, who lived in citizens' houses, having only meeting houses where they heard lectures from learned men; and as late as 1512 regulations were made for the governance of such students. As their number increased, the number of halls multiplied, and at one time there were more than a hundred. Now only six of them exist, which differ from the others only in that they are unincorporated, and have little or no endowments. The collegiate system took its rise at Oxford in the middle of the twelfth century, about the same time that it originated at Cambridge. In 1229 there was a great immigration from Paris into Oxford, and the latter was remodelled on the model of the former, soon to rank above it in intellectual importance. It was at this period, when Oxford was beginning to lose its importance as a national town only second to London—a gathering place of councils and resort of kings—that it began to be the centre of thought for the whole of England, and also the centre of teaching. The earliest charter recognising the University as a single organisation dates from Henry III., but the actual statutes date from 1623. Residence in private lodgings fell into disuse, and by the time of Queen Elizabeth it was compulsory that every student should reside in some college, or hall, at least during the first twelve months. Since 1668 students have been allowed to become members of the University without being members of any college or hall.

Oxford University has many times been the centre of religious changes in England. It was in Oxford that the Wycliflfe movement arose. Here the martyrs under Mary were burnt. Methodism arose in Oxford, and in the present century the Tractarian movement centred from this town. There are at present twenty-one colleges in the University and six halls.

The Halls

New Inn Hall was built under the name of Tribbik's Inns by William of Wykeham at the end of the fourteenth century, and gained the name of New Inn in 1460. The present building was restored by Dr. Cramer.
St. Edmund Hall passed into the possession of Queen's College in 1557, in which it will finally be merged.
St. Mary Hall, formerly the parsonage, house of St. Mary's Church, was given, in 1325, by Edward II. to Oriel College, and was established as a separate place of education in 1333. It is now to be completely united to Oriel College.

Charsley's Hall and Turrell's Hall.—Private halls founded according to the statute of 1882.

Oxlee, John [b. 1779, d. 1854], Rector of Scranton, in Yorkshire, and of Molesworth, wrote several books, of which the chief was The Christian Doctrine of the Trinity and Incarnation. He is said to have learnt 120 languages without a teacher. He was an original and bold speculator, and ran counter to the ordinary beliefs of the Church in many ways. Thus he published some letters to the Archbishop of Canterbury, ridiculing the doctrine of the personality of the devil. The Jewish Messenger pronounced him, next to Buxtorf, the most learned Gentile in Rabbinical lore. He wrote against the conversion of the Jews, on the ground that many assertions of Christian divines were demonstrably groundless, and that nothing could be done with any success until Christians better understood the Jewish principles. On the other hand, he maintained that the Jewish declarations against Christianity were the result of prejudice, which would disappear with mutual understanding. The late Thomas Scott, of Ramsgate, who published a vast number of tracts in favour of freethinking, included among them a long extract from Oxlee's letters to the Archbishop, and appended a biography of him.

Ozanam, Antoine Frédéric [b. 1813, d. 1853].—A Frenchman who endeavoured to write a work which should equal Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. It was to be a history of Christian civilisation, written so as to vindicate Roman Catholicism. He, however, only partially succeeded, writing Dante and the Catholic Philosophy of the Fifteenth Century, History of the Civilisation of the Fifth Century, etc.

Pachomius, St., a famous monk, and the first who prescribed a fixed rule in writing for monks, was born about 292 in Upper Thebais. He was brought up as an idoler, but in his twentieth year left the army into which he had been pressed, and became a catechumen at Thebes. After he had received baptism he joined Palemon, one of the strictest followers of St. Anthony. After they had lived together several years Pachomius had occasion to go to an uninhabited place called Tabenna, on the banks of the Nile. There he is said to have been told by an angel that he should build a monastery, and others add that the angel gave him in writing the rule which he afterwards used. Thus about the year 325 the two hermits established themselves in a small cell which afterwards became the first cenobium. Palemon died soon after, but his place was filled by Pachomius's eldest brother John, and after his death many others joined, so that in a short time they amounted to about a hundred. The rule by which the monks were to live was proportioned to each man's strength. Their habit was of white linen without sleeves and a hood of the same stuff. Novices were tried with great severity before they were admitted, but when they had once entered they were not allowed to leave the community. None of the monks were allowed to take holy orders, the monastery being served by neighbouring priests. Pachomius himself practised the greatest austerities. He is said not to have lain down for fifteen years, and after his conversion never partook of a proper meal. Besides the care of the whole monastery, he did as much manual labour as any of the other monks. He built six other monasteries in Thebais, and Palladius, who wrote an account of the Egyptian and Pales- tinian monks in 420, states that the monastery of Tabenna contained no less than fourteen hundred monks. Pachomius's sister having resolved to spend the rest of her days in retirement, a monastery was built for her and her followers on the other side of the Nile, to which he gave a rule. Many miracles are related of him, as speaking the Greek and Latin, which he had never learnt, healing the sick, etc. He died in 348, and is commemorated in the Greek Church on the fifteenth, in the Latin on the fourteenth, of May. His Order is said to have remained in the East till the eleventh century.

Pacian, St.—A Spaniard, who, after his conversion to Christianity, was Bishop of Barcelona. He lived in the fourth century, and died about 390. He was contemporary with St. Jerome, who says he was famous for his exemplary life, his elocution, and learning. There are extant of his an Exhortation to Repentance, letters against the Novatians, and a treatise on Baptism.

Pacification, Edicts of.—The name given to those decrees granted at different times by the French kings during the sixteenth century for the protection of the Protestants. They were none of them of long duration, and the kings' need of the support of both parties caused them to grant concessions to the Protestants, and repeal them immediately afterwards to satisfy the Roman Catholics. The first Edict of Pacification was that granted by Charles IX in 1562—added to by the same King in the following year at Amboise. Another was granted at Loches in 1568, but it only lasted a few months in consequence of an insurrection of the Huguenots. In 1570, however, he made peace with them again, and this time, with other privileges, granted them the towns of Rochelle, Cognac, La Charité, and Montauban as places of refuge from persecution. In 1576 Henry III. gave the Protestants full liberty to build churches and hold public services, but the Guises opposed this edict so fiercely that the King was obliged to revoke the edict at Blois towards the end of the same year. In 1577 he renewed the attempt to grant the Protestants some toleration, but was again overruled by the Guises and the league they had formed to maintain the Roman Catholic religion in France. In April, 1598, Henry IV. signed the famous Edict of Nantes, granting the Protestants full toleration, and this edict remained in force till 1685, when it was revoked by Louis XIV.

Pædobaptists [from the Greek païs, "child," and baptismos, "baptism"]). A name given to all those who hold the efficacy of the administration of baptism to infants, and which is used irrespectively of differences on other points.

Paganism.—The name applied to the idol-worship of the ancient world. The name is derived from Lat. pagus, "a village," and the etymology reminds us that the name was applied to the religion of the villages or country districts, as contrasted with that of the towns and large centres of population. In other words, when the world in its intelligent centres accepted Christianity, the outlying districts remained long attached to the ancient polytheism; hence "villager," a "rustic," became synonymous with "idol-worshipper."* By exactly similar process the word heathen, in Anglo-Saxon, "one who dwelt on the heath or open country," also became identified with a believer in the ancient gods.

At the period when Christianity began to extend itself beyond Palestine, the Roman Empire had gathered into itself all the civilised world except India and China, and as we have no historical evidence of the extension of Apostolic labours to China, and little as to the primitive Christianity of India, we may for our present purpose assume the Roman Empire to have been the real battle-field of idolatry and Christianity. Let us, therefore, sketch out in a few words what was the quasi-religious condition of the civilised world, or of that portion of it of which we know anything, at the period when the strife began.

A necessary part of the Roman policy was that of tolerating every form of religion which was found established among the conquered nations under their sway, provided that religion was not inconsistent with those relations between the conquerors and the conquered which were necessary for the maintenance of their power by the former. Hence we find the Jews exercising their religion in the time of our Lord without any restraint, so long as it was not made the pretext for rebellion to Roman authority. And so also in other portions of the Empire, the local idolatries were rarely interfered with; the Druidism of unconquered Britain, for example, continuing to prevail when the land was subdued by the Roman legions, and other local forms of polytheism in other countries being persecuted only when socially or politically troublesome. But with the more intellectual and educated subjects of the Empire, and wherever the influence of Rome itself was much felt, external idolatry had become little more than the recognised public religion of the State, conformity to which was kept up merely on the ground of order and social propriety; the more real and ruling principles of life being found in certain systems of philosophy which had grown up among the Greeks, and had extended their influence over all the higher classes among the Romans. Thus the religion of the civilised world at the time when it stood opposed to Christianity was, partly a system of mere idolatry, the worship of things that were not God; and partly this combined with philosophical principles which were more attractive than mere idolatry could be to educated minds. These philosophical principles were developed out of three systems, which had their origin among the Greeks, who were highly civilised and acute thinkers, at a period when the Romans themselves were in their infancy.

The three systems were the Stoic, the Epicurean, and the Platonist. They will be found under their separate heads. We have here only to inquire how idolatry affected the morals of mankind. A man must be violently prejudiced, if not wilfully blind, who should refuse to see in the teachings of Plato and Socrates a desire after truth and also after virtue which was almost Divine. The whole ethical doctrine of Greek polytheism was beautiful inconcepcion. It inculcated the recognition of mutual rights, and the rendering to each man his due, "honour to whom honour, custom to whom custom, tribute to whom tribute." Dikè, "justice," was to the Greek a real god. Liberty defending itself against tyranny was courage, courage was the essence of manliness [andreia]. Individual right involved social right, the authority of law reposed on the consent of the community, and thus there was interdependence and mutual help. Law was not, as in the great Oriental tyrannies, the power exerted by the strong over the weak, but the free and spontaneous consent of a race of freemen. And to preserve this mutual welfare, consideration, kindness, and forgiveness became duties. "When thy neighbour acknowledges his fault," says Hesiod, "restore him to thy friendship."

Yet this system had a deadly worm at its very core. It contemplated man in his relation to his fellow men, but ignored his duty

* The word first appears in a Law of the Emperor Valentinian, A.D. 368.
towards himself and towards God. "Know you not that your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost?" was a question which Christianity taught as a new revelation. A Greek was ruled in his dealings with the commonwealth, but was free to do what he liked as an individual. What was the result? The result was exactly what St. Paul described it in the first chapter of the Romans: licentious-ness knew no bounds, for religion had not atttempted to check it. Greek indecency, wantonness, dishonesty, lying, became proverbial.
"If there is one fact of history more certain than another," says a powerful writer of our own day, "it is this fact, that human nature was reduced to such a state of fetid decay by the rejection of God, that a few more years would have seen the world one gigantic dung-hill of corruption and death. Then the great sacrifice took place: God, manifest in the flesh, died upon the cross, an eternal sacrifice to take away sin. A fresh invigorating breeze swept through the putrifying mass of human life.
Men faced for the first time the realities of existence with an unflinching faith—by pure-ness, by knowledge—in a Divine life." [Mr.
J. H. Shorthouse.]

When Christianity became the recognised religion of the civilised world, idolatry became a popular belief in contravention of State authority. It had at first tolerated Christianity as it did any other religion. The persecutions that we have in the New Testament are mostly raised by Jews. The rest are excited by men who found that it interfered with their personal gains [Acts xvi. 19; xix. 27].
It was only when Christianity revealed itself
as an aggressive system, bound to extirpate
the "gods many and lords many" from the world, and hand it over to the one lordship of Christ, that Idolatry took alarm and began to persecute fiercely. It was beaten in the struggle and Christianity triumphed. For a while an analogous state of things was repeated. Paganism was tolerated by Constantine, as Christianity had been by most of the Emperors. The heathen priests were maintained in the enjoyment of their ancient privileges, and he and his immediate successors retained the heathen title which their predecessors had held of Pontifex Maximus ["chief sacrificer."] But popular opinion was against the heathen rites, and the temples were in some cases pulled down and in others allowed to crumble into ruins. Gibbon tells with glee, though at the expense of his hero Julian, how that Emperor, in his zeal to restore Paganism, proclaimed a sacrifice to the gods in populous Antioch. Instead of hecatombs of fat oxen, such as former days had witnessed, one pale and solitary priest appeared bringing a single goose.

At an epoch when toleration was a virtue
so little understood, it is no wonder that legislation was often confused, and to our minds indefensible. Governments were called upon to inculcate the faith, and to secure liberty though to some extent obliged, as a matter of fact, to respect the prejudices of the minority.
When Arianism divided the Christian Church into fiercely contending bodies, Paganism lifted its head once more, but in vain, since it had lost its hold upon the intelligent Theodosius the Great enacted that those who relapsed into Paganism should forfeit all civirights. For years even this was evaded in the West. It was Justinian who completed the work. In his days the last temple was turned into the celebrated monastery of St. Benedict.
But meanwhile Paganism had left its mark on Christianity. The Church had felt obliged to make concessions to the pagans, to mitigate their opposition and facilitate their conversion.
Hence minor observances of paganism were adopted as part of Christian ritual. The con-memoration of saints is admitted by Jerom and Augustine to be derived from Pagan (custom, and they justify the practice as on which the universal conscience of mankind approves. Neander traces the worship of the Virgin to that of Ceres. The casting of cart upon the dead which we retain in our Burial Service is derived from Paganism. The hanging of votive offerings in Roman Cathol churches is like what was practised in the day of Horace. New Year's gifts and rejoicing
the use of bride-cake, the popular observance of Valentine's Day, are all of Pagan origin.
And every day of our lives we have the name of the gods of our fathers on our lips, for after them we call the days of the week.

Paget, Francis Edward, d. at Elfor-ne, Lichfield, August 4th, 1882, of the parish he had been incumbent for forty-seven years. He graduated at Christ Church, Oxford, 1828. He was one of the most prominent controversialists of his time on the side of t Oxford Tracts, though his writings were not dry or formal treatises on theology.
The were mostly tales, written with great humour and the satire which they contained had great effect upon the average public opinion. Th in his story St. Anthonius, or Old Churches at New [1842], he poured merciless ridicule up the cheap and nasty" style in church buil
ing, and upon "Brummagem" Gothic whi was a good deal coming into use. "M Compo, the professor of this style in his story, became a nickname for cheap architect and the style became obsolete under Paget fun. So in Milford Malvonia he launch his arrows against pews in churches, and di
very much to further the "free and open system. In the Warden of Berkholtz he be the champion of the poor again pression of hard landlords, attacked son crueities in the workhouse system, and sati ised the Bible Society. Luke Sharpe, Knowledge without Religion, was a stori against non-religious education, and Lucret was a satire against sensation novels. One the cleverest is The Owllet of Owlstone Edge, a series of gentle satires upon the weaknesses of clergymen's wives. There were several more of these tales, and also some serious works, including some volumes of sermons. His volume Homeward Bound, written when he was seventy, is a beautiful forward-looking for himself and those dear to him in the world to come. Mr. Paget suffered not only from illness at the end of his life, but from blindness; but to his intimate friends he was still full of epigram and humorous comments on the doings of the world, in which he took keen interest to the last.

Pagoda [supposed to be derived from the Sanscrit bhagawat, "sacred," or to be a corruption of pui-gada, from the Persian put, "idol," and gada, "house"] is the name for certain Hindoo temples very highly decorated, and also for Chinese buildings of a tower-shape form, which consist of several stories, each story containing a single room. The finest of these is known as the Porcelain Tower of Nanking.

Pain bëni [Fr. "blessed bread"].—Bread prepared for Sacramental consecration in the Roman and Greek Churches, but not used for that purpose. It is distributed after service on certain days to the non-communicants, as a symbol of their holding spiritual communion, though on this occasion they do not receive the Sacrament.

Paine, Thomas, a Deistical writer, was born at Thetford, Norfolk, on Jan. 29th, 1737. His father was a Quaker who had been expelled from the Society for marrying a member of the Church of England. He was a stay-maker, and his son, when only thirteen, was taken from school and apprenticed to the trade, in which, however, he only remained a few years. In 1759 he went to Sandwich, where he became an excise-man, also carrying on the same employment at Lewes. In 1772 he was selected to draw up "the case of the Officers of Excise," in which he showed so much talent that he was introduced to Benjamin Franklin, who came to London in 1774 as a deputy from the colonies of North America to the British Government. On his advice Paine went to America, and settled at Philadelphia, where, in 1775, he became the editor of the Philadelphia Magazine. He was made a member of the American Philosophical society, and in 1779 Clerk to the Committee of Foreign Affairs; but was obliged to resign his latter appointment two years after, having, it was said, divulged some political secret during a controversy with Silas Deane. In 1781 Paine was sent to France with Colonel Lawrence to negotiate a loan, in which he was more than successful, for the French granted a subsidy of £10 million livres, and became guarantors of ten millions advanced by Holland. On his return he received 3,000 dollars from the Congress, and from New York State the confiscated estate of Frederic Davoe, a royalist, near New Rochelle. In 1787 he came to Europe, first to France, then to England, and in 1791 and 1792 published in England his Rights of Man, in answer to Burke's Thoughts on the French Revolution. The second part was designated as "a false, scandalous, malicious, and seditious libel," and he was tried before the King's Bench and pronounced guilty, but escaped to France. He was chosen a member of the Convention, but offended the Jacobins by advising that the King should not be executed, but imprisoned during the war and then banished. He was therefore expelled from the Convention in 1793 as a foreigner, and from January till November, 1794, was imprisoned in the Luxembourg. It is said that his door was once marked as a sign that he was to be executed; but it opened outwards, so, when shut, the mark was hidden and he was passed over. He remained in France till August, 1802, when he returned to America, and died on his estate June 8th, 1809. His bones were brought to England by William Cobbett in 1819; but a monument was raised over his empty grave in America in 1839.

Paine's first notable work is Common Sense, which appeared in January, 1776. Burke speaks of it as "that celebrated pamflet which prepared the minds of the people for independence." The Crisis, a series of pamphlets, which he published from 1776 to 1783, were also intended to rouse and keep alive the public spirit. His Age of Reason, published by his friend Barlow just after his imprisonment, is a violent and ignorant attack on Christianity, which alienated from him his friends both in America and England, exciting feelings of the deepest disgust and abhorrence. It was answered in several works, one of the most famous being Bishop Watson's Apology for the Bible in a Series of Letters to Thomas Paine, which appeared in 1796.

His other works are Reasons for Wishing to Preserve the Life of Louis Capet, The First Principles of Government, The Decline and Fall of the English System of Finance, etc.

Painting, Christian.—In the early days of Christianity the primary object of painting was to represent Christ, either alone or as the centre of a picture, and these representations were not left to the imagination of the artist, but were copied from certain likenesses supposed to have been taken during His life upon earth. Tradition ascribed certain paintings of Christ and the Madonna to St. Luke, and the napkin of St. Veronica was preserved, on which was supposed to be depicted the Vera Icon. These likenesses were copied and recopied for centuries, and departure from the ancient tradition came to be looked upon as nothing less than heresy. Until the twelfth century there was no art in Christian painting; pictures were painted in order to keep alive the spirit of devotion in the minds of the uneducated, and this object was reached by the most conventional method, made holy to the worshippers by long usage. Figures were represented as stiff and shapeless, and the only change which came over early art was the continual increase in richness of colour. The first dawn of new life began gradually to make itself felt about the twelfth century, when artists first attempted to put animation, beauty, and grace into the forms of their creation; but the work was slow, and was more a trial of skill for their own pleasure than for the sake of art. Guido, of Sienna, and Giunto, of Pisa, are associated with the birth of true Christian art—the Romanesque school; it almost reached its completeness with Giovanni CIMABUE, of Florence; and with Giotto di Bondone [d. 1336] the last fetters of conventionalism were cast off. From this time till the sixteenth century, art continued to flourish, fostered in two schools, the Florentine and the Sienese: the former somewhat severe, resembling the Byzantine school of the early Christians; the latter more graceful and more independent of conventional ideas. The fifteenth century saw a further development, which may be traced to the increase of religious feeling consequent on the rise of the mendicant Orders. It took the form of a nearer approach to nature in form and colour, light and shade—art became more naturalistic, while still keeping the spiritual expression of the old masters. The first of this school was a Dominican monk, Fra Angelico da Fiesole [d. 1455], who was followed by Masaccio, Fra Lippo Lippi, and Ghirlandajo; and it reached its highest perfection with the sixteenth century, in which Christian art was represented by many great masters, headed by Raffaello and Leonardo da Vinci and Michel Angelo. With these great masters beauty of form and feature were made equal, but not superior, to spiritual import, and the result was the painting of such pictures as later artists have never been able to equal. They have influenced all Italian painting of later times.

German art, as well as Dutch and French, was far behind the Italian; during the Middle Ages it followed the Gothic style, and it was only about the middle of the fifteenth century that Italian influence began to make itself felt. The Nuremberg and Saxon schools, headed respectively by Albrecht Diirer [b. 1471, d. 1528] and Lucas Cranach [b. 1472, d. 1533], each produced a number of great artists, but their individuality was lost in close and inferior imitation of the Italian painters. In opposition to the decline of art in Italy, and consequently in Germany, a school arose in Spain in the seventeenth century which lasted only a short time, but which produced five great painters, of whom Murillo is the greatest. The age which followed, characterised by the irreligion and immorality which preceded the French Revolution, gave a check to religious art from which it has never recovered; and although efforts have been made to revive the greatness of Christian art, it still stands in a very small proportion in general, and is marked by no artist of greatest distinction.

Pajon, Claude, the head of the Pajonist was born at Remorantin, in Lower Blésois, 1626. He was educated at Saumur, became minister of Machenoin in 1650, where he remained for sixteen years, and then returned to his university as Professor of Theology, where he promulgated his peculiar views, which made him so famous that he was minister to Orleans, lived there, and died September, 1655. His doctrine was that the is no such thing as subjective grace, but that God governs the world through the object connection of cause and effect. These tenets he preached and gained many followers, the provincial synods forbade all Pajonists to minister in the church. He left two books refutations of attacks on the Reform Church.

Palamas, Gregory.—One of the leaders of the Hesychasts [q.v.], who are, therefore sometimes known as Palamites; he was born in Asia, and brought up in the Court of the Emperor John Cantacuzenus. He was the principal defender of this sect against the Barlaamites and others. In 1349 he was made Archbishop of Thessalonica; but the popes refused to admit him, and he retired to the Isle of Lemnos, where he is supposed to have died. He wrote many works, most of which however, are in manuscript. Amongst those which have been printed are Prosopopeia, a treatise against the Latin Church.

Palea.—The superscription affixed certain canons in the Decretum Gratiani of which the meaning has never been clear ascertained. By some it is declared to be a shortened form of P pencopalea, a disciple of Gratian; others say that it is only appended to the less important canons, which are called paela, "chaff;" but this derivation does not hold good, as some of these canons are among the most important. The Paleae in the old manuscripts are few in number, but the new was afterwards given to many more, and are held to be of equal authority with authentic canons of Gratian.

Palaerio, Aonio [b. at Seroli in 1500] was educated at Rome, and then proceeded to Siena as teacher. In 1542 he was summoned before the Inquisition on account of the here said to be contained in his work Della Penezze SUFFICIENZA E SATISFAZIONEPASSIONE CHRISTI, but he was acquitted. He became Professor at Lucca in 1546, and nine years afterwards moved on to Milan, where t charge of heresy was revived against him, and, after suffering two years’ imprisonment, he was burnt at Rome in 1570. Besides the work we have mentioned, he wrote De Immortalitate Animarum, and Actio in Pontifices Romanos et corum Asseclas.

Palestine, Church of.—The history of the Church of the Circumcision, i.e. of the Jewish Christians of Palestine, is connected towards the end of the New Testament period with the history of St. James the Less. The end of the Acts shows us St. Paul leaving Jerusalem for the last time; it is the last appearance of the ancient city in Holy Writ. At that time Festus was the Roman Governor. He had repressed some of the evils which his predecessors had caused, but his death was the sign for fresh ill-government. In the interval between his death and the appointment of his successor, the Sadducean High Priest, according to Josephus [and the passage is generally admitted to be genuine], caused St. James to be put to death. The Apostle, despite the prejudice of his countrymen against him as a Nazarene, had won the veneration of the Pharisees for his holiness. They appear to have regarded him as entitled to hold belief in our Saviour as a prophet, but to have asked him to undeceive the people by assuring them that he did not regard Him in the same light that St. Paul did—that he did not, in fact, seek on Him as the only door into the sheep- fold of God. But St. James declaring that the Son of Man would come in the clouds of heaven to judge the world, they gave him up to his enemies, who threw him from a pinnacle of the Temple and dispatched him with clubs.

After the short government of Albinus came that of Gessius Florus, so intolerably ruel that the Jews regarded it as a punishment for the murder of St. James. They raised a revolt. King Agrippa made a speech to them deprecating it, but on their refusing to hear him he retired to Rome. Vespasian came after a while to conduct the war, was recalled by the confusion at Rome, where he was soon made emperor, and his son Titus arrived on the warfare, and finally destroyed Jerusalem. The Christian Church there seems to have fallen into Ebionitism [Enton- res], but its annals become obscure. Simon was chosen as St. James’s successor, apparently because he had some relation to the Lord according to the flesh. Eusebius, who, living in Palestine, would have had access to any written memorials in existence, says there were none, that circumcised men huddled the Church until the time of Hadrian. In his days arose a false Christ, Barcochba, who stirred up the people to a fresh revolt, and after it was put down with terrible bloodshed, the Jews hated the Christians more than ever, as being double-dyed traitors. The church became altogether separated from the Synagogue, and those who clung to Jewish customs were regarded as separatists. The ancient city was named Ælia Capitolina, the first name being taken from that of the Emperor Ælius Hadrianus; the records indicated that it was dedicated to the Jupiter of the Roman Capitol. The Christians acquiesced, apparently, with exultation in the witness which was borne to the prophecies of Christ.

As a Church Jerusalem was then at an end. The ancient name of the city was restored two centuries later. [See Jerusalem, Bishopric of.]

Palestrina, Giovanni Pierluigi da, was born at Palestrina, near Rome, in 1524. He studied under Claude Goudimel [q.v.], and in 1551 was appointed Master of the Chapel to Pope Julius III., to whom he dedicated his first work, consisting of four masses for four voices. At the Council of Trent the state of ecclesiastical music was discussed; the Cardinals demanded the abolition of all the secular tunes which had been introduced into the sacred music, while the singers defended them. At length it was agreed that Palestrina should write a mass according to the Cardinals’ taste, and he produced three, the third being the famous Mass of Pope Marcellus, which is considered his best work. He died in Rome, Feb. 2nd, 1594. He left behind him numerous compositions, many of them unpublished. [Musrc.]

Paley, William, a celebrated English divine, was born at Peterborough in 1743. During his infancy his father removed to Giggleswick, to become head-master of the Grammar School, and the boy was educated there. When he left for Christ’s College, Cambridge, at the age of sixteen, his father said he had by far the cleverest head he had ever met with. In 1763 he graduated as Senior Wrangler, and then taught at Greenwich Academy for three years. In 1765 he gained the prize at Cambridge for a Latin dissertation on A Comparison between the Stoic and Epicurean Philosophy with respect to the Influence of each on the Morals of a People, and in the next year he was elected a Fellow and Tutor of his college. He remained there for ten more years, then married, and retired to the livings of Musgrove and Appleby, in Westmorland, and Dalston, in Cumberland. In 1780 he became Prebendary of Carlisle, and subsequently Archdeacon and Chancellor of the Diocese. It was during this part of his life that he wrote most of his works. In 1794, as a reward for his Evidences, the Bishop of London made him a Prebend of St. Pancras, he was promoted to the sub-deanery of Lincoln, became a D.D. of Cambridge, and Rector of Bishop-Wearmouth. He died in 1805. The first of Dr. Paley’s important works was The Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy [1785], in which he shows himself to be a follower of Locke, and denies the theory of moral sense. In 1790 appeared the most original of his works, _Horae Paulinae_, in which, by comparing St. Paul's Epistles with the Acts of the Apostles, he shows the authenticity of both, and furnishes a testimony on behalf of revealed religion. A third important work was _A View of the Evidences of Christianity_, which appeared in 1794, in writing which he borrowed from the works of Lardner and Bishop Douglas. This book was very popular at the time, and ran through many editions. His last work was _Natural Theology, or Evidences of the Existence and Attributes of the Deity_, which Paley gained partly from Nieuwentyt's _Religious Philosopher_. The _Natural Theology_ was, perhaps, the most popular of his works.

Paley stands pre-eminent in English popular theology as the _Utilitarian_ divine. With him expediency was the one foundation of all philosophy. The laws of honour, the sense of right and wrong in the mind both of the individual and the nation, were set aside by him in favour of the doctrine that the laws both of God and man appeal to the fear of tangible punishment and the hope of tangible reward. Moral obligation means self-interest stretching through an endless future, and the proclamation of such motives is the revelation of the will of God. And this will must be made known by some authoritative method. What shall the method be? The moral sense being discarded, there remains the proof from miracles. Whoever cannot dispense with the laws of nature has no credentials of a Divine mission to offer. Consequently Paley directs his argument to proving that the evidence for the miracles of the New Testament is sufficient for the conviction of an honest conscience. Hume had declared that a miracle is so improbable in itself that no amount of external evidence is sufficient to make it credible. Paley replied that the evidence adduced in favour of the statements of the Evangelists was overwhelming. This much must be acknowledged, that Paley's style is perfect as regards clearness and directness. But the ignoring of the moral sense was a terrible weakness in his theology, and it may perhaps be regarded as the greatest merit of the philosophy of Coleridge, that he asserted against Paley the power of the conscience, of the internal evidence, and of the direct appeal of God to the soul.

_Palimpsest_ [from Greek, _palin_, “again,” and _psao_, “to scrape out”].—A manuscript written on vellum from which previous writing has been scratched off. The custom of thus using ancient MSS. was largely increased by the Mahometan conquest of Egypt, which hindered the supply of papyrus to heathen countries, and the result, no doubt, was that many ancient writings were thus destroyed. We have only to do here with those palimpsests which contain portions of the Holy Scriptures. The most celebrated of these is known as the _Codex Ephraemi_. [Codex.] There is a palimpsest of the sixth century, containing part of St. Luke's Gospel, in the British Museum; another of the same date, of St. Matthew, in Trinity College, Dublin; another of the eighth century in the library of the British and Foreign Bible Society. See Cassell's _Bible Cyclopedia_, p. 815, for a full account of these and of others.

_Palissy_, _BERNARD_, a noted French Huguenot, was born near Agen in the Department of Lot-et-Garonne about 1510. He was early apprenticed to a potter, and so received little education. As soon as he was old enough he began journeying through France and Germany in order to improve his art. At last about 1539, he settled at Saintes. His trade diminished greatly, as there was little demand for coloured glass, and the Reformation had much decreased the sale of images, while Palissy had painted. He had, however, seen enamelled cup while on his travels, and gave himself up for some years to an attempt to discover the process of making the enamel. He worked for sixteen years, laughed at as visionary by his neighbours, and reproached by his wife, as they were in the deepest poverty; but at last he was rewarded with success. Meanwhile, about 1546, Palissy became a Huguenot, and through his actions a Protestant Church was founded at Saintes. Towards the close of Henry II.'s reign, his merits were discovered by the Constable Anna, of Montmorency, who furnished him with the means of building over in rue St. Gilles to burn his pottery, and on his being thrown into prison as a heretic in 1562, obtained a pardon through Catherine de Medicis. Queen Catherine also protected him, more for her own benefit than for his, during the massacres of St. Bartholomew; he lived in the Tuileries and was employed in decorating the palaces and gardens. However, in 1588 he was arrested and thrown into the Bastille, where he died two years after. It was at this time that his famous answer to the King is said to have been given. Henry had told him that if he would not recant he would be compelled to leave him to his fate. Palissy answered: "Sire, you have several times told me that you pitied me; but it is I that pity you, who have uttered the words 'I am compelled.' It was not spoken like a king. These girls, companions, and I, who have a portion in the kingdom of heaven, will teach you this royal language, that neither the Guises nor your people, nor you, will know how to compel a potter to bow the knee to image. Palissy remained in his cell till his death in 1590. He is now acknowledged to have been a sound thinker, and to have been one of the greatest writers in the French language. A monument was raised to him in Saintes.
Pall or Pallium.—An ecclesiastical vestment, granted by the Pope to archbishops as bestowing the metropolitan dignity. In its modern form, which may be seen in the arms of the Archbishop of Canterbury, it consists of a strip of white woollen cloth,* about "three fingers broad," thrown across the shoulders, to which are attached two bands of the same material, each embroidered with a red cross—one hanging over the breast and the other down the back. The whole is worn over the episcopal dress, to which it is fastened by three pins of gold. In its original form, however, the pall was not a sacerdotal ornament, but a splendid mantle, forming part of his Imperial robes of State, which it was reasonable for any but the emperor to wear, except by special permission. This permission was sometimes granted as a mark of peculiar distinction to philosophers and men of learning, and afterwards to distinguished ecclesiastics, particularly the bishops of the leading cities. In process of time the Bishops of Rome came to confer the pall upon other bishops of the West, the first who is known to have done this being Symmachus [498–514]. At first, the emperor's consent was necessary in all cases, but soon it was only asked in the case of bishops who were not his subjects, and at last it was dispensed with altogether. At this time the pall was looked upon as an honourable distinction, but not as a badge of authority, and was not yet restricted to metropolitans, much less considered necessary for the exercise of their powers. Gregory the Great, however, bestowed the pall as a sign of office on his "vicars," who were certain prelates invested by him with jurisdiction in cases of appeal; and this precedent was followed by succeeding Popes, who acted from the recipients an oath of obedience to the Roman See. These "vicars" were generally the archbishops of their respective Churches, and by degrees the pall came to be considered as exclusively the badge of a metropolitian. Accordingly we find that cholas I. [858–867], writing to the Bulgarians, pronounces that an archbishop is empowered to exercise his functions before receiving the pall from the Pope; and in VIII., in the Synod of Ravenna [A.D. 877], ordered that every metropolitian, within three months of his appointment, should send to Rome an application for the pall, accompanied with a summary of his faith. And in the council of Lateran [A.D. 1215] Innocent III., acting by a canon transcribed into the credals, that the pall was to be considered intimating the plenitude of Apostolic power, that neither the function nor the title of archbishop could be assumed without it. The granting of palls became a great source of revenue to Rome. Gregory the Great had expressly forbidden the handling of money in the transaction, but his prohibition was soon overlooked, and exorbitant sums were demanded for the palls. Canute of England, on his visit to Rome in 1027, renounced with John XVIII. on this point, and succeeded in obtaining from him a promise of an abatement in the case of future archbishops in England.

No archbishop might inherit the badge from his predecessor; when a prelate died, he must be buried in his pall, and his successor must apply to the Pope for another.

There is one instance of an archbishop receiving two palls. Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury, applied to Rome [1071] in person for the decoration, and, as a mark of extraordinary favour, was invested by Alexander II., his former pupil, with two palls.

Palladius, one of the early Christian Fathers, was born about 368, in Galatia. Little is known of his early life till in his twentieth year he went to Egypt, to learn something of the monks there, and resided among them for some time, and thence to Palestine, where he spent three years in Mount Olivet, and became acquainted with Rufinus, of whom he was a great admirer. In 400 he was made Bishop of Helenopolis, in Bithynia: but on account of his attachment to St. Chrysostom he became implicated with the Origenists, and was violently hostile to St. Jerome. He is supposed to have been banished, and on his recall to have been made Bishop of Aspona, in Galatia, where he died about 431.

Palladius was the author of a Greek work containing the lives of several Palestinian and Egyptian monks. It is entitled The Lausiac History, from Lausus, Governor of Cappadocia, to whom it is dedicated. Another work, A Dialogue of the Life of St. Chrysostom, written in 408, is attributed to him, but its authenticity is doubtful.

Pallavicini, Sforza, Jesuit and Cardinal, son of the Marquis Alexander Pallavicini, was born at Rome in 1607. He was educated for the bar, and became a learned philosopher and lawyer, but entered the Order of the Jesuits in 1637. He became Professor of Philosophy in the Jesuit College in 1639, of Theology in 1643, was made Cardinal by Pope Alexander VII. in 1659, and died in 1667.

Pallavicini's chief fame is derived from his History of the Council of Trent. In 1619, Paolo Sarpi had written an account of the Council, the principles of his book being distinctly in favour of the Reformed opinions, and it was thought necessary to repel its attacks on Romanism. Torenzio Aleiati was chosen for the task, but died in 1651, before he had gathered together all the material, and the work was carried out by Pallavicini. The book appeared in two volumes [1656, 1657], and was highly extolled by the Roman Catholics.

The wool of which this vestment is made is ained from two lambs which have been blessed the Pope on St. Agnes' Day [Jan. 21st].
Palm Cross.—A stone cross or crucifix mounted on steps, sometimes seen near the entrance of a church [usually on the south]. The name has reference to the custom of decorating it with branches of palm for the procession on Palm Sunday. There are several ancient palm crosses in Cornwall; and Eyam Church, in Derbyshire, has one which is remarkable for the beauty of its sculpture.

Palm Sunday.—The day on which is commemorated our Lord's triumphant entry into Jerusalem, five days before His Passion. Throughout a great part of Christendom it is marked by a procession of palms. Some authors affirm that this ceremony is as old as the fourth century, and claim St. Cyril of Jerusalem as alluding to it. It is certain, however, that the ceremony was practised in the fifth century. The services of the Church of England for this day are marked by special second lessons, recording the great event of the day. St. Paul, in the epistle for the day, calls on us to honour the humiliations of Jesus Christ, which were the result of a profound obedience to His Father and an ardent affection for the souls of men; and, by insisting on the glory to which He was raised, the same Apostle exhorts us to practise those virtues.

Palmer [Lat. palmifer, “a palm-bearer”].—A name given to that class of pilgrims who had performed the pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre, and returned home carrying branches of Oriental palm, in token of their accomplished expedition. On arriving home they offered the palm to the priest to be placed on the altar, and these were frequently used in processions on Palm Sunday. Even after their return they continued their religious pilgrimages in their own country, and thus the word “palm” was sometimes used for itinerant monks without a fixed residence, professing voluntary poverty, and visiting at times the most remarkable sanctuaries. The dress of the palmer was the same as that of the ordinary pilgrims, namely, a black or grey gabardine, girt with a cincture, from which a shelf or scrip was suspended, a broad hat ornamented with scallop shells, and a long staff.

Palmer, Edward Henry, an English Orientalist, was born at Cambridge in 1840. He studied at St. John's College, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1867, and for the next three years made expeditions in Sinai, and became perfectly acquainted with the language and manners of the Bedouins. In 1871 he was made Lord Almoner's Professor of Arabic at Cambridge, and remained in England till the beginning of the Sudan war. He then went out to Egypt to try and dissuade the Bedouins from their attacks on the Suez Canal, but was captured, with two European companions, Captain Gill and Lieutenant Charrington, in the Wady Sud of Desert of El Tih, and murdered, Aug. 11th, 1882.

His books have proved very serviceable Orientalists. They are The Negeb, or Some Country of Scripture and the Desert of El Tih; The Desert of the Exodus; History of the Jewish Nation from the Earliest Times; The Qur'an etc.

Palmer, Herbert [b. at Wingham, Kent Mar. 29th, 1601; d. Aug. 13th, 1647] to his degree at Cambridge, became Fellow Queen's College; ordained in 1624; Lecturer at St. Alphege, Canterbury, in 1626; University Preacher at Cambridge in 1629, and Vicar of Ashwell, to which he was presented. Archbishop Laud. He was a member of the Westminster Assembly in 1643; Assessor of the same, 1646; Incumbent of a new church at Westminster in 1647; a had in 1644 been appointed Master of Queen College, Cambridge. Palmer was an eloquent and scholarly preacher, but is chiefly known by his method of catechising and the number of catechisms which he prepared. The best is An Endeavour to make the Principles Christian Religion, namely, the Creed, the Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and Sacraments, Plain and Easy. He was a Chairman on the Committee of the Catechist and his own catechism above-mentioned was taken as the basis of the Westminster Catechism. He wrote also Vindiciae Sabaethi, defence of Sabbath observance; and Memoriae of Godliness and Christianity, containing Christian paradoxes, sometimes ascribed Lord Bacon.

Palmer, William [b. 1811], a theologian, writer, brother of Lord Selborne, was the son of an Oxfordshire rector. When yet very young he was elected to a demisyship at Magdalen College, where, in 1830, he took his Bachele degree as a First Class in Literae Humanitatis. He had already gained the Chancellor's prize for Latin verse, and subsequently obtained that for a Latin essay on the subject of Athenian comedy. He was appointed Tug of his college, and acted as Examiner in classical schools. He was one of those who followed Dr. Newman in seceding to Rome being dissatisfied with the Protestant character of the English Church, and from that time resided chiefly in Italy, living the life of a student, but never taking priest's ord in the Roman Church. He died at Rome April 5th, 1879.

He wrote many works, as The Harmony of Anglican Doctrine with that of the Church of the East; A Letter to a Protestant Catholic; An Introduction to Early Christian Symbols, Egyptian Chronicles, The Patriarch and Tsar, etc. Origins Liturgicae, the work Sir William Palmer, of Worcester College, has often been attributed to his namesake Magdalen.
Palmer, Rev. Sir William [b. at the beginning of the present century; d. 1886], a prominent supporter of the Oxford movement, graduated at Dublin in 1824, incorporated B.A. at Magdalen Hall in 1828, transferred to Worcester in 1831, Vicar of Monkton - Wyld from 1846-69, and Prebendary of Salisbury from 1849-58. He was also appointed, in 1846, Vicar of Whitchurch-Canonicorum with Chidcock, Marshwood, and Stanton St. Gabriel. He was the author of Christian; The Apocryphal Jurisdiction and Succession of the Episcopacy in the British Churches; a Treatise on the Church of Christ.; A Compendious Ecclesiastical History, etc. Not long before his death he republished a very interesting narrative of the origin of the Tracts for the Times.

Pamphilus, St., was a native of Berytus, in Phoenicia, and descended from one of the most distinguished families in the province. He began his studies in his own country, and finished them in Alexandria, under Plerius, a man of such great learning that he was called a second Origen. From Alexandria, Pamphilus went to Cæsarea, in Palestine, where he was ordained priest, and where his learning and sanctity made him the greatest ornament of that Church. His favourite employment was the study of Holy Scripture; and to promote the improvement of ecclesiastical learning he collected a library at Cæsarea, which contained a great number of useful works. The author to whom St. Pamphilus most directed his attention was Origen, the whole of whose works he copied with his own hand, and St. Jerome, who had them afterwards, valued them very highly. It is said that Eusebius gained most of the material for his Ecclesiastical History from the Cæsarean library. St. Pamphilus also founded a school at Cæsarea, in imitation of that established at Alexandria. In 307, during the Maximian persecution, Pamphilus was seized by Urbanus, governor of Palestine, and, after being tortured, was thrown into prison, where he remained for two years, during which he wrote an Apology for Origen, in five books, to which Eusebius added a sixth, but the first alone is now extant. Pamphilus and his companions suffered martyrdom on Feb. 16th, 309, but he and some of the others are commemorated on June 1st. Eusebius afterwards took the surname of Pamphil, and wrote an account of the saint's life, which is now lost.

Panagia [Gr. panagia, "all holy"]; this word, used in the Eastern Church, has two meanings: [1] it is sometimes used to designate the Virgin Mary; and [2] it is a name given to the consecrated bread. The transition seems to have arisen from the Greek custom of placing a piece of the consecrated bread and a cup of wine before the image of the Virgin. Then prayers were offered, incense was burned, and the bread and wine distributed among the faithful.

Pan-Anglican Synod. [Lambeth Conference.]

Pantaenus, St., was born at Sicily in the second century. He applied himself successfully to the study of philosophy, and belonged to the Stoics till he was converted to Christianity. He was the first catechetical teacher at Alexandria, to which post he was presented during the reign of Marcus Aurelius. The Ethiopians having sent to the Bishop for a divine to instruct them, Pantaenus was sent by Demetrius [Eir. 190], and is said to have discovered a Gospel of St. Matthew in Hebrew which had been left there by the Apostle St. Bartholomew. Nothing is known of Pantaenus after 203. St. Jerome says that he wrote several commentaries on the Scriptures, but that his lectures were more serviceable to the Church than his writings, which are now lost.

Pantheon, at Rome, once a heathen temple dedicated to Jupiter and all the gods. In 608 re-dedicated by Pope Boniface IV. to the Virgin Mary and all the saints. It is also called the Rotunda, from its fine dome, which is very celebrated, and suggested the idea of the domes of modern times.

Pantheism [from pan, "everything," and Theos, "God"];—The belief that God is everything, and everything God. In one form Pantheism may be regarded as a protest against Materialism. Those who regarded the visible world as the sum total of all things, became from the very nature of the case Atheists. Those who recognised that thoughts and feelings are things just as real as things that can be touched, were so far emancipated from the blank hopelessness of the Materialist creed. Pantheism may be regarded as an importation from the Eastern philosophies, the groundwork of which was the belief in an Infinite Eternal Being which clothes itself in a multiplicity of forms, and thus makes up the universe. But the great origin of modern Pantheism must be traced to Germany. The endeavour to construct a basis of belief which should supersede the old traditional supremacy over the conscience claimed by the Church of Rome led to the theories of Spinoza, of Schelling, of Hegel, and upon these theories much of the succeeding Pantheism of modern thought has been founded. The first postulate of the system is, not an objective faith which rules and regenerates the life of man, but religious ideas and thoughts which have to find their assimilation in the facts of the universe, and to make these fit in with arbitrary assumption. The sense of harmony, the aesthetic faculty, requires a religion, and therefore a religion which meets this want must be true. Of course, where free license is thus given to the imagination, it is no wonder that Pantheism takes a thousand forms. "Matter," says one, “does not exist except as an idea of our minds.” “Matter,” says another, “is the body of God, and the unseen energy, intelligence of the universe is His soul. The two co-exist, and are inseparable.” “There is no God beside Me,” says the Creator by His prophet Isaiah; but the Pantheist applies this to the Universe, and represents it as saying, “I am God, and there is no other.” It is true that the higher expression of Pantheism admits such ideas as God, Revelation, Creation, Providence, as something more than subjective, as expressing realities beyond the mind. But unfortunately when it is sought to fix and define these realities, they vanish like shadows. Thus a very able Unitarian minister, speaking of Gibbon’s account of himself sitting in the Coliseum, and suddenly resolving there and then to write his famous book, regards that resolution as parallel to the inspiration of the Hebrew prophets who heard the Word of the Lord speaking to them and sending them a message. But such a comparison is not exalting to the modern writer, it simply drags down the ancient. To deny any real inspiration which comes direct from God, without any modification beyond that caused by the imperfection of the mind to comprehend it, is practically Pantheism. It denies personal intercourse between God and the soul. There may be a veiled Pantheism, too, in the view so often put forth of late, that conceptions of God have varied from age to age according to human circumstances. Thus the Jew conceived of God as a Deliverer when the Exodus from Egypt was new, and as a Legislator when order supervened upon anarchy, and as King when the nation was united, and as Father when Christ had compassion on the multitudes. There is truth, of course, in all this, as there is in the modern conception that He is an all-pervading beneficent Power; but it becomes error if it ignores the fact that God is, and ever has been, all these. The original grounds of faith in a Divine Creator, and Ruler, and King, and Saviour fail, when one aspect only is confessed. The supposed discovery becomes a mere childish game at hide and seek, where the finder and found are identical; fear and gratitude are predicated, but the source from which they spring becomes a shadow.

Unhappily Pantheistic opinion involves moral consequences of a sad character. The sinking of the personal distinction between man and God is followed by the loss of the affections and the conscience, which are the very life of religion. If God is already identified with His creatures, where is the room for obedience to Him, for His supreme law, for prayer which asks for what otherwise it would not receive? Above all, the holiness of God would disappear, as He becomes identified with the struggles and failures of the Creation. “The comparative and relative perfection of His Being,” we are told, “is only to be reached by strife within and without, from which the spirit mounts stronger after every conflict.” It is impossible to exaggerate the moral danger of assuming, as evil men did of old, that we are delivered to do all the abominations of sin [Jer. vii. 10], that evil in fact is a necessity for the production of virtue, not a moral consequence of liberty, and that the teaching of Holy Scripture is erroneous when it tells us that two possibilities are open to us, life and death, between which man has to choose. Freewill is the very centre of human personality, and without it we lose the distinction between human agency and the agency of God. Deeply instructive is it to watch the progress downward of the denial of this distinction. There is a strife going on, says the modern Pantheist and its conditions make the world so bad that it is only just endurable, and the progress of civilisation makes things worse, for they increase the consciousness of misery. Such the Pantheism of Pessimism, identified with the name of Schopenhauer. “I know no theory of the universe,” says a celebrated living writer, “which leads me to think that it would not have been better for mankind they had never been born.”

Not only worship must disappear before such a creed, but morality also. Long before men reasoned about theories of life and the ultimate good, light and life were given to the world by the Ten Commandments, and the commentaries upon them in Psalms and Prophets. They were based on the principle that man is subject to a Will higher than his own and distinct from it, the Will of an eternal righteous and unchanging Lord. By that conviction men’s lives have been governed and brought into a measure of order and peace. Pantheism sweeps away Lawgiver King, and Judge. So long as he was believed in, the noblest spirits among men could face the terrible difficulties and problems of life with joy, because they believed Him faithful. They were like men with the war sun over their heads casting light all around them. But the night cometh. Nature fails us all, and when God is denied, men do deeds of darkness, and learn to praise the do more than the living. The only refuge from such dreariness and despair is to believe God even as Abraham did, even as St. Paul did, who knew in whom he believed, that same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

Papal Infallibility. [Infallibility]

Papal Power, Growth of.—The cause which led to this plain fact of history are just those which would tend to bring about an increase of a power which professed to spiritual and Christian. But, besides this, advocates of the Papacy base its claim supremacy over the whole Christian Church on Scripture, citing Matt. xvi. 18, 19 proof: “And I say also unto thee, that th art Peter, and upon this rock I will build My Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the Kingdom of Heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven;" and further Luke xxii. 31, 32: "When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren;" and John xxi. 16, 17: "Feed My sheep;" and they point to the high position to which the Popes rose as but the natural fulfilment of these promises and injunctions of our Lord to St. Peter. It may be granted that our Lord's words to St. Peter, taken quite by themselves, would cover, in the person of that Apostle himself, a great deal of what is claimed for the occupant of the Roman See; but there is no evidence in the New Testament that St. Peter took rank above the other Apostles. It is true that he was one of the foremost of their number and did often lead them; but this was due to his energetic and ardent temperament rather than to any special gifts. The promises made to St. Peter are certainly remarkable, but we are compelled to regard them as given to him as representing the brotherhood of the Apostles, or them and their successors, in the government of the Church, or the whole body of the Christian ministry, although it may well be that they were personally addressed to St. Peter because our Lord knew that he would make a prompt and emphatic use of them, that by his instrumentality the Church would be built "on the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets," himself being one of the stones. But the contention of the tomanists is that the promises to St. Peter were not only personal in this sense, but that they were so peculiarly made to him alone that he could hand them on to a successor for perpetual transmission, and that as the Apostle was Bishop of the Roman Church, his powers would naturally descend to the succeeding bishops of Rome. Here, again, it may be conceded, since there is nothing certainly to contradict the view, and early tradition is in a favour, that St. Peter may have resided for some time in Rome—although chronological difficulties will not allow us to believe that he was there for the traditional twenty-five years that he may have exercised Apostolic superintendence of the Church, perhaps in conjunction with St. Paul, and that both of them, or St. Peter alone, appointed Linus as the first Bishop. Il this may be conceded, and yet the facts of story are altogether against the kind of pretension which has been claimed for the Roman See. We know from certain evidence that the early Bishops of Rome neither made such claims nor enjoyed such prerogatives as a theory of the Papal Supremacy supposes. We know that there was no distinction between them and other bishops, but such as is there naturally accounted for—naturally, and thout any reference to prophecies, or to special endowments from above—by the secular greatness of the city of Rome; for the importance of the city, which was the bishop's seat, was the sole original ground of distinction between one bishop and another. "Wherever a bishop be," says St. Jerome [A.D. 390], "whether at Rome or Eugubium" [Gubbio, in Italy, an insignificant place then as now], "at Constantinople or at Rhegium, at Alexandria or at Thasus, he is of the same worth, and of the same priesthood . . . they are all successors of the Apostles." This is exemplified in the case of the three Churches founded by St. Peter, or believed to be so—Rome, Alexandria, Antioch. Now, although the Church of Antioch was founded by St. Peter, and is said to have been the seat of his episcopate before he went to Rome, still it ranked below Alexandria, which appears only to have been founded under his direction by his disciple, St. Mark; the reason being that Alexandria was the second city in the Empire, and the capital of Egypt, whilst Antioch was only the third. In a similar way the Church of Rome ranked first of all because Rome was the first city in the Empire. So too Byzantium, which had been only an ordinary bishopric, when it was made by Constantine the Great the second capital of the Empire with the new name of Constantinople, was raised by the second General Council [A.D. 381] to the rank of a patriarchal See, and placed next to Rome itself, above the Apostolic See of Antioch. This brings us face to face with the fact that the foundation of the Papal power rested on the circumstance that the Pope was Bishop of Rome. We are now in a position to trace the growth of this power. Before doing so it may be well to refer to the Title of Pope. In the East this term has been vaguely applied to almost any ecclesiastical person. In the West its use was confined at an early period to bishops. In the sixth century it began to be more often used of the Bishop of Rome than of other bishops; in the ninth century this was still further the case; and, finally, its use in addressing any one besides the Bishop of Rome was forbidden by Gregory VII. in the Council of Rome of the year 1073.

We have seen that the foundation-stone of the Papal Supremacy was Rome itself. Rome was what no other city has ever been—the capital of the whole civilised world; it was, moreover, the centre of the civil and military government of the Empire. St. Paul himself felt the greatness of Rome and the importance of witnessing for Christ there [Acts xix. 21, xxiii. 11, xxv. 11, xxvii. 15]. Again, the Roman Church was an Apostolic one, the only Western Church which could claim this title at all. St. Paul had lived there long, had written his greatest epistle to it, and had received the crown of martyrdom there. St. Peter, too, may have resided in Rome; very early tradition says that he had been its bishop, and he had probably been martyred there. To Apostolical Churches belonged a certain degree of reverence, and the Church of Rome could boast of the two great Apostles.

Besides this, in early days, the Roman Church was always orthodox. It was not a Church of great literary fame, but it held fast "the faith once delivered to the saints." When heretics came to Rome to further their views, their opinions were rejected by the stern orthodoxy of the Roman Church, and the news of this, spreading over the Christian world, tended to increase the influence of the Bishops of Rome. On such grounds, Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons [180], says that "with this Church the whole Church [i.e. the faithful everywhere] must agree—with this Church ... in which the Apostolical tradition has always been preserved." And in like manner Tertullian, "What a happy Church is that on which the Apostles poured out all their doctrine with their blood. ... Let us see what she hath learned, what taught." The references of the ancient Fathers to the Roman Church are full of respect and of a desire to set Rome as high as possible; but they speak of it as belonging to the same class with other Apostolical Churches, and rest its glory on its connection with both the Apostles, SS. Peter and Paul, on their having founded it, settled it, and taught it, and not on any promise of our Lord to St. Peter and his successors. Rather later, Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage [248], a man of great abilities and lofty character, was brought into close relations with the Church of Rome. We find that he writes to, and treats, its Bishops on terms of perfect equality. He addresses them as "brother and colleague;" and whilst he holds up the general dignity of the episcopate, he never owns, or even shows, that he was aware of any right in the Bishop of Rome to rule over the whole Church. Even those passages in his writings which speak in an exalted way of St. Peter, and of the Roman Church as founded by him, appear rather to be symbolical, representing St. Peter as the type of Apostleship and the Roman Church as the type of unity, than to imply that he admitted in any way the supremacy of the Roman See as it was afterwards understood.

In the reign of the Emperor Constantine [306] the Bishops of Rome became more important still. Christianity was made the acknowledged religion of the Empire, hence the number of Christians and of the clergy was largely increased; and, besides this, the bishops and clergy were allowed to receive legacies, and thus grew in wealth. It is also probably true that Constantine gave to Bishop Sylvester and his successors his own palace, the Lateran Palace, as the episcopal residence [see "Donation of Constantine" further on]. In his reign, too, was founded the New Rome, Constantinople, and from this time onwards the Old Rome knew comparatively little of her Emperors, whilst her bishops became more and more her most important public personages.

From early times the ecclesiastical had followed the lines of the civil divisions of the Empire, and thus the bishop of the capital city or metropolis of each province—with the title of metropolitan—had presided at synods of the bishops and clergy of the province, and had been looked upon, in Church affairs, as the representative of the province generally. Constantine made a new partition of the Empire into dioceses, each of which comprised several provinces. In the West the bishop of the chief city of a diocese received the title of primate, and was at the head of all the metropolitans within his limits, but without exercising their privileges. The most eminent of these primates were called patriarchs [of Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem]. The patriarchate of Rome included the seven provinces of Middle and Lower Italy, with Corsica, Sardinia, and Sicily; but in none of these had metropolitans yet been introduced, so that the Bishop of Rome exercised metropolitical functions—the consecration of bishops, the convocation of synods, the ultimate decision of appeals, and many other sorts of authority—throughout the whole patriarchate. This in no small degree tended to exalt the importance of the Roman See. The State acknowledgment of Christianity also gave the bishops of Rome political influence, since their opinions as support were sought after not only by other bishops, but by Emperors who wished to have their support in the religious controversies of the time.

The next great step in the building up the Papal power dates from the Council of Sardica [343], held at a town of that name Illyria, and summoned as a General Council of the Church by the Emperors of the East and West. Its object was to heal the divisions in the Church caused by the Arian heresy [Arius]; but as the Westerns go. Athanasius [q.v.] a seat and a voice at the Easterns separated themselves and elsewhere, so that the Council of Sardica had no longer a title to the name "General". Some of the Canons enacted gave a deposing bishop the privilege of appealing to the Bishop of Rome as a referee, not to decide the case himself, but to say whether there ought to be a new trial, in this case allowing him to se. Legates [LEGATE] to sit with the judges. These canons have been founded the claim to jurisdiction by the Bishop of Rome over the whole Church; and in the next century more than one Bishop of Rome referred to the Sardican Canons as Canons of the Council of Nicea, which had been held nearly twenty years earlier, and was recognised as Gene by the Universal Church. By such means in course of time, the appellate jurisdiction the Pope came to be more and more allowe
But beyond formal appeals, the practice arose of referring to Rome for advice in difficult matters in distant parts of the Church. Thus Sirecius, who was Bishop of Rome in 398, answered an application from Himerius, Bishop of Tarragona, in Spain, and his letter was the first genuine piece in the series of what are called Decretal Letters, or Epistles. At first these epistles were written in the name of Roman synods (i.e. bishops and clergy met for consultation), but afterwards they ran in the name of the Pope alone, and their tone gradually rose from one of brotherly advice to one of command.

In order that these views might be furthered, an occupant of the Roman See was wanted of marked ability, and one who was determined to promote the aggrandisement of his office. Such an one was Innocent I. (A.D. 402). He laid it down as a principle that all Churches ought to follow the usages of Rome, but apparently limiting the claim to those of the West — the Churches of Italy, the Gauls, the Spaniards, of Africa, Sicily, and the islands which lie between — on the plea that they had been founded by emissaries of St. Peter or his successors. This claim over daughter Churches was often cheerfully admitted to a large extent, as, later on, in the case of the Anglo-Saxon Church, which owed its organisation, though only partly its origin, to Roman missionaries, and which was a firm maintainer of the Papal Supremacy in legitimate matters. In like manner, in the Pelagian controversy [Pelagian controversy], Innocent said that the Fathers considered that nothing, in remote provinces, should be finally settled unless it came to the knowledge of the Roman See, so that the Roman decision might serve as a rule for all the Churches. The next Bishop, Zosimus, went on to declare the authority of the Apostolic See to be such that no one might dare to question its decisions, and that the successors of St. Peter inherit from him an authority equal to that which our Lord bestowed on the Apostle himself.

The election of Boniface I. [A.D. 418] was opposed by a rival named Balilarius. In consequence of this, the former applied to the Emperor Honorius for aid, and was by him established in his See. This intervention of Honorius, at the request of the Pope himself, appears to have laid the foundation for the influence which Emperors afterwards exercised in the election of the Popes, and directly to have added to the power of the latter.

The latter half of the fifth century was a critical one for the power of the Roman See. The Eastern Empire was declining, the Western Empire was tottering to its fall. Africa had already fallen a prey to the Vandals, and Sicily had suffered severely. Like the Empire, the Church was in evil case, from the many heresies rife within her Manichæans, Priscillianists, Pelagians, whilst outside she was assailed by the Arian powers of the barbarians. It was at this juncture that Leo I., or the Great, became Pope. He stands out as the Christian representative of the Imperial dignity and severity of old Rome, and is the true founder of the medieval Papacy in its uncompromising strength, representing strongly that one side of the developing life of the Church which is especially identified with Rome — authority and unity. St. Leo — for he is a saint of the Church — was a man lofty and severe in life and aims, a theologian, and a man of personal piety. He is the reputed inventor of the Collect form of prayer, and its "Roman brevity and majestic conciseness" are consonant with his character and the style of his writings. Notwithstanding his ambition and love of domination, we may not doubt that, in his exertions for the elevation of the Roman See, he believed himself to be labouring, not for its benefit only, but for the benefit of the whole Church. The man and the times suited one another. Leo boldly declared the pretensions and practices of the Roman Church to be matters of unbroken Apostolical tradition, and thus tried to enforce the usages of Rome on the whole Church. He represented the Sardican Canons as to appeals as Canons of the General Council of Nicaea, or perhaps adopted what was now the usual practice of Rome. The Vandals who conquered the province of Africa were Arians, and the hitherto independent African Church was now glad to submit to Leo's interference as the price of his support. A chance dispute amongst the bishops in Gaul was taken advantage of, when one of the bishops appealed to Rome against his metropolitan — the great and good Hilary of Arles — to lay down the declaration that Rome had always been accustomed to receive appeals from Gaul, and the Emperor Valentinian III. passed a law enforcing this view.

During Leo's pontificate arose the Eutychian controversy [Eutyches], which was settled at the General Council of Chalcedon A.D. 451. At this Council the Legates whom Leo sent to represent him sat as presidents of the clergy with Anatolius, Patriarch of Constantinople, and the practical adoption, though only after discussion, of Leo's tome, or letter to Flavian [Bishop of Constantinople], treating of the doctrine of our Lord's Incarnation, contributed greatly to raise the general opinion of the authority of the Bishop of Rome.

The claims of the Roman See were maintained during the next century and a half, but they made no great progress until the time of Gregory I., or the Great [590], a man of great personal piety, as well as an able ruler both in temporal as well as spiritual things. As the Emperor lived at Constantinople, and governed Italy by an Exarch, or lieutenant, at Ravenna, the country was practically left with very little defence against the Lombards, and Gregory had often to provide for the safety of the people, and to negotiate peace with the enemy. This led to a large increase in the temporal power of the Popes. Again, the Popes had gradually become great landowners. The "Patrimony of St. Peter," as the estates of the Roman See came to be called, were situated, not only in Italy, but in many distant countries. Gregory managed this property by agents, often in minor orders, and through them he communicated with the Churches and the Sovereigns of these various countries, and thus the Roman See gained a footing and influence wherever it possessed estates. From the time of Gregory onwards the authority of the bishops was more and more depressed by the Popes. Persons often only in minor orders were empowered, by a commission from the Pope, to set aside the rule of the bishops, and to deprive them of their rights. Gregory, moreover, brought himself into a closer connection with the Churches and Sovereigns of other countries by appointing certain bishops as his deputies or vicars, and as a mark of this commission he sent them the pallium. [PALLIUM.]

English people will always hold Gregory in reverent esteem for sending Augustine as a missionary to Kent.

The next event of considerable importance was the opposition of Pope Gregory II. to Leo III. [717], the Isaurian. This Emperor took strong objection to the worship of images which had sprung up, and by edicts ordered their destruction in all the Churches of the Empire. [ICONOCLAST.] The Emperor was reluctantly obeyed in the East, but the Pope refused to yield, and boldly armed against the enemy; finally, the Imperial fleet was destroyed at the mouth of the Po, and a synod was summoned in which the Iconoclasts were condemned. The Pope pursued his victory no further, but by moderate counsels preserved Italy outwardly to the Empire, whilst at the same time he greatly increased his own power.

In the pontificate of Zacharias [741] we have the first instance wherein the civil duties of a nation, and the rights of a crown, were submitted to the decision of a Pope. Pepin, the Mayor of the Palace under Childeric, the last of the Merovingians, asked Pope Zacharias whether the nation of the Franks should be ruled by the real or nominal holder of power. Zacharias decided in Pepin's favour. The question was merely a point of casuistry, laid before the first religious judge of the Church; but later Popes pretended that Zacharias had exercised a right belonging to his office and had deposed Childeric.

In the year 800, Charlemagne, the son of Pepin, was crowned in St. Peter's at Rome by Pope Leo III., with the Imperial title. Rome was grateful to her deliverer from the Lombards, an Emperor was needed, the Pope was the spokesman of the popular will as well as a consecrating priest, and hence Charles the Great was crowned; but on this event was founded the right, claimed afterwards by the Popes, of raising and deposing monarchs at their will.

Later than this, two great forgeries were put forth which greatly helped the Papal claims [1] The so-called "Donation of Constantine," which was believed to be true from 868 to the middle of the fifteenth century. It professed that Constantine had conferred on Pope Sylvester the right of wearing a golden crown, that he had endowed the Apostolic See with the Lateran Palace (this one thing was probably true), with the city of Rome and with all the provinces of Italy. And that in consequence of this Constantine had relinquished the ancient capital, and had built a new city for himself—Constantinople. Its pretended date was about 330. The fable was invented to give an ancient right to many things which had become matters of history more or less. [2] "The False Decretals." In the sixth century Dionysius Exiguus collected the Canons from the General, and the most famous Provincial, Councils, and to them he added the "Decretal" letters of the Popes, so that these latter were set forth as having the same weight as the Canons. His collection was generally received as a book of canon law in the West, except in Spain, where Isidore, Bishop of Seville [601–636], made a separate collection. About 840 another Isidore started the False Decretals under cover of the name of the great Isidore. They are skillful forgeries, and profess to be letters and decrees of Bishops of Rome going back to Apostolic days. Their aim is to exalt th hierarchy as a whole, asserting the rights of the clergy as a body against the oppressions of the Emperors; but they carry the Pope's power higher than it had ever been carried before, and since they found their way into the collections of the canon laws, and finally into the code of the Papacy, their influence was very strong, and, indeed, still exists now although the deception is admitted.

An example of the righteous use of the Papal power, and one which shows why the moral support of the civilised world was given to it, occurred in the Pontificate of Nicholas I. [858]. Lothair II., a vicious and contemptible prince, wished to obtain a divorce from his queen and marry another woman. Nicolas firmly opposed him, even deposing two French Metropolitans and annulling their decisions of a Frankish National Council because they favoured the divorce. These measures were novel and aggressive, but the rightfulness of the cause prevented their being questioned. From the eighth century onwards the Popes had granted special privileges to monastic bodies [MONK], by which they were exempted from all jurisdiction but that of th of the peace throughout Christendom. Thus he compelled the observance of peace between the Kings of Castile and Portugal by the threat of excommunication and interdict. [Excommunication; Interdict.] He enjoined the King of Arragon to restore his debased coin. By a general interdict enforced throughout France he compelled Philip Angustus—a powerful prince—to take back his wife whom he had repudiated; and England was not the only country which he converted into a spiritual fief. On the whole, Innocent was the greatest and most successful of the Popes. The times themselves were favourable to his ability and gifts, as well as to his pretensions. A strong, uncompromising power, exercised upon the whole on the side of God and of right, was needed, and Innocent exactly met the want.

The Popes were at the summit of their power during the thirteenth century. "Rome inspired during this age all the terror of her ancient name. She was once more the mistress of the world, and kings were her vassals." The Emperor Frederick II. had taken the sign of the Cross, by which he bound himself to serve in the Holy War of Palestine; but he considered himself at liberty to fulfil his vow at his own time, and on this account became embroiled with successive Popes. Innocent IV., at a Council at Lyons, 1245, declared him to be deposed, and this, and the proscription of Alexander IV., were the main causes of the ruin of his family. This is the most successful instance of the exercise of the power of deposing kings which history affords.

In 1294 Boniface VIII. became Pope, and endeavoured to carry out Hildebrand's idea of the Papacy, but the real power of the Roman See was beginning to wane. The first successes of the Crusades were being followed by failure and disasters; the Holy Land was being abandoned, and the preaching of a Holy War ceased to rouse men to enthusiasm. The high pretensions of the Canon Law were opposed by the revived study of the Roman civil law, which contained a lofty theory of imperial and secular power. Boniface quarrelled with Philip of France, who would not yield to him, and death only prevented the Pope from publishing a Bull of deposition against the King. Just after his death the Popes settled at Avignon, and came under the control of the sovereigns of France. [Papal Schism.] Next followed the Councils of Constance and Basel, and afterwards the movement of the Reformation, all tending to limit and cripple the Papal power.

No student of history can fail to see what an important part the Papacy played in the Middle Ages, nor can he fail to admit that, though deformed by many human imperfections, it was yet powerful for good, by opposing to the idea of mere brute force that of an unseen but mightier spiritual power, which, in a comparatively lawless age, did on the whole defend the innocent and weak and punish the guilty and strong.

But whilst freely admitting this, he can find no foundation either in Holy Scripture or in the page of history for the assertions of a celebrated Bull of Boniface VIII. ["Unam Sanctam"], one sentence from which appears to sum up the Papal claims: "More over we declare, affirm, define, and pronounce that it is altogether necessary for salvation that every human creature should be subject to the Roman Pontiff."

Papal Schism.—During the seventy years [see preceding article] in which the Popes resided at Avignon they became more or less the servants of the French sovereigns. Gregory XI. became Pope in 1370, and his pontificate was a series of disasters. Italy, deserted by the Popes, was in a deplorable condition: the ecclesiastical estates were oppressed by their governors; they revolted, and leagued themselves with the Florentines and Viscontis to throw off the Papal rule. Gregory therefore determined, urged thereto by the solicitations of St. Catharine of Siena [q.v.], to return to Rome and reside there, and he was received joyfully on Jan. 17th, 1377; but he found it no easy matter to rule over his neglected subjects, and was meditating a return to Avignon when his death—March 27th, 1378—prevented it. On his death began what is known as the Great Western Schism. Italy was not satisfied with the fact of having got her Pope back to Rome; during the long residence at Avignon the Cardinals had come to be all Frenchmen, and thus were completely under the power of the King of France. So when, after the funeral of Gregory, the Conclave met in St. Peter's to elect his successor, they were assailed by a tumultuous populace, demanding with threats that they should have a Roman, or at any rate an Italian, Pontiff. After many fierce discussions between the Cardinals, they were forced to yield to the demands of the people, and they chose Bartolomeo de Prignani, Archbishop of Bari; he took the name of Urban VI., and was crowned in St. John Lateran on Easter Day, April 15th, 1378. All the Cardinals were present, and thus gave a tacit consent to the legality of his election. But it was not long before they repented of their work. Urban proved to be a man of imprudent zeal, imperious, and of a most ungovernable temper. The Cardinals retired to Anagni, whence they communicated with those left at Avignon, and declared that the election of Urban, being compulsory, was illegal, and therefore might be considered as null and void. They then proceeded to elect another Pope, and chose Robert, Cardinal of Geneva, who took the name of Clement VII., and went to reside at Avignon. He was acknowledged Pope by France, Sicily, and the kingdoms of Spain. Urban refused to resign, and was acknowledged Pope by the rest of Europe. Thus there were two Popes and two sets of Cardinals, and endless division and dissension in the Church followed, the Pope and the Anti-Pope excommunicating and anathematising each other. It was agreed to refer the matter to a general council but then arose the difficulty as to under whom auspices it was to sit. Urban made successful war on Naples, and Clement, who was under its protection, was obliged to fly and seek safety at Avignon. He was not, however, so successful in his war with Charles of Durazzo, who besieged him at Nocera; and, suspecting treachery from some of his Cardinal Urban summoned them to Nocera on the plea of business, had six of the most learned and of best repute arrested and cast into a foul prison, and then put to torture. The Pope, with the help of Raimondello Orsini, escaped from Nocera to Genoa. He died in 1389. Clement VII., his rival, reigned at Avignon in comparative peace and dignity, and on Urban death he indulged hopes that Christendom would agree in acknowledging him as the legal Pontiff; but these were quickly dissipated, for the Italian Cardinals proceeded to elect as their new Pope, Pietro Tomacelli, a Neapolitan, who took the name of Boniface IX. His pontificate is remarkable for the growth of simony; but he was heavily pressed with debt, and the opposition Papal Court at Avignon was possessed of the Church revenues of France and Spain, which hitherto belonged to Rome, whilst the progress of Wycliffite doctrines curtailed his income from England. He therefore published a Bull by which he secured to himself the annates, or first fruits—equal to a year's revenue—on all vacant bishoprics and abbeys. Clement meantime surrounded himself with thirty-six cardinals, to whom he made grants of benefices before they were void, giving them possession as soon as they should vacant; this greatly irritated the Fren clergy, and they appealed to the King to matters settled between the two Popes. Clement died Sept. 16th, 1394, and the University of Paris adjured the King not to elect a new Pope; but the Cardinals, without awaiting the King's orders, proceeded to elect Spaniard, Pedro, Cardinal of Luna, under the name of Benedict XIII. He had pledged himself before election to do all in his power to heal the schism; but having got the pow he would not relinquish it, and the King France, having vainly sought to get him resign, together with Castile, renounced ob from him, and he was held a prisoner at Avignon, 1398. Boniface was equally ob nate in the matter of any compromise, remained at Rome, exercising his share dominion. Matters were thus at the close of the fourteenth century. For five ye Benedict XIII. remained a prisoner, when escaped by the help of Louis, King of Sicily, and once more France acknowledged him as Pope. Boniface died at Rome, Sept. 29th, 1404, and was succeeded by Cosnato Migliorato, who assumed the title of Innocent VII. His reign was troubled by quarrels of the Guelphs and Ghibellines, and on the success of the latter, under Ladislaus, King of Naples, he retired to Viterbo, but afterwards returned to Rome, only to die in 1406. The Roman Cardinals, before proceeding to elect his successor, took an oath that whoever might be elected Pope should at once renounce the popacy if his rival at Avignon could be made to do likewise. They elected Angelo Corrario, a Venetian by birth, who became Pope under the name of Gregory XII. The rivals now wrote to each other, expressing willingness to meet at Savona and remit the election of one sovereign pontiff to the two bodies of Cardinals; but the conference was evaded, and it became evident that nothing would be gained by the resignation of either of the rivals. The Cardinals then determined to assemble a general council at Pisa, to depose the two reigning Popes, and elect one in their room. The Council met on Lady Day, 1409; the Popes were denounced as guilty of perjury and heresy, and, on the 5th of June, the Patriarch of Alexandria read in the Cathedral of Pisa the sentence of their deposition. A harder task than deposing the two rivals now awaited the Cardinals—that of choosing as Pope one who should command universal respect. They elected Peter Philargi, of Canaia, of the order of Friar Minor, who took the name of Alexander V. There were now three Popes, for neither of the others thought of bowing to the decree of Pisa, and Benedict remained at Perpignan, with the allegiance of Spain, while Gregory went to Naples. Alexander irritated his clergy by a Bull in favour of the friars, by which he gave them power to hear confessions and grant absolution in any part of Christendom. After only ten months of pontificate Alexander V. died at Bologna, in 1410, and Balthasar Cossa was chosen Supreme Pontiff, with the name of John XXIII. He made war with Ladislaus, King of Sicily, in which he was worsted, and then made an alliance with the Emperor Sigismund, and agreed to convene a general council once more; the place of meeting chosen was Constance; it met in 1414, and was very largely attended. The Pope was received with every mark of loyalty; his retinue consisted of nine cardinals and about six hundred followers; the council was opened by him in person on November 5th, and adjourned to the 16th. The three principal objects for which this council had been summoned were:—[1] the union of the Church under one acknowledged Pope; [2] the reformation of the clergy in its head and in its members; and [3] the extirpation of erroneous and heretical doctrines. We have in the present article only to deal with the first of these. In spite of John's remonstrances, the Council decided to receive ambassadors from the two Anti-Popes; it was settled also that neither of the three Popes should preside in the council. The cession of John was loudly demanded, as the only means of securing peace to the Church, and his enemies proceeded to lay grievous accusations against him. At length, on March 1st, 1415, he publicly pronounced his abdication, on condition of the other two doing the same. But soon after, some difference arising between him and the Council, he fled to Schaffhausen, thence to Brissac, and so to Fribourg, where the Duke of Austria, who had declared himself his protector, treacherously made him a prisoner in his castle. Two deputies were sent from the Council to cite him to appear at Constance, and on his way there he was seized by the Emperor Sigismund and again imprisoned. Notwithstanding his remonstrances the Council solemnly deposed him, May 29th, 1415, and sentenced him to imprisonment; he was taken first to Heidelberg and afterwards to Mannheim. On July 4th, Gregory, by his proctor, Carlo Malatesta, made his renunciation in open council. Benedict still refused to submit, whereupon the Emperor Sigismund, accompanied by the Archbishop of Tours and thirteen deputies from the Council, went to Perpignan, but could not prevail on him to abdicate; so in 1417 he was deposed, and the Council proceeded to the election of a sole Pope. On Nov. 11th, 1417, they chose Otho Colonna, who took the name of Martin V. Gregory died soon after his cession, and John XXIII., on obtaining his liberty in 1419, acknowledged Martin to be head of the Church, and was in consequence made chief Cardinal, but he died six months after. There was now only the peninsula of Paniscola, in a corner of the kingdom of Arragon, which held out against the rest of Christendom, by the invincible obstinacy of Benedict, who chose to consider himself the only true Pope, till his death in 1424. Before his death he obliged his cardinals to elect another Pope in his room, who called himself Clement VIII.; but in 1429 the Kings of Arragon became reconciled to Martin V., and in the same year the pretended Pope made his abdication, and thus brought to an end the Great Western Schism. The Council of Constance had also been occupied with the Hussite War [Bohemia; Huss] and with Wycliffe [q.v.]; it was dissolved in 1418. Martin V. thus remained sole Pope; but he died very suddenly, just before the opening of the Council of Basle, in 1431. On his death the Cardinals erected themselves into a standing council, which was to be superior to the Pope, and they solemnly pledged themselves that whoever should be elected Pontiff should proceed to the reformation of the Roman Court. Their choice fell on the Cardinal of Siena, Gabriel Condolmieri, under the name of Eugenius IV. The Council of Basle held its first sitting July 23rd, 1431, and was presided over by the Cardinal Julian Cesarini, in place of the Pope, who did not choose to go beyond the Alps; but not liking that the council should be held without his immediate control, he sought to transfer it from Basle to Bologna. This was refused, and the Council set to work to make some salutary Church reforms. The question of the union of the Eastern and Western Churches was coming on, and the Pope, irritated by the defiance of the Council, insisted that it should be removed to some place in Italy. He was then summoned to appear before the Council of Basle; but this he refused, and, having declared their sitting to be illegal, he summoned another to assemble at Ferrara, which was afterwards removed to Florence, where he and his adherents discussed the question of unity with the deputies in opposition to the Council of Basle. [FERRARA, COUNCIL OF; FLORENCE, COUNCIL OF.] The Council of Basle now proceeded to denounce Eugenius as a disturber of the peace and unity of the Church, and on May 26th they declared him to be deposed from the pontificate, and absolved all Christians from their oaths of fidelity to him, and they chose as their new Pope, Amadeus of Savoy, with the name of Felix V. He was crowned at Basle, June 24th, 1440. Eugenius was, of course, furious, and refused to accept the sentence of deposition, so once more Christendom was divided by a schism, not only between the Pope and the Anti-Pope, but between two rival Councils. It did not, however, last long. Eugenius died in 1447, and was succeeded by Thomas of Sarzana, Cardinal of Bologna, under the title of Nicholas V. He was a learned man, singularly active and conciliatory, and soon became very popular. In 1449 Felix resigned his dignity, with the consent of the Council of Basle, and Nicholas was acknowledged as sole Pontiff. The Council of Basle dispersed in the same year.

Paphnutius, St., was born about the year 270 in Egypt, spent the first years of his life under the direction of St. Anthony in the desert, and afterwards became Bishop in the upper Thebaid, but the name of the See is not known. During the Diocletian persecution he lost an eye, and was sent to work in the mines, but returned to his people at the accession of Constantine the Great. He was present at the Council of Nicea, and opposed the proposal that bishops, priests, deacons, and sub-deacons who had married before their ordination should be separated from their wives. He was also present at the Councils of Tyre and Sardis in 335 and 347. He is supposed to have died about 350.

Papias.—Bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia [b. about a.d. 70, d. probably before 160]. Nothing is known of his life or works beyond the accounts of his writings given by Ireneus and Eusebius. Ireneus says of him that he was a disciple of St. John and the companion of Polycarp; but Eusebius questions the Papian wrote an Interpretation of the Sayings of the Lord about 130, all of which he lost, except some fragments quoted by the Fathers already mentioned. Eusebius alludes to the strange stories of the Apostles as of Christ's life and sayings, told by Papias and says of him that he was learned and well acquainted with the Scriptures, though no passage he describes him as too apt put faith in traditions. Papias seems to have believed that the future millennium was to be the return of Christ in fleshy form to earth, that the words of prophecy were to be taken in a literal sense. He relates the interpretation of Christ's sayings many things which he believes that he had received from a written tradition, among which are the instructions of our Lord to the Apostles.

Parabollani [lit. "those who expel themselves?"]—One of the minor orders of clergy, on whom was specially laid the duty of visiting the sick and attending to the wants. They derived their name from being the very people who exposed their lives to danger when ministering to the sick in cases of infectious illness.

Paracelsus, Philippus Aureolus Theophrastus Bombastus, was born at Einsiedeln near Zurich, in 1493. He received little learning in his youth, but early took to a wandering life, and travelled over all Europe, a several parts of Asia and Africa, everywhere picking up information, and especially studying chemistry. The most valuable acquisition he made was an acquaintance with meta chemistry, by which he is said to have had thirteen princes, whose cases had been declared hopeless, before he was 33. He became famous, and in 1526, at the recommendation of Aëcolampadius, was Professor of Medicine and Natural Philosophy at Basle, whence, however, after two years, he was ejected on the charge of quackery. He again took to a wandering life, and died at Salzb in 1541.

Paracelsus was a strong Cabalist, and the doctrines of internal illumination as emanation from the Deity, the unity of all things, the influence of stars of the sublunar world, and the vital of the elements.

Paraclete. [Holy Ghost.]

Paradise, from a Hebrew word signifying a park, and in the LXX. used for garden of Eden, in which Adam and Eve were placed. In the later Jewish theology was adopted as meaning that part of Hades which the souls of the faithful were placed after death, and in this sense it has been adopted by the Church, following our Lord.
words to the dying thief, "To-day thou shalt be with Mo in Paradise." It is also used by St. Paul as meaning heaven, or a part of heaven.

Paradise or Parvis.—A court of a church or monastery surrounded with cloisters. Also the porch of the church.

Paranymphs.—Those who attended the bridegroom and bride on their wedding day. The Jews and Greeks had such persons, and in the Fourth Council of Carthage [398] it was agreed that the bride and bridegroom should be conveyed by their relations or bridesmen to receive the priest's blessing. The term "paranymph" was also used by the Faculty of Divinity in Paris at the ceremony of giving the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, or the orator whose duty it was to make a peech in commendation of those admitted to that degree.

Paraphrase.—An explanation of some ext in clearer terms, to elucidate to the reader the author's meaning. Paraphrases of the Bible were made in very early times, the first being the Targum [q.v.], the Chaldaic paraphrase of the Pentateuch, written by various authors at different times. Paraphrases were also written on the Prophets and the thor books of the Old Testament, besides the Pentateuch, though it has been believed by some that the earliest paraphrases were abulous.

Paratorium.—The prothesis, or credenoe able. It was so called because the elements were prepared for the Holy Eucharist out of the offerings there received.

Pardose.—A screen or railing, either of pen work or close, for separating a chapel from the rest of a church, for surrounding a tomb, or for any similar purpose.

Pardon.—The act of forgiving an offender removing the guilt of sin, that the punishment due to it may not be inflicted. Of the nature of pardon, it may be observed that ciprih represents it by various phrases: "a taking up or taking away;" "a blotting out of n, "an act of grace, etc. The author or cause of pardon is not any creature, angel or man, but God. Ministers are said to remit deparatively but not authoritatively; that is, they preach and declare that there is remission of sins in Christ, but they cannot pretend to resolve men. There is nothing that man has, can do, by which pardon can be procured: each cannot buy pardon; human works cannot merit it; nor can water-baptism wash away sin. It is the prerogative of God alone to forgive; the first cause of which is His own sovereign grace and mercy. The meri-ious cause is the Blood of Christ. Pardon sin and justification are considered by some the same thing, and it must be confessed that there is a close connection; in many parts they agree, and it is without doubt that every sinner who shall be found pardoned at the Great Day will likewise be justified; yet they have been distinguished thus: [1] An innocent person, when falsely accused and acquitted, is justified but not pardoned; and a criminal may be pardoned, though he cannot be justified or declared innocent. Pardon is of men that are sinners, and who remain such, though pardoned sinners; but justification is a pronouncing persons righteous, as if they had never sinned. [2] Pardon frees from punishment, but does not entitle to everlasting life; but justification does. If we were only pardoned, we should, indeed, escape the pains of hell, but could have no claim to the joys of heaven; for these are more than the most perfect works of man could merit, therefore they must be what the Scripture declares "the gift of God." After all, however, though these two may be distinguished, yet they cannot be separated; and in reality one is not prior to the other; for he that is pardoned by the death of Christ, is at the same time justified by His life.

Pardons. [INDULGENCES.]

Paris, Matthew op. [Matthew Paris.]

Parish [Gr. paraikia, "a sojourning"][—]. The portion of land under the spiritual control of a priest. The name was originally applied to the sojourning of the Jews in Egypt, and was thence transferred to the communities of Christians dwelling among strangers at Rome or elsewhere. The credit of introducing the system into England is generally ascribed to Theodore of Tarsus, Archbishop of Canterbury from 668 to 690, though others think that the parish is simply the old "township" of the early Teutons [see Green's Hist., vol. i. p. 8]. However this may be, Theodore certainly laid the foundation of the ecclesiastical parish, by introducing the princi-ple of patronage which had been laid down in the East by Justinian's laws of 541 and 513, according the rights of patronage to the founders of churches and their heirs. The system of parishes was used after the organi-isation of the Church in England to denote the territory governed by a bishop, and consist-ting of several churches or churches dependent upon the mother church of the diocese. At first the mother churches were distinguished from others by containing baptistries, in which the Sacrament of baptism was adminis-tered at stated times with elaborate cere-monial; the baptismal churches were each in the care of an archdeacon, who held a position somewhat resembling that now held by a rural dean. In course of time, as the number of baptismal churches increased, presbyters were appointed to the charge of each, and were entitled to receive tithes. We find that land was now divided into districts corresponding to "hundreds" in charge of the presbyters, and in larger divisions corresponding to our counties, in charge of the bishops. With the increase of population came the necessity for increasing the number of churches and chapels. In Queen Anne's reign an Act was passed for building fifty new churches, to which parishes were to be allotted, in London. And occasionally local Acts were passed for the division of large parishes. But it was not until 1818 that the first Church Building Act was made. That Act provided that a parish might be divided either into distinct parishes, or into districts, or into chapelries. The arrangement was under the control of the Church Building Commissioners [q.v.]. They were empowered, with the consent of the bishop, to apply to the patron for his consent to the division. The boundaries were to be marked out, and might be altered from time to time by Order in Council. Glebe, tithe, and other endowments might be apportioned with the consent of the bishop and patron. Other Acts were passed in 1831 and in 1846. The latter provided for the making new parishes through the agency of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who are empowered to provide for the stipends of the new incumbents by alienating fees and other endowments. In cases where the income of a new parish is below a certain sum, the advowson may be obtained by private trustees on their finding a sufficient sum to raise the permanent income. When a new parish is formed out of an old one, the inhabitants for all ecclesiastical purposes belong to the new parish, and have no right to seats in the old parish church. But they have a right to vote for churchwardens of the mother church.

Parish Books.—Documents belonging to a parish, kept by the churchwardens or clerk, in which all matters relating to parish affairs are recorded, as well as notices of services, registers, and church accounts.

Parish Clerk.—The lowest officer of the church, of whom there is one in every parish. The clerks were formerly really clergymen in minor orders, who assisted the officiating priests, but are now laymen. Their duties are to lead the responses, be present at all christenings, marriages, and funerals, etc. They are generally appointed by the minister, except in some places where it is a custom for the parishioners or churchwardens to appoint them. After being appointed they are licensed by the ordinary, and are sworn to obey the minister.

—A learned writer on church architecture, as well as an active controversialist in ecclesiastical questions. He entered into a discussion with Lord Selborne as to the binding character of the Advertisements [q.v.]. His manuals of Gothic architecture are probably the best in the language.

Parker, Matthew, Archbishop of Canterbury [b. at Norwich, 1504; d. at Lambeth, 1575]. He studied at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, of which he was made Fellow in 1527, and afterwards devoted himself for some time to the study of Church history and theology. The result was his declaring himself in 1533, in a sermon preached before the University, to have accepted the Reformed doctrines. He became Chaplain to Anne Boleyn, Master of Corpus Christi College in 1544, and in the following year Vice-Chancellor; on the accession of Edward VI. he was also presented to the Deanery of Lincoln, but lost this and all his other appointments when Mary became Queen. Her death took place within a few hours of that of Reginald Pole, Archbishop of Canterbury, and the new Queen, Elizabeth, nominated Parker as Pole's successor, moved, no doubt, not only by the sense of his moderation between extremes, but also by the remembrance of the relation in which he had stood to her mother.

His consecration, which took place on Dec 17th, 1559, became the subject of a strange fable, known as the Nag's Head Consecration, which was an invention of the Romanists, set forth for the purpose of discrediting his consecration, and thereby invalidating the orders of the Church of England. This story has long since been abundantly refuted and has been given up by the best authorities among the Romanists; it was as follows—The Queen issued her warrant, directed to the Bishop of Llandaff; to Dr. Scory, elec. of Hereford; Dr. Barlow, elect of Chichester; Dr. Coverdale, elect of Exeter; and Dr. Hodgkins, Suffragan of Bedford. A these persons met at the Nag's Head Tavern in Cheapside, where it was usual for the Des of the Arches, and the civilians, to refree themselves after the confirmation of a bishop in Bow Church; and there Neale, who was Chaplain to Bonner, peeped through a hole in the door, and saw all the other Bishops in portuning Llandaff, who had been dissuaded by Bonner from assisting in this consecration. As he obstinately refused their request, D. Scory bid the rest kneel down, and, laying the Bible on each of their shoulders at heads, he pronounced the words, "Take the authority, etc." and so they all stood bishops. The Romanists asserted that the consecration was irregular, both as to the place where it was performed and as to the manner of doing it; they also objected that three of the four bishops present were only bishops elect, and that the other was a suffragan. The story could not have been invented after the Queen's reign, for, had it been true, doubtless some of the writers of the time would have noticed it. Bishop Burnet discovered the falsity of the story from an original manuscript attached to Parker's registers, showing that the consecration took place in Lambeth Palace Chapel, on Sunda.
dec. 17th, 1559, where Dr. Parker came at no o’clock in the morning, in a scarlet gown and hood, attended by the said four bishops, ad lighted by four torches, and there, after prayers, Dr. Scory preached, and then the other bishops presented the Archbishop to him, at the mandate for his consecration being ad by a doctor of the civil law, and he having taken the oaths of supremacy, according to the den of consecration then lately published, all the four bishops laid their hands on his head and said, "Receive the Holy Ghost," etc. Several other clergy were also present.

The arduous duty fell to him of reconciling conflicting elements in the Church, a duty which the Queen’s capricious nature made the more difficult. Under him the Act of Uniformity was carried into execution, and he wrote the Advertisements [q.v.], regulating the subjects of the clergy’s sermons, under Elizabeth’s directions. Archbishop Parker did much to promote the study of antiquities by amending the Antiquarian Society, and rescuing from the ruins of the monasteries many valuable records, with which he enriched the libraries of Corpus Christi and other colleges Oxford. He also published the Chronicles of Matthew Paris, Thomas Walsingham, and others. He was buried in Lambeth Chapel. The Puritans, who declared that by enforcing uniformity he promoted schism in the church, dragged his bones from the grave, threw them on a dung-hill. They were placed in the Chapel after the Restoration, but a small stone covers them, on which is cribed: Tandem hic requiescit corpus Matthei Parker, Archi.

Parker, Samuel, Bishop of Oxford, was born at Northampton in 1640, and educated at Harvard College, Oxford, whence he removed to Trinity. In 1663 he became a F.R.S., and published Tentamina Physico-Theologica de a, which so pleased Archbishop Sheldon that he made him one of his Chaplains [1667], and preferred him to the Archdeaconry of Canterbury [1670], and to a prebendal stall in that cathedral [1672]. In 1686 he was consecrated Bishop of Oxford, and afterwards made President of Magdalene College by James II. He died in March, 1687. It has been asserted that he was a Romanist. Bishop Parker was a good scholar, and wrote several subjects. Among his works are

- The Nature of Divine Goodness, A Defence of Rational Police against Dr. Owen, A Vindication of Bishop Bramhall from the Fanatical Charge of Popery, The Case of the Church of England Stated, Religion and Loyalty, etc.

Parker, Theodore, American Unitarian [1810, d. 1860]. He was educated in the Unitarian faith by his parents, who were himself middle-class persons, and they intended it for the ministry of their communion. He worked intensely, graduated at the Divinity School at Harvard with high honours, and became minister of a church at Boston. His Unitarian brethren soon found that he was leaving the conservative line of such men as Channing, and was being moved along in the direction of freethought, and they drew apart from him. This grew to an open breach when, in 1841, he published a sermon in which he treated the Gospel miracles as either myths or exaggerations. The result of the controversy which arose was that he left the Unitarian body with a large following, who established themselves under him as an independent congregation [1845]. His congregations were large, and his influence, from his manifest zeal for philanthropy and social reforms, was very wide. His testimony against slavery had great power in its abolition. He was a prolific writer, and his sermons are devout, earnest, and thoughtful. His works, comprising, besides these and other discourses, reviews, criticisms, and speeches, were published in London in twelve volumes, 1863–1865. He also published a translation of Do Wette’s Introduction to the Old Testament.

His health failing, he came to Europe for change, but died at Florence.

Parker’s position with respect to the Bible miracles, as indicated in his works, can hardly be said to deny them. "Non-proven" would perhaps express his view: they are improbable, and the evidence insufficient, but cannot be called impossible. The truth of Christ’s moral teaching, nay, even His Divinity, in a sense unapproached by any other human personality, were evidenced by the sanctity of His life. Legends gradually grew round the beauty of His figure in the history; these being dropped, a true biography remains. Parker’s faith in a personal God who governs the soul and the daily life of man, to whom prayer can be made, and who will answer it, seems not to have wavered. His private papers contain many direct and most earnest petitions to God. The Bible, according to him, is inspired, not in the sense of a revelation, but as calling forth in man the latent inspiration which is in him, and leading him to discern the truth which is given to every man, but which, but for such quickening, lies hidden.

Parkhurst, John, Biblical Lexicographer [b. 1728, d. 1797], born at Catesby Abbey, Northamptonshire, died at Epsom. He took orders in the Church of England, but soon retired on his means, and betook himself to Biblical study. He first published his Hebrew Lexicon without Points [1762], and followed it by his Greek Lexicon in 1769. He was a partisan of the Hutchinsonian school, and this largely affected the value of his work. The peculiar opinions of that school led him to attach great value to etymological researches, and his own in the Greek are in the highest degree fanciful. But in spite of their faults, the learning and industry of Parkhurst, no less than his piety, gave a real value to his books, and the edition revised by the late Hugh J. Rose, and first published in 1829, is a book of enduring worth, though other works have largely superseded it.

Parochial Boards have been put forward as one of the needs of Church Reform. One scheme, that of Mr. Albert Grey, as spokesman of the Church Reform Union, was to leave each parish to choose its board—all ratepayers having a vote—which should regulate the hours of service, the ritual, and the choice of hymn-books, all subject to the veto of the Bishop. Another recommendation was that the Board should consist of communicants only. The Committee of the Upper House of Convocation on the subject reported as follows:—

"While we give full weight to the desire that has been expressed for the admission of the faithful laity of the Church, of all classes, to a substantial share in the control of Church affairs, we still feel that we require to be more fully informed as to the extent to which it is deemed to be desirable that the laity should share in the administration of the affairs of the Church. We look for valuable information and assistance in this, as in other matters, from the newly-constituted House of Laymen.

"Meanwhile we recommend the formation of voluntary parochial boards or councils, which, we are all well aware, have been recommended in many dioceses, and have been in operation in many parishes. It is otherwise as regards parochial boards or councils with defined statutory powers. The formation of these we cannot, as at present advised, recommend, until the principles on which they are to be founded shall have been fully considered by the Synods of the Church, and shall have received their general approval.

"It must always be remembered that parochial boards, however constituted, can only properly be regarded as a portion of a still further development of conciliar Church government. But this development can only be brought about by degrees, and by the steady progress of organised growth."

Parochial.-- A book of occasional offices for parish priests.

Parsees.—Parseeism was the religion of Iran or Persia. Its origin is wrapped in obscurity; even the date of Zoroaster, or Zarathustra, is fixed variously between 503 or 600 B.C. and 1200 B.C. The fundamental doctrines probably were formed 2,000 years B.C., whilst Persians and Hindoos were still one nation, and before the Veda existed, which is generally fixed at 1,500 years B.C. The first historic record is found in the arrow-head inscriptions of about 516 B.C., in which Darius IIystasipes figures as a disciple of the prophet, and ascribes his victories to Ormuzd. At the present time there is but a small congregation of Parsees living in Yemen and Kirman, the rest have emigrated. There are many points of similarity to be found in the Jews and Parsees: both are monotheists, both are exiles, and both are followers of an ancient sacred law.

The book which contains their creed is called Avesta, which comes from the same root as yada—"to know," and thus mean "law and revelation." It is sometimes improperly called Zend-Avesta; Zend means "commentary" or "glossary," which accompanied each part of the book as a help to the understanding. The Avesta was not the word of only one man or time; some of it is said to date back to between the seventh and fourth centuries before Christ, and some as late as the fourth century after. It is divided into the Ysma, which includes five gathas, or hymn written in a dialect resembling Vedic Sanser and probably, very ancient; the Vendida which means "given against the demons," an contains the laws; the Visparad, meaning "chiefs," a collection of prayers; and other sections with special prayers. The Avesta doctrine came to Persia through Media by the Me-—some of that race who were the first Gentiles to worship the infant Saviour. It became the ruling religion of Persia in A.D. 226 under Ardesch, the first Sassanid monarch, and remained so till 642, when the Persian kingdom came to an end. Then many Persians accepted the Koran; yet a small remnant remained, and were the progenitors of the modern community of Indian Parsees. Son went to India, in 716, and settled in the northern part.

Besides being monothestic, Parseeism dualistic. It teaches the existence of two principles, always at war with each other—light and darkness, good and evil—under the names of Ormuzd or Ahura-Mazda, as Ahriman. These two were supposed to be living in different parts of the universe within immense space separating them, till, by becoming aware of the existence of the other, a fierce war was waged between them. Ormuz commencing creating spirits suitable to his purposes against his enemy, and then Ahrim created evil spirits to counteract their influence. Ormuz next made the stars a planets, and when the earth was finished placed it between himself and Ahriman; the latter bored a hole through the earth and placed some of his bad spirits on it. Hence forth the earth became the arena of the struggle between good and evil. Zoroast was then created by Ormuzd to oppose Ahriman. The struggle is to last for 12,000 years. Each man is to live his allotted time on the earth, there to determine his ultimate happiness; for the Parsees believe in the resurrection of the dead, and in a state of fit blessedness. Fifty-seven years before the end of the world—which is to be brought about collision with a comet—Sôshyans, of rect seed of Zoroaster, will appear, and spare the dead for the new life to begin. Sins will be forgiven, and the blessed will live three days in molten lead. Ahraman will vanish for ever.
The Parsees are worshippers of fire; their red-altar-fire is never allowed to go out, and is fed chiefly with sandal-wood; their mystic fire is also sacred. They never speak of it, and are very particular about bodily defilement: contact with a dead body is the greatest source of defilement, and needs special forms of purification. Their corpses exposed to the food of vultures on a "tuma," or "tower of silence," and then the ashes only fall into a pit below; to inter a body is punishable by death. The priest was formerly confined to one family, is now so limited. Their service is varied thus: first, hymns and offering of sacrifices, which consist of small cakes and milk, the juice of a plant said to be very actual against evil spirits; secondly, hymns, 1 reading of parts of the Vedâd; and an hymn of hymns and prayers. The young novice becomes a member of the congregation at the age of seven, when, with sunry ceremonies, he or she is invested with a woollen dress, called a "kusti," or sacred girdle, which is never taken off, and impies irrevocable consecration to the faith of Zoroaster. Marriage is looked on as a very sacred tie, and is contracted between persons of the nearest degree. The Parsees never make converts. They have translated the Vedâd into the Gujerati, which, since their settlement in India, has been their mother tongue.
From the seventeenth century the Parsees have been the middle-men in India between English, French, and other European nations and their native customers. In 1881, of 100,000 reshippers of Zoroaster, one half were found to be in Bombay, which largely owes its prosperity to them. They are great promoters of education, and have English taught in all their schools; they have done much towards male enfranchisement. They are extremely amiable, and very loyal to the British crown.
In 1771 Anquetil Duperron published a French translation of the Avesta, and Professor Max Muller has edited the translation The Sacred Books of the East.
Parson [from Lat. persona].—The incumbent of a parish church. So called because he represents the church and parish, and in the law of the church is the chief person thereof. In action touching the same he would be a person to sue or be sued.
Parsonage.—Strictly speaking a parish church, with the house and land belonging to it but generally used to denote the house pointed for the residence of the incumbent, belonging to the church. The residences of the clergy have gone through many changes, undoubtedly, before attaining their present substantially equal character. In the Middle Ages many churches were served from neighbouring monasteries; in such case the priest walked over each day, entered the chancel by the priest's door, took the vestments, books, vessels, etc., out of the ambries, and having robed himself in the presence of the congregation, began the service. If the distance was greater, he passed the night in the church, so as to be ready for the morning service. The "parvis," or room over the porch, which is found so often in old churches, was fitted as a priest's chamber. Sometimes he had a lodging in the tower, and occasionally the room which was so used is found in old churches with its fireplace still remaining. In this Parson's Room were generally stored the records of the manorial courts—documents of no small importance, inasmuch as they included evidence of land transfers; the only evidence indeed forthcoming in a simple state of society, when elaborate conveyancing was unknown.
In consequence of the clergy being celibate, and their frequent residence within the walls of the religious houses, very few specimens indeed remain of mediaeval parsonages. Those that still exist have been so altered that nothing can be known accurately about their original character. In all cases they were, no doubt, small and lowly. The wealth of the Church was stored in the monasteries. And yet the parson was styled "Sir." In the parish church of Margate are basins of two priests of the fifteenth century who are styled "Sir Thomas Smyth" and "Sir Thomas Cardyff." That the country priests were poor and lowly appears from Chaucer's account of the Parson in his "Prologue," and in the town we have just named records show that the parson of the parish church held a much lower social position than the "Prior of Salmestone," a religious house within the parish. Some mediaeval parsonages in the border counties were constructed with walls suitable for the enclosure of cattle, and intended for them to be driven into on the outbreak of one of the frequent border frays.
For some time after the Reformation the parsonages seem to have been still humble dwellings. The vicious habit of non-residence did not tend to improve them. The pluralist rector who lived at his canony or in their fattest parsonages, and left the rest to their poor curates, could not but contribute to the depression of the social condition of the clergy as a body. Lord Macaulay's famous description of the "Levites" of the days of Charles II. is, no doubt, an exaggeration if applied to the whole body. There was no lack of learning as well as of moral worth even in the darkest days, but as a rule it would seem that the resident clergy were of humble rank and manners. Goldsmith's View of Wakefield is very popular with us all. And if it be objected to him on one hand that he is far behind his successors of these days in social condition, it may be said on the other that he is of simpler tastes. Just the same thing may be said of the country gentry or the country shopkeepers. We have all moved on since the days of Dr. Primrose. What may be regarded as still more remarkable is that all through the charming story there is not a hint anywhere of any sort of parochial ministration. The country parsonage has certainly become more of a parish rendezvous since then. Even down to the present century it was considered out of the question that a clergyman of good family should live among his people. The law of the present day requires residence; the incomes of the clergy are more equalised, and a far larger number have a competence. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have done much to provide residences by making grants from the funds at their disposal for the purpose.

Partial Indulgence, in the Roman Church, is the remission of only a part of the punishment due to forgiven sins. An indulgence granted as plenary will, if there be an obstacle to its full effect, be only partially obtained. [Indulgences; Plenary Indulgences.]

Partibus, Bishops in.—A title given to bishops holding foreign titles, who have been employed on special duties in England. Sometimes they served monasteries which were exempt from diocesan jurisdiction, sometimes they were consecrated for the help of infirm diocesans. Cnut, and his successors, introduced Danish bishops for their own countrymen. Bishop Stubbs gives a list of not less than sixty-two Irish bishops who acted as suffragans of English dioceses. There are bishops named in the same learned and valuable work as assisting at English consecrations and exercising other functions, of Damascus, of Laudicea, of Corbavia (in Dalmatia), of Saris, of Scutari, of Nazareth, etc., etc. [Stubbs's Registrum, pp. 142-149.]

During the great Papal Schism the rival parties had bishops, and some of these occur in the records of episcopal work in England. After the Reformation it became unlawful for any Roman Catholic bishop to hold any English territorial title, and consequently these prelates became "bishops in partibus." Thus Dr. Wiseman, who had charge of London, etc., was known as "Bishop of Melitopatamus in partibus infidelium." The event known as the Papal Aggression in 1850 was the reconstitution of England by the Pope into new sees, when Dr. Wiseman was appointed Archbishop of Westminster. The Ecclesiastical Titles Bill was passed, making it penal to use this title, but it has since been repealed, and, therefore, the Roman bishops are no longer called bishops in partibus.

Pasagians.—A sect which appeared in Lombardy towards the close of the twelfth century, and which grew out of a mixture of Judaism and Christianity. They continued to observe the whole of the Mosaic Law except the sacrifices, and denied the equality of the Trinity. They were also sometimes called Circumcisi. The name "pasagians" is derived either from passagier, "birds of passage, from the wandering life they led; or from pasagium, "journey," a word which was often used to designate pilgrimages to the Holy Sepulchre, and more particularly the Crusade.

Pascal, Blaise [b. 1623, d. 1662], born at Clermont, in Auvergne, the son of Stephen Pascal, of an old and distinguished family. If father had four children, of whom only Blai and two sisters grew to maturity. One sister survived to write her brother's life, the other took the veil in the convent of Port Royal. Their mother dying in 1626, Stephen gave up his offices in Auvergne and went to live at Paris, where he spent his time in carefully educating his children. It was time of much fermentation of thought, time of transition from the old philosophy to the new. Bacon died the same year as your Pascal's mother. His Novum Organum, published six years before, was no less than an epoch in the history of science. Mathematicals and natural philosophy were cultivated in Italy, England, and France. Stephen Pascal became a mathematician, and cultivated the society of the ablest men in Parisian society: they met in each other's houses, and opened correspondence with other philosophers, who kept abreast of all discoveries which we were being made in physics. This was the origin of the Academy of Sciences in 1666.

Young Pascal used to attend these conferences, and to listen eagerly. When on eleven years old he wrote a treatise on sound in which he sought to explain why a plucked string with a knife gives forth a sound while a touch of the hand stops. His father feared that this taste might interfere with his studies of languages, and decided that mathematics should not form the subject of conversation when his friends came. Blaise was in such grief that his father promised him that if he had learned Greek and Latin he would teach him geometry, telling him general that it comprised the measurement of bodies in length, breadth, and thickness, and teaching him to make them in a just and precise manner. Meditating on these definitions toy, by comparing the position of lines, as inventing a nomenclature of his own, for knew not the names of the figures which secretly drew on the floor, arrived at many truths enunciated by Euclid. One day I father surprised him just as he had, by unaided study, arrived at the discovery that the three angles of a triangle are equal.
o right angles. In delight he resolved to row no more obstacles in his way, and gave up a Euclid, which he very soon mastered, and was recognised as a worthy member of a council of savants. By this time he was twenty; he had written a treatise on conic sections, which excited the admiration of the great Des Cartes, and from that time onwards continued to make astonishing progress.

But about the year 1647, while living at Seine, whither his father had removed six years before, Pascal began to be deeply moved by religious anxieties. He felt that intellectual pursuits did not satisfy his soul's needs, that without communion with the finite the soul cannot find peace. A friend introduced him to the works of Arnauld [Puritans], and from that time Christianity, which had been little in his thoughts, became an intense reality to him, and he succeeded in converting his father and others to his own views and principles. In 52 his father died; one sister was already married, and the other, Jacqueline, went to St. Royal, and Pascal returned to Paris, where he gave himself to his studies, but health, always feeble, quite broke down, and his physicians forbade him to continue on. The result was that he gave himself society and amusements, to the grief of his sister Jacqueline, who entreated him to withdraw from the world. So far from acquiescing in this change of life he returned, with others, to the Seine from unwary carriage was accepted by him as a warning to turn from the world. From that day he sought the close friendship of those who were connected with the Abbey of Port Royal, and later, at the height of his fame. The publication in 1656, by Arnauld, of two treatises in favour of Jansen [Jansenists] incurred the rage of the Jesuits against him, and they moved for his expulsion from the house. While the case was pending Pascal wrote the first of his Provincial Letters, his friend's defence. It was so well written that he wrote the rest, eighteen in all.

Their popularity was amazing; full of and irony, yet of reverence and eloquence, it was said of them, "They are models of quenelle and pleasantness. The best comedies Molieres have not more fun, Bossuet is not so sublime."

This was Pascal's last complete work. He dictated an apologetic treatise on Christianity, but his physical sufferings were so trying that he was only able to jot down in time to time on coruscating pieces of paper thoughts which he intended to elaborate into a treatise. He was writing at night, and his head was in a trance. He had written his brilliant Provincial Letters and the date of his death his jotted notes were published under the title of Thoughts.

Pascal Controversies [Gr. pascha, "passover"].—These were controversies which arose in the middle of the second century on the question of the proper date for keeping Easter. The term "pascha," was in the first ages of the Church applied to the anniversary of the Resurrection of Christ, and the first day of the month of Nisan, the date of the Jewish Passover; and three days later they kept Easter, regardless of what day of the week it fell upon. The practice of Rome, and of the majority of the Churches, was to keep the Easter on the Sunday, and the Paschal Supper on its eve. The former custom—called the "quartodeciman," from its being kept on the fourteenth day—was always to keep Easter on the Sunday, and the Paschal Supper on its eve. The former custom was rejected by the "quartodeciman," and the latter by St. Peter and St. Paul. About the year 158 Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, visited Anicetus, Bishop of Rome, and discussed this question with him in a friendly spirit; the result was that it was agreed that a difference of practice was allowable on this point. But about the year 196, Victor, Bishop of Rome, sought to enforce uniformity of practice, by threatening to cut off communion with the Asiatic Churches unless they submitted to the Western custom. His efforts, however, were doomed to failure. Polycrates, Bishop of Ephebus, writing on behalf of the Asiatics, refused to yield to Victor, and when the latter sought to cut off so large a body of people from Christian communion he was opposed by many Western bishops, among others by Irenaeus, Bishop of Lyons. In 314 the Council of Arles decreed that Easter should in all places be kept "on one day, and at one time;" but the Council had no jurisdiction in the East, and therefore did not affect the Asiatics. But in the Council of Nicea the bishops from Asia Minor consented to conform to the Western and more general custom of keeping Easter; and although individual congregations resisted this surrender, yet the controversy was then at an end, and by the sixth century all traces of the Quartodecimans had disappeared.

Paschal Festival, or Easter, observed in commemoration of the Resurrection of our Lord, is regarded as the chief among the great festivals of the Church. From primitive times it has been the occasion of great rejoicing. Some ancient writers give to Easter Sunday the name of Dominica gaudii, "the Lord's day of joy." Public games and shows were interdicted in order that the festival might be generally celebrated with rejoicings of a religious character. Easter was the most usual time for the administration of baptism; and while this was administered with peculiar solemnity, the other offices and rites of the Church were celebrated with special manifestations of joyfulness and praise. The general joy was further increased by the custom of releasing from prison all except the worst offenders, and also by the choice made of this season as a suitable one in which to give freedom to slaves, and to do special acts of kindness and liberality to the poor.

Paschal II. was the successor in the Papacy of Gregory VII. [1089], and carried on that Pontiff's warfare against the Emperor Henry IV., not with entire success. That Emperor died in 1106, and was succeeded by his son, Henry V., who, though he was pledged to support the Pope, became a fierce opponent. After much struggling Henry was so far victorious that he took Paschal prizoner, forced him to crown him, and to acknowledge the Imperial right of investiture. These concessions so angered the clergy that they demanded the annulling of the oath, but Paschal remained faithful to it. Thereupon several Synods pronounced sentence of excommunication against the Emperor. The latter marched upon Rome, fearing the Pope would give way. Paschal fled from the city, and soon afterwards died [1118].

Paschasius Radbertus.—A celebrated divine. His family name was Rathert, but, following the custom of the time in which he lived, he added a Latin to a barbarian name. He was born at Soissons at the end of the eighth century, and was educated in the monastery of Notre Dame in the same town. He received the tonsure there, but for some reason, which is not very clear, he gave up the religious for the secular life. But this did not last long. Under the influence of Abelard, Abbot of Corbie, he took full vows, and from that time devoted himself to the work of the monastery. He was one of the chief instructors, and spent much time in studying the writings of the early Christian Fathers. In 822, under the direction of Paschasius, a new monastery was founded, of which, on the death of Abelard in 826, he became the Abbot. He now began to write. In 830 he published the Life of Abelard, his master and patron, and in the following year wrote a tract, teaching a doctrine which has since become one of the principal articles of faith in the Roman Church—that of Transubstantiation. He maintained [1] that the Eucharist is the true Body and Blood of Christ, [2] that no trace of the substances of bread and wine remain after the consecration, [3] that it is the same flesh that was born of the Virgin Mary. He quoted in this tract passages from the writings of Cyprian, Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostom, and several others which he considered supported his theory. As was natural, such a startling doctrine was the cause of much and fierce controversy. The most famous of Paschasius's opponents was Frudegard, who is supposed by some writers to have been one of the monks of Corbie. Another monk, Ratram, addressed a long letter to the King, Charles the Bald, on the subject, trying to prove that the two first arguments put forth by Paschasius were sound, but that he was unable to agree with the third. Paschasius's other works were commentaries on the Lamentations of Jeremiah the 44th Psalm, and on St. Matthew's Gospel.

Passalorynchites [from the Grec passalo, "a gag," and rynchos, "a muzzle"].—A branch of the Montanists [q.v.] who never spoke, and kept their fingers constantly upon their mouths. They grounded their practice on the words of the Psalmist, "Set a watch, O Lor before my mouth, and keep the door of my lips" [Ps. cxii. 3]. They arose in the second century, and St. Jerome testifies that even his time he found some of them in Galat as he travelled to Ancyra.

Passau, Treaty of.—This was a famous treaty of pacification with the Protestants gained for them in 1552 from Charles V., Maurice, Elector of Saxony. It is considered by the German Protestants as the basis of their religious liberty. By the three fiarticles it was stipulated that Maurice and the confederates should lay down their arms and should lend their troops to Ferdinand Hungary to defend him against the Turks and that the Landgrave of Hesse, who had been treacherously imprisoned, should be at liberty. In the fourth it was agreed that the Rule of Faith called Interim [q.v.] should be considered as null and void; that the extending parties should enjoy the free undisturbed exercise of their religion, until the diet should be assembled to determine amably the present disputes; and that religious liberty should continue always, case that it should be found impossible to come to an uniformity in doctrine and worship. Also that the Imperial Chamber Spires should be open to the Protestants as well as to the Catholics, and that there should always be a certain number of the Lutherans in the cathedral of Augsburg at that high court.

Passing-bell.—The custom of tolling the bell on the death of a person is a very ancient one. The sound of the bell calls for prayers of the faithful on behalf of the deceased. The usage is referred to by Venerable Bede, and is thus directed by Cat. 67:—"When any person is passing out this life, a bell shall be tolled, and the minster shall not then slack to do his last duty."
Passionarius.—An Office-book containing the lections on the sufferings and death of martyrs.

Passionists, The, or "Congregation of the Disenrolled Clerks of the Most Holy Cross and Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ." This Order was founded by St. Paul of the cross, who was born near Genoa in 1694; devoted himself to a religious life, and founded the Order in 1720, with the sanction of fonsignor Gustinara, Bishop of Alexandria. In the following year he went to Rome to obtain the Pope's sanction, and having been obtained there some years, during which he had resided priest, the first monastery of the new Order was established at Monte Argentario in 1737. The rules of the society were confirmed by Benedict XIV. in 1741, and again by Clement XIV. in 1769. St. Paul died at SS. Giovanni e Paolo, on theelian Hill, in 1778. The Order spread after a founder's death, and first obtained a foothold in this country in 1842. There are now Passionist houses in England, two in Ireland, and one in Scotland. The Order was introduced into the United States in 1852, and they now have six houses there. The Passionists fast three days in every week, besides Advent and Lent. In addition to the usual three vows they take a fourth: they will do their utmost to keep alive in hearts of the faithful the memory of our Lord's Passion. Their dress is black, with the name of Christ printed on the left side, and a heart suspended from the neck with white cross upon it.

Passion Sunday.—The fifth Sunday in Lent; the second Sunday before Easter. It is called because the commemoration of Lord's Passion begins with the Gospel for day. In the north of England it is frequently called Carling Sunday, and celebrated the eating of parched peas or "carlings." Old rhyme thus refers to the Sundays in Lent and Easter Day:

Tal, Mid, Misere Carling, Palm, and paste (i.e., pasch) egg day."

last week in Lent is popularly known as Passion Week. [HOLY WEEK.] From the best times it has been observed with greater festivity than the rest of the fast. The whole day of the Passion is read in the lessons for week. The term seems to have been in the "fortnight before Easter," so that the Passion week began with Passion Sunday instead of with Palm Sunday. This word is used in this larger sense by the "pallium of Laodicea.

astrophoria.—In the Eastern Church, all buildings attached to churches near the end, to receive objects connected with the litur; in fact, the same as the sacristy.

astor [Lat. "a shepherd"].—A term applied to members of all orders of the clergy, as "shepherds" of Christ's flock.

It was restricted by Archbishop Laud to the episcopal order, and is used in this narrower sense by the Prayer Book in the first Ember prayer, and in the first Collect in the form for the consecration of bishops.

Pastorale.—A book of occasional Offices relating to confession and other pastoral duties of clergy of the Church of Rome.

Pastoral Letter.—A letter written by a bishop to his diocese.

Pastoral Staff or Crosier.—A bishop's official emblem. It is a long staff with a hook at the end, like a shepherd's crook, and is the symbol of the bishop's pastoral authority over his flock. It is frequently beautifully decorated with gold and jewels, and sometimes has a small banner or sudarium attached to the upper part. It was formerly borne by bishops and abbots. A bishop carried it in his left hand, with the crook turned outwards, to indicate his authority over his diocese; an abbots in his right hand, with the crook turned inwards, to signify his jurisdiction over the members of his house. In the Prayer Book of 1549 the use of the pastoral staff is enjoined as follows: "Whenever the bishop shall celebrate the Holy Communion in the church, or execute any other public ministration, he shall have... his pastoral staff in his hand, or else borne or held by his chaplain."

Pastoral Theology.—That branch of the science of theology which has reference to the intercourse of the minister with his people. In his study he is to become acquainted with the Scriptures and the doctrine of the Church; in his pastorate he has to apply what he has learned to the varying needs of his flock, in the ministry of the Word and the Sacraments. Such work involves, primarily, visitation of the sick, pastoral converse and guidance, teaching in schools, preparation of candidates for confirmation, communicants' classes, enlisting lay co-operation and guiding it, attention to clubs and other parochial institutions, as well as to parish festivals, and endeavouring to sanctify all by the name of the Lord Jesus.

The discharge of these duties involves questions concerning which difference of opinion is sure to exist. Thus the preface of the Prayer Book requires the minister "being at home, and not being otherwise reasonably hindered," to say the morning and evening prayers in church. Now certainly there can be little doubt that the daily service ought to be said where there is a prospect of its being regularly maintained and fairly attended. Probably few English towns not are without a daily service in one of the churches. But in parishes where the clergyman is single handed, it may fairly be pleaded for him that he is reasonably hindered. When he has once begun he will be unwilling to let it be interrupted on account of indisposition or absence.
from home, and thus it threatens to be a strain on his health and a restraint on his needful recreation. The religious teaching in schools claims much attention, but most of all the great increase of population makes pastoral work much heavier than it was three centuries ago. Moreover, in religious families of the upper classes (and the poor cannot find time to leave their daily labour) family prayers have taken the part of the Church service, and these have the advantage of bringing together the whole household.

The following books on Pastoral Theology may be recommended: Blunt's Duties of the Parish Priest, Evans's Bishops of Souls, Sandford's Parochialia, How's Pastor in Parochia, and A Manual of Pastoral Visitation.

Paten, Patena, or Discus.—The plate or vessel on which the consecrated bread of the Eucharist is placed, from which it is distributed to the communicants.

Paterines.—The origin of the name is unknown, but some suppose it to come from "pateria," which signifies in the Milanese dialect a popular faction, and that the opponents of the clergy were so called because of their popularity. But the name was also given to a branch of the Manicheans who migrated from Bulgaria to Italy in 1046. They taught that matter was essentially evil, condemned marriages, and set at nought Church authority. They are supposed to be the same as the Perfecti (q.v.), and are also identified with the Cathari or Puritans who infected Languedoc at the end of the twelfth century.

Pater Noster.—The Lord's Prayer. These are the first two words of the Lord's Prayer in Latin.

Patriarch.—This title, borrowed from the Jews, was originally given to all bishops. But, by the fifth century, the title had become restricted to the bishops of a few of the most eminent cities of the Empire, who exercised some jurisdiction over the other metropolitans of their district. The term is first used in this confined sense by the ecclesiastical historian Socrates, A.D. 440, and authoritatively by the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. The Bishops of Rome, Alexandria and Antioch, as the heads of Churches of Apostolic foundation, claimed the title in a special sense; but with these were generally associated the Bishops of Constantinople and Jerusalem, the former from the political, and the latter from the religious, importance of his See. The powers of the patriarchs varied in different parts. They presided at the local councils, and claimed the right of consecrating, and sometimes also of nominating, the metropolitan and inferior bishops of their province, and, in fact, exercised the supervision of their district generally.

Patriarchate.—The district under the jurisdiction of a patriarch.

Patrick, Sr.—The Apostle of Ireland. According to St. Patrick himself, who mentions the fact in his Confession, he was born at Bonavem of Tabennis, a locality which is probably to be identified with Kilpatrick, in Scotland. Another passage in the Confession gives the date as close to the end of the fourth century; but there is some doubt about the genuineness of this, and several writers place the birth some years earlier. His father's name was Calpurnius, and he was a man of good family. His mother's name was Conchessa, who, tradition says, was a niece of St. Martin of Tours. His parents were both Christians, and took great pains with the education of their boy, though at first their efforts seem to have been attended with little result. The country at that time was infested by brigands and robbers, a gang of whom carried off Patrick from his father's ground when only sixteen. He was taken to Ireland and sold as a slave, his master obliging him to spend his whole time, no matter what the weather might be, tending the cattle on the mountains. After enduring terrible hardships for six months, he succeeded in making his escape. He went directly to the sea in the hopes of getting back to his native land. He found a ship, but was not allowed to go aboard in consequence of having no money. He turned away despairing; but, though heathens, the sailors took pity on him and gave him a free passage. Three days after they landed him in Scotland, but at the extreme north, so that he was obliged to wander about for some time always in danger of being again taken prisoner. He at last reached home, and was le at peace for a time. Meanwhile he had a dream in which he was told that he had been chosen as God's messenger for the conversion of Ireland. His movements about this time are uncertain, because the different writers of his life do not agree in many particulars. Some say that he travelled a great deal on the Continent before beginning his missions. His own account, however, if it could be sure that the passage is genuine, so that he was ordained in Scotland, and spent many years there in retirement as the means of preparing himself for his great work. Probably this is quite correct. His parents and friends were greatly opposed to his taking orders, and tried by every means in the power to dissuade him. Some urged that he should thereby expose himself to unnecessary dangers from the heathen, others to offending to faults committed in his youth, was unworthy of such a holy office. But remained true to the vision he had seen of believing that he had a mission to the before God. He found the whole count given up to idolatry, and immediately set himself earnestly to work. He was of a fearless disposition, and used to venture into the wild districts. At all the places where stopped to preach, he left behind converts.
deny the existence of any duality in God, affirmed that the Father, the one primary Principle, must have suffered on the cross. The leader of the party was Praxeas, who came, in the second century, from Asia Minor, the birthplace of Monarchianism, as an antagonist of Montanism. He went to Rome, and induced the Roman Bishop (either Eleutherius or Victor) to excommunicate the Montanists of Asia Minor. He next went to Carthage, where he was opposed by Tertullian, who wrote a treatise against him. The doctrine of Praxeas was one of those infinite shades of distinction which spring from the contests in the early Church on that paramount doctrine of Christianity—the nature of Christ and His relation to the primal and paternal Godhead.

Patronage.—The right to present a clergyman to a living; i.e., to nominate him to the bishop for the purpose of institution. This right was originally confined to the bishop of the diocese; but in the Council of Orange [A.D. 441] it was enacted that one who built a church might be allowed the presentation to it, and by a law of Justinian [A.D. 541] it was laid down that the founders of churches and their heirs should enjoy the privilege of nominating the incumbents; provided always [1] that a sufficient maintenance were provided for the clerk, [2] that the bishop approved of the nominee. The system soon became general throughout the West. It was introduced into England by Archbishop Theodore [A.D. 668–90]. Abuses, as was natural, gradually crept in. Churches were sometimes built as a profitable speculation, the builder taking the offerings and allowing to the incumbent a fixed income, while he appropriated the surplus to his own use. Occasionally the right of presentation was divided among several heirs, which led to a division of the living into a like number of parts, each held by a separate clerk. Frequently the patron claimed the right of introducing or ejecting a priest without any reference to the bishop; whilst, on the other hand, the bishop sometimes unreasonably refused to institute the patron’s nominee. Against such practices, frequent canons and laws were directed; bishops were prohibited from consecrating churches built for profit; the partition of livings was put a stop to; the bishop’s consent was made a condition of induction; and bishops were forbidden to withhold that consent except for valid reasons.

Instead of being regarded merely as a trust, patronage came to be considered as a vested right, and therefore as saleable property, which might be sold either with the estate or as a separate property. In England, the perpetual right of presentation is called an “advowson;” if appended to an estate, it is an “advowson appendant;” if a property by itself, it is an "advowson in gross." Of late the abuses of patronage have been the subject of much discussion, and it is proposed to bring in a Church Patronage Bill, which may cause very great changes. [Reforms of the Church.]

Patteson, John Coleridge, D.D. [b. in London, April 1st, 1827; murdered Sept. 20th, 1871], Bishop of Melanesia. He was the son of the judge, Sir John Patteson; was educated at Eton, and afterwards studied at Merton College, Oxford, of which he became Fellow in 1850. After holding a curacy in Devonshire for some time, he went, in 1855, to New Zealand, to work under Bishop Selwyn, and he was so successful in missionary work that in 1861 he was consecrated Bishop of Melanesia. He had great talent as a linguist, and succeeded in reducing various languages which as yet had only been spoken into an elementary form of writing. In work he was indefatigable, and in times of sickness would nurse the people himself, while his linguistic talent was of immense help to him in teaching and understanding them. While crossing from one of the islands of his diocese to another his ship was attacked by the natives and himself killed; probably the ship was mistaken for one of the kidnapping ships which had from time to time come to the islands to carry off slaves to Queensland and the Fiji Islands.

Paul.—The name of five Popes. Paul I. [757?] is noticeable as living at the time of the Lombard invasion, and as having to play a double part between Desiderius the Lombard King and Pepin of France.

Paul II. [1464–71].—A worldly Pontiff, who, instead of withstandng the inroads of the Turks in the Mediterranean, devoted himself to pleasure and luxury, and excommunicated Podiebrad, King of Bohemia, the strongest opponent of the Turk, for keeping faith with the Utraquists.

Paul III. [Alexander Farnese] was appointed Cardinal by the wicked Pope Alexander VI., who held unhallowed relations with his sister. He failed twice before he succeeded in his attempt on the tiara, succeeding Clement VII. in 1534. He was a man of shameless immorality. In his pontificate the Council of Trent began. Paul, who dreaded that the power of the Emperor Charles V. might be employed adversely to himself, secretly encouraged some acts of the Reformers, and was willing to grant the cup to the laity, marriage to the clergy, and to make some other concessions, but lacked the skill needful for such complicated intrigues, and was quite defeated.

Paul IV. [John Caraffa], one of the most determined enemies of the Reformation, succeeded to the popedom in 1555. He had previously been instrumental in establishing the Inquisition in Rome, with a view of stopping the progress of the Reformation in Italy. He was a man of strict life and determined will, and left his mark upon the whole future history of the Papacy.

Paul V. [Camillo Borgese].—His pontificate [1605–21] is marked by the Molinist controversy, in which he took the part of the Jesuits against the Dominicans. For imprisoning two priests, he laid Venice under an interdict, and endeavoured to excite Spain to make war upon the refractory State. But he entirely failed, and the Venetians defeated him successfully, refusing to give up the prisoners. This was the last Papal interdict ever issued. His menaces against the English throne were not more successful, and a war was by Mariana, written by his command, in favour of the murder of tyrannical kings, was burned in Paris by the hangman, by order of the French Parliament. To the city of Rome he was a kind and useful ruler.

Paul [b. about A.D. 230].—The first herm in order to avoid the persecutions whi the Emperor Decius was carrying on again the Christians, Paul fled into the desert, hid himself in a cave overshadowed by palm-tree, and by the side of a spring water. Here he is said to have lived for ninety years, and to have died at the age of 133. St. Antony visited him towards the close of his life; tradition says that his existence was manifested by a dream to St. Antony, who was miraculously guided to cell, and was with him till Paul's death, is supposed to have died on Jan. 10th, his festival is celebrated on Jan. 15th.

Paul of Samosata was a heretic who succeeded Demetrius as Bishop of Antioch in 262. He not only taught heretical doctrines, but also assumed the manners of a Sophist, imitated the pomp of a secular judge and led an impious and wicked life. Circular was sent round to the various Churches, and in 264 a Council assembled at Antioch, and Paul promised to renounce his erroneous doctrines; but he did not execute his promise, and six years after, another Council was held. Paul was deposed, Domnus, son of his predecessor, Demetrius was put in his place. Paul refused to accept the sentence, and was allowed to remain in his palace till 272, when the Emperor Aurelian forced him to leave. Paul denied the Sabellians the distinction of the Three Persons of the Trinity; and with Artemon taught that the Holy Ghost had descended upon Christ, operated in Him, and then returned to the Father. He also held that there were two distinct Persons in our Saviour, Word and Christ, who, he said, did not exist before Mary, but was called Son of God as a reward for His holy works. Paul's followers were called Samosatians or Paulinists. There were some at the Cou
Paul the Deacon [b. about 720, d. about 800], son of Warnefried, who wrote the story of the Lombards. He was secretary to Desiderius, King of the Lombards, and located his daughter Adelphera. Having been driven from his native land, he went to the Court of Charle- magne, and remained with him for some years in very intimate terms. He returned in 787 to Monte Casino, in Italy, where he had formerly been secluded, and devoted the rest of his life to writing. He continued his other's History of the Lombards down to the death of Luitprand, in 744, and wrote for his apil, Adelphera, a history of Rome, called Codex Episcoporum Mettensium. He wrote also a Life of Gregory the Great and several sermons, from one of which, on John the baptist, the names of the notes in the musical scale were derived by Guido of Arezzo.

Paula, St.—A disciple of St. Jerome, a woman lady who was descended from the milites of the Scipios and Graechi, and was therefore of the noblest and richest family in Rome. She married Toxotius, after whose death she left her children and property, and followed St. Jerome to the Holy Land. She tired to a cave at Bethlehem, founded there monastery, nunnery, and hospital, and died in 401, after spending her life in voluntary poverty and devotion. She is commemorated by the Roman Catholic Church on Jan. 26th.

Paulicians.—A heretical sect which originated about the middle of the seventh century. It is uncertain from whom they derived their name, whether from one Paul of Samota (the second of the name); from a Paul of Armenia, who was a prominent member of the sect at the beginning of the eighth century; or from the Apostle Paul himself, whose teaching they specially pretended to follow. There has been considerable controversy as to their doctrines, some maintaining that they were heretics, others that they were exponents of reformed and Scriptural religion, and others denouncing them as anichaeans. Their opinions, however, as stated by Peter of Sicily and Photius, are decidedly heretical. They believed in two persons of One Essence, the Creator of this present world, and God of the Old Testament; the other, the only One, the ruler of the world to come. They received the New Testament only, teaching particular authority to the Epistles of Paul, and the Gospels of St. Luke and John. They rejected the Sacraments, and staked the use of images and the growing veneration for the Virgin Mary. They considered it allowable to attend catholic churches, and to conceal their true views by invocation and deceit.

The originator of the sect appears to have been a certain Constantine, a man of anichaean family, who lived about the year 653 at Mananalis, a village near Samosata. It happened that a copy of the Gospels and Pauline Epistles came into his possession, which he diligently studied. His reading led him to renounce some of the errors of his hereditary belief, but did not prevent him from substituting others, and he produced a system which, though professedly in accordance with the New Testament, was really founded on a Manichean basis. The new doctrines soon gained converts. Constantine settled at Kibossa, in Armenia, and assumed the name of Silvanus. Here he remained for twenty-seven years, until the year 684, when the Emperor, having heard of the progress of the sect, made an attack upon it. The Emperor's officer, Symeon, captured Constantine and a number of his followers, and ranging the latter in a line, ordered them to stone their leader. All but one refused, but by the hand of that one—his adopted son, Justus—the heresiarch fell. The officer, Symeon, however, struck with their constancy, began to inquire into the Paulician doctrines, with the result that he was converted, and succeeded Constantine as leader of the sect, under the name of Titus. About A.D. 690 the youth Justus became uneasy as to the truth of his religion, and, failing to obtain satisfaction from Symeon, applied to the Bishop of a neighbouring town. The Bishop informed the Emperor, Justinian II., of the tenets of the sect, and the latter exerted himself for its suppression. Justus, Symeon, and many others were burnt, and the remainder dispersed. But Paulicianism was not stamped out. A new leader arose in the person of the Armenian Paul, under whom it soon recovered its strength. But after his death, the sect grew corrupt, and sank lower and lower till about A.D. 801. It was then reformed by the exertions of Sergius, who had lately been converted to Paulicianism, and promoted to the headship under the name of Tychicus.

The disposition of the Emperors towards the sect had varied. Leo the Isaurian and Constantine Copronymus transported many of them to Thrace; Nicephorus granted them toleration; Michael Caurpalates and Leo the Armenian fiercely persecuted them. The Empress Theodora [A.D. 844] undertook the suppression of the sect, and under her not less than a hundred thousand were killed in various ways. Amongst these was the father of Carbeas, a captain of the guard. Carbeas was so enraged at his father's death, that he deserted with 5,000 followers to the Saracens, by whom he was given the city of Tephrica and other places. Here he was joined by other Paulicians, and they soon became strong enough to menace the Empire. With the help of the Saracens, Carbeas defeated Michael; the son of the Empress, at Samosata, and this success was followed up by his son-in-law, Chrysobcheres, who was able to force the Emperor Basil to beg for peace [a.d. 867]. But a few years after [a.d. 871] Chrysococes was defeated and slain by one of Basil's generals, Tephria was taken and destroyed, and the power of the sect overthrown. Paulicianism, however, was kept alive by those who had been settled in Thrace. From this centre it spread over Europe, and is heard of as late as the eleventh century.

Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, born at Bordeaux about 353, of noble parents, from whom he inherited great wealth. He spent his youth in careless enjoyment, was educated by Ausonius, and became Consul of Rome in 379. After his consulship he travelled, and made the acquaintance of St. Martin of Tours, St. Ambrose, and others, under whose influence he first turned his thoughts to religion, and was baptised by Dolphinus, Bishop of Bordeaux, in 391. Having determined to devote himself to a religious life, he separated from his wife Therasia, sold his estate and divided his wealth among the poor, and was ordained presbyter at Barcelona in 393. He went to Nola in 394, and in 409, having made himself esteemed and venerated for his piety and asceticism, he was chosen bishop of that place. He died June 22nd, 431. Paulinus left a number of letters which are valuable for the descriptions of social life and the architecture of the time, and some of his poems have also been preserved.

Paulinus, Sr.—Paulinus, the first Archbishop of York, was sent to England by Gregory the Great, together with Mellitus and Justus, to help St. Augustine in converting the people of Kent to Christianity. He had laboured there for over twenty years, when Edwin, King of Northumbria, asked in marriage Ethelburga, daughter of Ethelbert. It was thought dangerous to send her away from home to a country where she would be surrounded by heathens on all sides without having some one by her side to protect her. It was, therefore, decided that Paulinus should accompany her, and he immediately devoted himself to the conversion of those among whom he lived. Before leaving the south he was consecrated Bishop by Justus, who was then Archbishop of Canterbury. He used all the arguments he could to persuade Edwin to become a Christian, but at first without any success. But at the beginning of the year 629 the King called together a meeting of the Witenagemote that all might freely discuss the strange doctrines preached by Paulinus. The result was that Edwin was baptised at York on Easter Day of the same year, and the heathen high priest was by far the most zealous of that assembly in pulling down the temples and images of the idols. From that time Paulinus was most successful in his efforts among the people of the north, and established the Church there on a very firm basis. About the year 630, Pope Honorius sent him a pallium, and constituted the Bishop of York metropolitan of the north. Edwin was killed in battle in 633, and his widow retired into nunneries on the sea-coast of Kent. Paulinus would not be separated from her, so resigning the See of York, and soon after, when Rochester vacant, was appointed Bishop of that diocese. He died in 641.

Paulists.—A name given to "The Congregation of the Missionary Priests of Paul the Apostle," founded at New York 1858 by Isaac Thomas Hecker. The members of the order had been Redemptorists [q.v.], but requested to be released from their fourfold vows in order to carry on missionary work in America. The head of the Order Superior-General, but the rules are made a general council of members, who are bound together by voluntary agreement.

Paulus, Heinrich Eberhard Gott [b. 1761, d. 1851].—An eminent rationalistic theologian of Germany. He was born Leomberg, near Stuttgart, studied at Tubing, where he graduated in 1784. By the liberality of the Baron de Palm, he travelled in Friesland and Saxony, to examine into the state of education, and then went to Göttingen to study Oriental languages, which he afterwards continued in London and Paris. 1789 he was made Professor of Oriental Languages in the University of Jena. He occupied himself in explaining the Old Testament in a philological-historical manner, which he published as A Philetal Key to the Psalms [1791], and Philetal Key to Isaiah [1793], and his Critical Historical Commentary on the New Testament [1800-4]. In 1793 he had been made Professor of Theology, but in 1803 his heirs obliged him to leave Jena, and he took Chair of Theology at Wurzburg; when Chair was abolished, he led a roving life going in 1808 to Bamberg, the following year to Nürnberg, and in 1811 to Ausbach. A year he was called to the Chair of Exegesis and Ecclesiastical History at Heidelberg, where he remained till his death. In 1814 started a political and historical periodical called Sophronison, in which he wrote on passing events of importance. He was the most voluminous writer, and few men exercised a wider influence on religious opinion in Germany. His teaching was purely rationalistic; his criticisms on the Bible show a profound conviction that every thing supernatural in it was either false or to be accounted for by natural causes, that the only true criticism was to prove this. He acknowledged the miraculous feature of Christ's moral character, but miracles he said only appeared to be miraculous because all the circumstances attending them had not been handed down to us. Rationalistic views did not change with the times; they remained as they were in 1790, an
to see them far outstripped by the medical theory of Strauss. Amongst his new works we may mention his Reminis-cences [1791-6], Collection of Wonderful Journeys into the East [1792-1803], Life of Jesus as a Son for a History of Early Christianity
[1783], Commentary on the Three First Gospels [1803-6], and Sketches of the History of my Own Looking Back for Fifty Years [1839]. In 1791 he retired from his post with a pension.

FAX.—A metal plate, engraved with a wax, given to the people to kiss at the duration of Mass. Owing to the confusion used by the "kiss of peace," the FAX was reduced about the thirteenth century instead of the mutual salutation.

FAX VOBIS ["Peace be with you."]—The salutation of the minister to the table,
the latter answering, "And with thy peace." The use of the mutual salutation dates from primitive times, and is referred to St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine. It ceased by the bishop on entering the church; by the reader on commencing lessons; by the preacher before and after his sermon; by the celebrant before pronouncing the elements; by the deacon omitting the congregation. The third council of Carthage forbade its use by the clergy, and restricted it to the clergy poor.
The Anglican Church the salutation has been in the form of "The Lord be with you."

PEARSE, Zachary [b. in London, 1690; d.
Bective, 1774], was educated at Westminster School, and thence went to Cambridge, where he distinguished himself as a classical scholar. He took orders in 1716, and became Chaplain to Lord Chief Justice Parker, whose interest he was preferred success-ively to the livings of Stapleford Abbott's, Ives; St. Bartholomew's, London, and St.
Martin-in-the-Fields. In 1739 Pearce became Dean of Winchester; in 1748, Bishop of Dover, and in 1756, Bishop of Rochester and Dean of Westminster. He resigned the deeey later in order to devote more time to literary work. His publications were numerous and included a commentary, with notes,
the four Evangelists and the Acts of the Apostles, together with a new translation of St. Paul's first epistle to the Corinthians, epubilished in 1777; an edition of Cicero, Atrator, and of Longinus; a review of the two of Paradise Lost, and The Miracles of Jesus Conducted. He is buried in Bromley Church, Kent, and was a great benefactor to the city established there for the widows of the city. The inscription on his grave, written himself, is characteristic of the calm selfecency of his life. It states that "he resigned the Deanery of Westminster, and in the comfortable hope of (what had been the chief object in life), being promoted to a higher sphere hereafter." Dean Stanley re-dered that he would have been persuaded into the removal of some of the most interesting tombs in Westminster Abbey, had it not been for the strong remonstrances of Horace Walpole.

PEARSON, John [b. at Snoring, in Norfolk, Feb. 12th, 1612; d. at Chester, July 16th, 1686].—One of the most important theologians of the English Church. After being educated at Eton he was admitted to King's College, Cambridge, of which he was made a Fellow, and became Prebendary of Sarum in 1639, and Chaplain to Lord-Keeper Finch in the following year. His reputation for learning and eloquence was so great that he received successively appointments as Incumbent of Torrington; Preacher at St. Clement's, Eastcheap; Rector of St. Christopher's, in London; Prebendary of Ely; Archdeacon of Surrey; Master of Jesus College, Cambridge; and, finally, Bishop of Chester, in 1672. Burnet declared that Pearson was the greatest divino of his age, and Dr. Bentley said of him, that his "very dross is gold." His chief work is his Exposition of the Creed, remarkable for the ortho-doxy and moderation of its doctrines; the substance of it was first delivered as a series of lectures in St. Clement's, Eastcheap. It is still a standard work of English theology.
He also wrote Vindicia Epistolariun S. Ignatiu, which was long considered as the best work
on the Ignatian epistles; Annales Paulini, and other minor theological works. He was present at the Savoy Conference, and assisted in the final revision of the Prayer Book.

PECKHAM, John, Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Edward 1. Educated at Oxford and Paris, he travelled to Rome, where he was appointed by the Pope to the post of Auditor of the Rota, which office he held till his promotion to the See of Canterbury, effectually by the authority of the Pope. Here he set himself to reform abuses, and attempted to restore primitive discipline. Dr.
Jessop gives some interesting proofs of his zeal in the account of his Visitiation of the Diocese of Norwich. He died in 1291.

PECULIAR PEOPLE.—A sect, chiefly found in Kent, who have created much stir of late years by refusing to use medicine, or to adopt any natural means for recovery from sickness,
placing their dependence entirely on prayer.
Not long since, in consequence of a death which, according to medical evidence, might have been prevented by treatment, the persons responsible, who defended themselves on the ground here described, were convicted of manslaughter.

PECULARIANS.—Churches exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary of the diocese.
They are:—[1] royal peculiaris, e.g. the sovereign's free chapels, under the jurisdiction of the sovereign; [2] archbishop's, bishop's, dean's, chapter's peculiaris, etc.; Pedrecti ["feet erect"]).—A name of the Eunomians, an Arian sect, followers of Eunomius, a disciple of Arius. Their baptismal rites were remarkable. They baptised by dipping the body as far as the breast, with the head downwards and feet erect. Hence their name.

Pelagianism.—Towards the close of the fourth century the heresy of Pelagianism took its rise in the Church of Britain. Pelagius [b. about 380, d. about 450]—the classic form of his British name of Morgan—was a priest of some learning, much of whose later life was spent at Rome, until that city was taken by Alaric and his Goths, when he went to Carthage for a time, and thence to Jerusalem. The substance of his heresy was the denial of original sin. He believed and taught that none but Adam himself received any damage from his sin; that we are born as holy as Adam was before his fall; and that we can live a holy life by the mere power of our own determination to do so, without the aid of supernatural grace from God. The great St. Augustine (not the English missionary, but the still greater Bishop of Hippo, a town in that part of Africa which is now called Algeria) was the chief opponent of this heresy, which seems only to have reached Britain—though invented by a native of the country—after it had been known for some years in Palestine and Africa. When it did arrive, the orthodox party in the British Church applied to the Church of France—not to the Church of Rome—for some persons of learning and discretion who might come across the Channel and assist in combating the heresy. Germanus and Lupus, Bishops of Auxerre and Troyes, were sent over for the purpose; and a conference was held between them and the Pelagians at St. Albans, in the presence of a great multitude. St. German, by his arguments in the conference, and by the fervid eloquence of his preaching, afterwards brought the greater part of his hearers back to the orthodox side.

Pelagius, Popes.—There have been two Popes of this name. The first [555-560] was seriously compromised by taking part in the Monophysite controversy, and supporting the Empress Theodora in her defence of it. He had been the main adviser of his predecessor Vigilius, but on being appointed his successor endeavoured to rid himself of the charge of heresy. But his success was very partial. [See Milman's 'Lat. Christ.,' i. 324.]

The second lived in the miserable days of the Lombard invasion. He endeavoured to reconcile the Monophysite strifes, but little heed was paid to him. He was succeeded by Gregory the Great.

Pelliccia, Alexius Aurelius [b. 1744], was a native of Naples, and appears to have spent all his life there. For many years he was Public Teacher of Ethics and Archeology in the university, and also Liturgical Professor in that congregation of prebendaries which was called the "Conferenza." Finding in the discharge of his duties the need of a handy compendium of his subjects, he resolved on writing one for the young ecclesiastics who sat under him, and wrote his Polity of the Christian Church—one of the most complete, comprehensive, and candid works ever produced upon ecclesiastical archaeology. It is more comprehensive than Bingham because the latter only deals with ancient times, whereas Pellicia devoted himself to the gigantic task of giving the ecclesiastical polity of the ancient, mediaval, and modern Church up to the date of publication, viz. 1777. His work is divided into six books treating of the Government and Ministers of the Church, of Holy Places, of Oblations and Benedictions, of the Calendar and Holy Days, of the Judicial Functions of the Church and of the Offices for Marriages and Funerals. Not the least value of this writer is his conspicuous fairness. His sympathies are with the whole Catholic Church, with the Greek and Anglicans as with the Roman; and as seldom claims for any distinctly Roman use a greater antiquity than history warrants the book has long been regarded as authority by German scholars of all opinions and has recently been translated into English by the Rev. J. C. Bellett.

Penance.—In the primitive Church the who fell into sin after baptism were subject to rigid discipline. Before they could receive absolution—contrition, confession and satisfaction were necessary. To this end penitents were divided into four classes. The first were the "mourners" [lentes], whose station was the church porch, where they prostrated themselves before the faithful as they went begging their prayers on their behalf. They admitted into the second class they termed the "hearers" [audientes], and were permitted to enter the church and hear lessons and the sermon, but not to join in prayers of the church. The third stage reached when the privilege of remaining join in the prayers offered on their behalf and to receive the bishop's blessing, granted. They were then called the "kneller, [genuflexentes], or "prostrators." [subtrati], in their place in church was in the nave, near the ambon or reading-desk. Lastly, they came "co-standers" [constitentes], allowed to stand by side by side with those who enjoyed full privileges of Church membership, after the former orders of penitents and the catechumens had been dismissed, to join in common prayers and to see the oblation offered. Not till they had been released from this fourth stage were they admitted to partake of the Holy Eucharist. The title for passing through the different classes of penitents varied in accordance with Penitentiary.—A House of Mercy, or home and place of discipline, for females who have given way to sins of impurity.

History.—In 1272 Bernard, of Marseilles, induced several who were leading impure lives to give up their evil ways, and to live together under rule, calling themselves Penitents of St. Mary Magdalen.

1492.—Tiffener converted many prostitutes, and formed the order of Penitents of St. Mary Magdalen at Paris. [Penitents, Orders of.]

1641.—Eudes induced some ladies to give themselves to the work of reclaiming the fallen, and from these the Penitentiaries of the Good Shepherd were formed.

1758.—The Magdalen Hospital in London was founded.

1807.—The London Female Penitentiary.

1849.—Clewcr House of Mercy.

1851.—The Church Penitentiary Association was formed by Bishop Armstrong. This has now houses in connection with it containing 1,100 penitents.

1854.—The London Diocesan Penitentiary, Highgate, was founded by Bishop Blomfield.

How Supported.—By voluntary contributions and by the work of the penitents, with the exception of the Magdalen Hospital, Streatham, which has an endowment of £3,500 per annum. Contributions are gladly received at any of the Penitentiaries.

How Managed.—By a council, warden or chaplain, and self-devoted women, i.e. women not receiving a stipend: the bishop of the diocese being Visitor. In the Magdalen Hospital the matrons are paid. As the great object is to bring the women to penitence, and to build them up in the Christian faith, a warden or chaplain is appointed to superintend the religious instruction, and to conduct the chapel services. A chapel is necessary in every Penitentiary.

Admission.—By application to the warden or lady-in-charge. The penitent before admission must be free from infectious or contagious disease, and likely to earn her living after her course of training.

Training.—The penitents are generally detained two years. In some cases a longer period is necessary. At first, owing to weak health and idle habits contracted, they can do very little work; but gradually, according to conduct and health, they are taught needlework, laundry-work, and housework. One object being to form regular habits in the girls, everything is done according to a fixed time-table. On entering, the girl is supplied with clothes belonging to the Penitentiary, the colour of the dress worn varying according to the progress made in the house. When ready for service or other employment a suitable outfit is provided. The girls, after leaving, can always find a friend in the warden or in the ladies at the Penitentiary. It is found that on an average 74 per cent.

Penitentiary Priests were early established in some of the Churches of the East for the purpose of hearing the confessions of the lapsed and giving them instruction. The office was abolished by Nectarius of Constantinople in A.D. 391. Though not established in the Western Church in early times, it was introduced in the twelfth century, and a canon of the Lateran Council, A.D. 1215, enjoins the appointment of a penitentiary in every diocese.

Penitents. [Penance.]

Penitents, Orders of.—A name applied to certain fraternities in Italy and elsewhere who profess to do public penance at certain times in the year, and are distinguished from other religious brotherhoods by the shape and colour of their dress. The White Penitents, the most ancient order of this class, were instituted about 1260 by a friar of Perugia, who proclaimed that the wrath of God was about to fall upon the city, and could only be appeased by a general repentance. His auditors clothed themselves in sackcloth and went round the city in procession, chastising themselves with whips to expiate their sins. The Order of Black Penitents was instituted in 1488 by some Florentines for the purpose of tending criminals during imprisonment and before their death, and giving them decent burial, and also of burying all who were found dead in the streets. There are other orders of penitents distinguished by different colours, though in rules they follow one or other of the orders already mentioned.

The name has also been given to orders established for penitent women, as:—

Penitents of St. Magdalen.—An order established in 1272 by Bernard, a citizen of Marseilles. [See Penitentiaries.]

Penitents of St. Magdalen, Congregation of, at Paris, owed its origin to the preaching of a Franciscan, about 1462. Charles VIII. gave a palace for the use of this order, but it was removed to St. George's Chapel in 1572. It was originally established for the purpose of rescuing the fallen, but afterwards became simply a nunnery.

Penitents of the Name of Jesus.—A congregation of women at Seville, founded in 1550. It is divided into three parts—one for nuns, another for novices, and a third for those who are under correction.

Penitents of Orvieto.—An order of nuns instituted by Antonio Simonelli, and erected in 1692 into a monastery for the reception of those who had led a sinful life, and wished to devote themselves to the service of God.

Penn, William [b. in London, Oct. 14th, 1644; d. at Riscombe, Berkshire, July 30th, 1718], son of Sir William Penn, the Admiral; a celebrated Quaker. He went to Christ Church, Oxford, and was there converted to Quakerism by the preaching of Thomas Loe, which took such a hold upon his mind that he and some fellow-students were accustomed to hold prayer-meetings together, and attempted to prevent the wearing of surplices in the University by tearing them away from the students. For this they were expelled, and Penn was sent by his father, in 1662, to France, and studied at Paris and Saumur, whence he proceeded to Turin for a short time. He returned to England in 1664 and became a student at Lincoln's Inn; but was despatched to Ireland two years later to manage his father's estates in the county of Cork. His Quakerish tendencies were her strongly developed, and he quarrelled with his father because the latter desired him to take off his hat in the presence of royalty which Penn persistently refused to do. In 1668 he published The Sandy Foundatio Shaken, in which he attacked the doctrine of the Trinity as usually received, and of the mediation of Christ, and for which he was imprisoned in the Tower. He was released through the intervention of the Duke of York but was again arrested in 1670 for breach of the Conventicle Act, and sent to Newgate for six months. His father had died leaving him a large annuity, with which he visited Holland and Germany in the cause of Quakerism, and afterwards obtained a grant from the Crown of land in America on which to found Quaker settlement. He and his friends started in August, 1682, and the colony in Pennsylvania, on the Delaware, was founded of which they immediately set to work to build the capital, Philadelphia. The form of government, which had been framed in England, was accepted by the freemen of the province, and a bond of friendship established with the natives, which was in no way broke for more than seventy years. The color seemed in a fair way of prosperity, and during the two years after it was established about fifty ships arrived, bringing English, Dutch and German emigrants. Penn returned England in 1684, and after the death Charles II., became very intimate with James II., inasmuch that he was suspected of Rhenish tendencies, and on several occasions arrested after the Revolution he was accused of complicity in a plot to restore the late King, so forced to live in retirement. He made second expedition to Pennsylvania with the intention of changing the proprietary governors to regal ones, but abandoned the design and returned to England, much encumbered with debt; he spent his last years at Riscombe.

Pennaflorte. Raymond de, Chaplain to the Queen of Hungary, was born at Barcelona at the end of the twelfth century, being descended from the Kings of Aragon. He studied at Barcelona and Bologna, and entered t Dominican Order, of which, in 1238, he was made General; but resigned the office afterwards in order to become a missionary to the Moors and Jews. He became Confessor to Pope Gregory in 1230, at whose orders he rewro the sixth collection of Decretals. He also wrote Summa Casuum Penitentiarum, which was printed at Rome in 1603. He died in 1275, and was canonised by Pope Clement VIII.

Pennefather, Rev. W. [Mildmay].

Penry, John [b. at Cefnbrith, in Brecknockshire, Wales, in 1550].—He was educated as a Roman Catholic, but during the years which he spent at Cambridge, and subsequently at Oxford, he adopted Puritan views, and took the degree of M.A. At Oxford he was ordained priest, but got himself into trouble with the bishops in consequence of the somewhat northodox nature of his opinions, and the dissatisfaction was increased by a plea which he published for the preaching of the Gospel in Wales. In 1588 he published various acts, and in the same year appeared the first book written by “Martin Marprelate.” Marprelate Controversy.] The author as supposed to be Penry himself, but it is probable that he was only the publisher, and at the author was Henry Barlowe; but so much suspicion attached to him that, in 1589, he fled to Scotland, and did not return for two years. Meanwhile he had become a separatist, and as this caused him to be regarded as dangerous to the Church, he was rested and imprisoned in March, 1593. He is tried on a charge of treason, and though there was no evidence forthcoming to prove at he was the author of the “Martin Marprelate” book, passages in his diary were so startling as to look like proofs, and he was hanged at St. Thomas-a-Watering, London, on 29th, 1593.

Pentecost.—Among ancient Christian writers the term signifies sometimes the whole time between the Easter and the Whitsun festivals, and sometimes the litter festival of Pentecost. The whole period of fifty days, being kept in honour and memory of the Saviour’s ascension, was a time of more than ordinary joy, and it was a custom of very early observance to worship standing, in ad of kneeling, during the whole of this season, to mark its joyful character. At a later period the Fast of the Rogation Days was reduced, modifying the ancient custom in a Church of excluding fasting from this season. [Whitsunide.]

Pentecostals.—Oblations made to a hedral, at Whitsunide, by the inhabitants the diocese.

Pentameration of Parishes, or the Whitsun Bords, is a custom, still viving in some parts of England, of making normal progress round the boundary of the parish during Rogation week. [Rogation.] The practice is derived from the annual processions at this season, originated by Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne [A.D. 460], for the purpose of imploring God’s blessing on the freshly-sown seed. At the Reformation all religious processions were abolished except these, an injunction of Queen Elizabeth providing “that the parishioners shall, once in a year, at the time accustomed, with the curate and the substantial men of the parish, walk about the parishes, as they were accustomed, and at their return to the church make their common prayers.” No service was, however, appointed, but it was enjoined that “the curate . . . at certain convenient places, shall admonish the people to give thanks to God, in the beholding of God’s benefits, for the increase and abundance of his fruits upon the face of the earth, with the saying of Psalm civ., Benedic anima mea. At which time also the same minister shall inculcate this and such like sentences:—Cursed be he that translateth the bounds and doles of his neighbour, or such other order of prayer as shall be hereafter appointed.”

Perfect.—A term applied in the early Church to those who had received full instruction in the Christian religion, and were admitted to a participation in the Holy Eucharist. Converts were called “imperfect”; catechumens of some standing became “more perfect”; and at the end of their probation were admitted into the number of the “perfect.”

Perfecti or Boni Homines.—This was a name given to several monastic orders, both in England and on the Continent. Thus an order founded in the eleventh century, at Vincennes, transferred in 1584 to the Minims; several Portuguese houses who sent missionaries to India and Asia Minor, and an English order of the thirteenth century, all bore this name. In the thirteenth century the stricter Catharists assumed the name of Perfecti. They held the Manichaean doctrines, and resembled the Patricines [q. v.]. A Council was held at Lombez, in southern France, in 1165, to condemn the Perfecti.

Perfectionists.—Those who believe that it is possible to attain to actual perfection in this life. There are four classes of Perfectionists:—[1] The Roman Catholics, who teach that a man may, by obedience, become free from all mortal sin, though still subject to fall into venial sin; and even this tendency may be done away through the special favour of God. [2] The Wesleyan Arminians, who teach Christian perfection, namely, the fulfillment of the Law by faith and love, through the grace of God, though the infirmity of the body prevents it from being absolute in the eyes of men. [3] Many Quakers, who say that in souls justified by God “the body of death and sin comes to be
Per

Prophets now read generally omit the prophecies regarding the Messiah. The method of selection of the lessons in the Church of England will be found under the head Lecture [q.v.].

In the Roman missal each mass has two Scripture lessons, which are mostly taken from the Vulgate Version.

The Greek Church has special Epistles and Gospels for every week-day as well as ever Sunday and Saint's Day.

In the Armenian Church, Scripture reading takes a very important place; from Easter to Pentecost they have three services a day, an portions from the Old and New Testament specially selected for each service.

Peristerion. — A dove of gold or silver suspended over the altar or in the baptistery of some ancient churches. Later a custom arose of keeping the reserved sacrament in these doves.

Perjury. — The taking an oath in order to tell or confirm a falsehood. This was considered a very heinous crime, both by the heathens and Jews, and among Christians to be looked upon with great abhorrence, as is treating God with irreverence, denying, or at least, ignoring His omniscience, profaning His name, and violating truth.

Perpetua, St. — One of five catechumens who were seized at Carthage in the third century during the persecution of Severus. She had three young men (Revocatus, Saturninus, and Secundulus) and one woman (Felicitas) as fellow-sufferers. She was given liberty if she would give up her faith, and to refuse was doubly hard, that she was the mother of an infant whom she would be obliged to leave to the mercy of her enemies. Her mother was Christian, her father still a heathen, and used to come to the prison day after day urge her to recant. While they were prisoner, the priest was, at first, allowed to con and see them, and took the opportunity of taunting them there. A few days after Perpetua was thrown into a dark dungeon, but allowed to have her baby with her, which was declared turned the dungeon into a palace. When her father heard that the trial was coming on, he made one more attempt to persuade her to save her life, but to no purpose, and sentence of death was pronounced. Her child had been taken to her father's house, and the day before her death she sent a message that she wished to see it once more, but he would not grant her request. The authorities had decided that the five prisoners should be torn to pieces on an approach festival. It was the custom in Carthage at this time to dress their victims, the men as prisoners, the women as priestesses of Carthage. Before they were thrown to the wild beasts. But these five protested so earnestly again such an insult that the officers yielded, a Perpetua, having been tossed by a bull several times, was led into the centre of the arena, and there despatched by the sword of a gladiator, she herself guiding his aim. A festival in her memory has been kept since her days of Gregory the Great on Mar. 7th. The "Acts of St. Perpetua," said to have been written for the most part by herself, are still extant.

Perpetual Curate.—The curates called perpetual are the ministers appointed to take charge of a parish where there is no spiritual rector or vicar, but where the tithe belongs to a lay rector or improperly, who is bound to provide a curate, canonically instituted and inducted. The curates by this means become so far vicars that they cannot be removed at the pleasure of the appropriator, nor without the revocation of their licence by the ordinary. An Act passed by the instrumentality of Bishop Wilberforce provided that perpetual curates should henceforward receive the title of "vicar," and hence the name has now almost disappeared.

Perrone, Giovanni, D.D. [† at Chieri, tedmont, 1794; ‡ at Rome, Aug. 29th, 1876]. He studied and took his degree at Turin, and went to Rome, where he entered the Society of Jesus, by which he was sent to Orvieto in 1816 as Professor of Theology. He was appointed in 1823 to the same post at the Roman College, which he held for fifty years, except when in charge of the College of Ferrara, from 1830 to 1833, and Rector of the College of Rome, from 1853 to 1856. In the controversy concerning the Immaculate Conception he took a leading part, before the Bull Ineffabilis Deus was issued in 1854; and he also took his side of the Ultramontanists at the Vatican council of 1869. The great influence which his learning and powers of rhetoric had in the Roman Church was largely increased by it, being a member of most of the Papal congregations on doctrine and discipline. From 1843 to 1850 Perrone visited England with some of his pupils. He published his system of dogmatic theology in two books—[1] Praelectiones Theologicae quas in Collegio Romano sociatis Jesu dabitat, and [2] Praelectiones Theologicae in Compendium redactae—from which the present system has been for the most part adopted. Another of his leading works is De Immaculato B. V. Marie conceptu: _n dogmatica decreto definiri positi._

Perronet, Edward, son of an English lrayman, a preacher first under Wesley, then an Independent, author of some hymns, among which "All hail the power of Jesus' name" still holds a place in popular esteem. He died in 1792.

Persecutions.—The causes of persecutions in religious history are manifold and complicated. The Lord Jesus Christ was persecuted by the Pharisees because He exposed their hypocrisy, and by the Jews in general because He ran counter to their prejudices. These causes produced a like treatment of His Apostles; and the ignorance of the heathens was another cause of persecution: the Christians were confounded by them with the rebellious Jews, and indiscriminately persecuted. Thus the historian Suetonius says that Christ excited the Jews to frequent tumults. Furthermore, Gentile superstition came to the increase of persecution: the heathens could not endure a sect which aimed at the destruction of the worship of their gods. The Jews frequently escaped rough treatment simply because, though they practised their own rites, they let those of the heathens alone. But this was exactly what the Christians would not do. They boldly called on men "to turn from their vanities and serve the true God alone." Thus it was that they were called "Atheists," as enemies of the gods. And to all calumnies among them were believed by the superstitions: they burned Rome, made nightly conspiracies, ate human flesh, worshipped an ass's head, committed adultery, incest, infanticide. The base heresies of the Nicolaitanes, Carphocelians, and others, sometimes gave colour to the slanders. But another cause, which influenced some of the best and wisest of the Emperors, was found in political ideas. The Gentile religion was interwoven with the State; and men like Trajan, who conscientiously believed it their duty to uphold existing institutions, regarded Christianity as a hostile, and therefore a dangerous, principle. Its professors were denounced as the enemies of kings, of laws, and of the human race. The persecutions in the New Testament were [1] about Stephen, [2] by Herod Agrippa (Acts xii.), [3] those stirred up by the Jews against St. Paul, [4] those raised by heathens who saw that their gains were endangered (Acts xvi. and xx.).

In Ecclesiastical History there are commonly reckoned ten persecutions. They are the following; notices of each will be found under their several names:

The accession of Constantine the Great, the first Christian Emperor, put an end to the persecutions of Christianity by the Empire. Would that no more needed to be added to this article. But Christian history has to record that persecution has been used as a weapon age after age for enforcing obedience to that form of religion which is strongest. The Arian controversy, which began the reign of Constantine, was the signal for persecution, now by the Arians, now by their opponents. "Toleration," it has been well said, "was the last Christian virtue to be learned." It was argued that as error of opinion leads to disorganisation of society, to moral evils, and (in early opinion) to everlasting perdition, such error must be put down like any other offence against the well-being of the commonwealth. The barbarous nations who broke into the Roman Empire and destroyed it were frequently persecutors. Thus the Vandals, both in their heathen days, and also after they had embraced the Arian faith, desolated the Church, and persecuted those who remained faithful to the ancient creed to death. The English, on arriving as heathens in this country, persecuted the Christian Britons, destroyed their churches, and drove them into the mountains. The cruelties of the Mahometans when they began their career of conquest were terrible and remorseless. "The Koran or the sword" was their sole alternative to all who fell into their power. During the Middle Ages all movements in the direction of freethought were regarded by the dominant religion as warfare against the Kingdom of God. The persecutions of the Waldenses and Albigenses, and the establishment of the Inquisition, are described in their places, as are also the Hussite wars, the persecutions of the Lollards, and the fires of Smithfield in the reign of Queen Mary. On the accession of Elizabeth the tables were turned, and the spirit of persecution was directed against the Roman Catholics, who were proceeded against as traitors to the State, and fined and imprisoned for not attending the established worship. Cases also occurred occasionally of the infliction of death for heresy, a penalty inflicted by Elizabeth upon both Baptists and Independents [q.v.]. There were those who left England for America in order to secure "freedom to worship God;" but even these in turn became persecutors both of those who preferred Episcopacy to Independency, and also of the Quakers. The same spirit showed itself on both sides in England in the days of the Commonwealth and of the Stuarts; and the history of the Scottish Covenanters is a touching narrative of persecutions bravely endured. The Act of Toleration may be said to have put an end to persecution as a legalised instrument in England, but the spirit will hardly be eliminated from mankind, except as human nature itself is altered by the influence of the Gospel of Christ.

Perseverance.—Continuance in any design, state, opinion, or course of action. The perseverance of the saints is their continuance and progression in a state of grace. This doctrine caused a considerable dispute between the Arminians and Calvinists, and the arguments of the Calvinists in its favour were as follows:—That the perfections of God, His love, faithfulness, wisdom, and power, are such that He would not be likely to condemn His people to everlasting perdition. That since Christ has united His people to Himself and died for them, and lives to make intercession for them, their falling would make His work vain, and is according to derogatory to the Divine glory. That man is upheld, not by his own power, but by the power of the Holy Spirit, which enlightens and confirms him, and enables him to persevere. In answer to these arguments the Arminians brought forward the denunciation in Scripture against apostles, and the prophecy that some would eventually fall from grace and said that the doctrine precludes the use of means, and gives encouragement to presumption and false security.

Persia, Religion of.—The religion of Persia, until it fell into the hands of the Arabs in 651, has been described in the article PERSIAN PERSIAN PERSIAN PERSIS [q.v.]. Then the greater part of the population embraced Mohammedanism; Persia developed that special branch of Islamism, which is mystical, and is seen under the form of DERVISHES [q.v.]. Their founder, Meolan was born at the beginning of the fourteenth century; there are now thirty-six dervish sects spread in the surrounding countries. is a most powerful sect, both in the Ottoman and Persian empires. The Sultan is now famed as fully invested with the imperial power till he has received the sword from the successor of Meolan Jelalu-d-din, and the present time the Caliphate seems to be within its grasp.

Persia has been the scene of many mission Nestorian and Roman Catholic missions, who have left little trace behind them; in the middle of the last century a Moravian mission which was unsuccessful; and in this century more successful efforts are being carried on by means of the Church Missionary Society.

Persons or Parson, Robert, English Jesuit, was born at Nether Stowe near Bridgewater, in Somersetshire, 1546. He studied at Oxford, but, having become a Roman Catholic, went to Rome in 1574, where in the next year he entered the Society of the Jesuits. In 1580 he came to England with Campion; but when the latter was arrested, in 1583, Persons returned to Rome, though he still continued to manage the English mission. In 1587 he was made the first Rector of the English College at Rome, and in the next year went to Spain to make preparations for the furtheran of the Jesuits in England in case the Armada should succeed. He founded several schools for the training of English priests, and aided the secular clergy. He died at Rome in 1610. He is said to have been indefatigable, sly, of a hot temper and rough behaviour. He wrote many books, of which we may mention—A Christian Directory Guiding Men to Eternal Salvation; A Conference about the next Succession to the Crown of England, which appeared in two parts—the first for the chasising of kings, etc., and the second to prove he right of the Infanta of Spain; and A Treatise of the Three Conversions of the English from Paganism to Christian Religion, published under the name of N. D., i.e. Nicholas Coleman.

Pestalozzi, Johann Heinrich [b. at Zurich, Jan. 12th, 1745; d. at Brugg, Aargau, 1827].—A great educationalist. His father was a physician, but died soon after his son's birth, and after various experiments, Pestalozzi applied himself to farming, with the intention of improving the condition of his farm people by education. His schemes failed, and after fifteen years he became deeply involved in a debt, having been unsuccessful in his business. To pay off the debt he wrote a novel, Lehnhart und Gertrud, which soon became popular, and for which he received a gold medal from the Agricultural Society of Bern. Other novels followed, and he started periodical, the Swiss Journal for the People. He made other attempts for the education of the poor, and founded a school for orphan children, in what had formerly been an Ursuline convent in Unterwalden. He suffered from a want of books and efficient teachers, and in less than a year the convent was turned into a hospital for Austrian soldiers. A school at Burgdorf was more successful, but that also failed after a time. For this school he wrote How Gertrude Teaches Children, a work which has become very celebrated. In 1804 he was invited by the inhabitants of Yverdon to open an educational institute there. This institution soon gained a world-wide reputation, and pupils came to it from Germany, Russia, and America, and carried back his method to their own countries.

Mr. R. H. Quick says, in his Essays on Educational Reformers [page 177]: "The life of the Pestalozzian institutions had been the one which the old man had infused into all the members, teachers as well as children; at this life was wanting at Yverdon. The establishment was much too large to be carried on successfully without more method and discipline than Pestalozzi, remarkable, as he himself says, for his 'unrivalled incapacity to govern,' was master of... Pestalozzi was mad with enthusiasm to improve elementary education, especially for the poor, throughout Europe. His zeal led him to announce his schemes and methods before he had given them a fair trial; hence, many foolish things came abroad as Pestalozzianism, and hindered the reception of principles and practices which better deserved the name. His highly active imagination led him to see and describe as actually existing whatever he hoped sooner or later to realise. The enemies of change made the most of his mistakes, and his institution came to a speedy and unhonoured close. When the old man died at the age of eighty, he had seen the apparent failure of all his toils. He had not, however, failed in reality. It has been said of him that his true function was to educate ideas, not children, and when, twenty years later, the centenary of his birth was celebrated by schoolmasters, not only in his native country, but throughout Germany, it was found that Pestalozzian ideas had been sown, and were bearing fruit, over the greater part of Europe."

Pestalozzi himself says, in his Letters on Early Education : "Why have I insisted so strongly on attention to early physical and intellectual education? Because I consider these as merely leading to a higher aim, to qualify the human being for the free and full use of all the faculties implanted by the Creator, and to direct all these faculties towards the perfection of the whole being of man, that he may be enabled to act in his peculiar station as an instrument of that All-wise and Almighty Power that has called him into life."

Pestalozzi adopted the system of teaching from objects, and proceeding from the concrete to the abstract; he introduced graduation in writing, and strove to educate rather than instruct children. He believed in the system of mutual instruction, and set the elder children to teach the younger. His system is much used in the present Kindergarten schools.

Petavius or Petau, Dionysius.—A Roman Catholic theologian [b. at Orleans, 1583; d. at Paris, 1652]; he early became a member of the Order of Jesuits, and lectured on rhetoric at Rheims and La Flèche. In 1621 he was appointed Professor of Theology at Paris, and became well known as a scholar and critic: he published De Doctrina Temporum, in 1627, a valuable book on chronology. In consideration of this work, Philip IV. invited him to Madrid as Professor of History, and at the same time Pope Urban VIII. invited him to Rome. Petavius declined both offers, and spent the remaining years of his life at the Jesuits' College of Clermont, in Paris, where he wrote his Rationarium Temporum, De Photino Heretic, and De Theologis Dogmatibus. This last was his most famous work, but he left it unfinished.

Peter, Festivals of.—There were formerly four festivals of St. Peter kept:—[1] June 29th, the day on which SS. Peter and Paul are supposed to have been martyred at Rome, the former by crucifixion with his head downwards, the latter by beheading. This is the oldest of the feasts of the Apostles, having been observed since the fourth century. [2] Feb. 22nd, the festival of St. Peter's Chair at Antioch. Though there is no account in the Bible of the foundation of the church at Antioch, it is generally believed to have been the work of St. Peter, who established his episcopal chair first in this place. [3] Jan. 18th, St. Peter's Chair at Rome. Celebrated in honour of St. Peter's fixing his episcopal work there after seven years at Antioch. [4] August 1st, St. Peter's Chains, or St. Peter ad Vincula, the day on which the Roman Catholics honour his chains, and commemorate his miraculous deliverance from the hands of Herod Agrippa. The 1st of August was probably the day on which the church on the Esquiline Hill was dedicated to St. Peter in Chains. It was built by Eudoxia, wife of Valentine III., about the middle of the fifth century.

Peter Lombard. [Lombard.]

Peter Martyr. [Martyr.]

Peter of Lampsachus, St.—A Christian martyr who was seized by order of the Emperor Decius in 249, at Lampsachus, a city on the Hellespont. The Pro-Consul Optimus tried to persuade him to offer sacrifice to Venus, promising that by so doing he should save his life. Peter refused, and Optimus ordered that he should be broken to pieces on a wheel. It was done slowly, and although he was in the most horrible tortures, the martyr's courage was undaunted. A few days after, three of his companions were brought before Optimus, and the same alternative was offered them—apostasy or death—and they all chose the latter. But one of them, Nicomachus, whilst he was on the rack, cried out that he was ready to sacrifice to the gods. He was immediately released and given full liberty. A few moments after, however, he fell down dead. The other two, Andrew and Paul, were given another chance of saving their lives, but remained firm. The Governor thought that he would be able in time to persuade them to sacrifice as he wished, and was willing to put off sentence of death, but the mob was so fierce against them, and so eager for their blood, that Optimus was afraid to delay. He handed them over to the infuriated populace, by whom they were stoned to death.

Peter the Hermit was born at Amiens in the middle of the eleventh century. He went to Jerusalem in 1093, and, seeing the deplorable condition of the Christians, on his return to Europe preached the first crusade, persuading most of the princes of Europe to join him. He was made the head of the enterprise, and had about 40,000 foot, besides cavalry, under him; but the people were too enthusiastic to wait for a regular army. They landed in Constantinople in 1096, and went thence to Bithynia, where they were defeated and but 3,000 returned to Constantinople. He was present at the siege of Jerusalem in 1099, and was left Vicar-General there for time; but afterwards returned to France, and died in 1115 in the monastery of Neu Montier in Liège.

Peterborough, BISHOPRIC of.—It was not till the reign of Henry VIII. that Peterborough had a bishop of its own; it has possessed a most important Benedictine Abbey and at the dissolution, the last Abbot, John Chambers, became its first Bishop. It had hitherto formed part of the great See of Mercia. It is said that the abbey was spared when it was surrendered, on account of its being the burial place of Catharine of Arragon. The present cathedral is the third minster that has been erected on the same spot. The first was built in the seventh century (commence about 655) by Peada, the son of Penda, who died before its completion; this was the first monastic establishment of central England. Its site was the little village of Medeshamstead, called afterwards, from the patron saint of the abbey, Burgh St. Peter. On the completion of the building, it was hallowed in the names of St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. Andrew by Deusdedit, Archbishop of Canterbury, and other prelates, in the presence of Wulfere, who had succeeded his brother Peada. Saxo was its first abbot. This abbey was entirely destroyed in 870 by the Danes, under Hubha in the time of the seventh abbot, Hedda, who was killed in the attack with all his monks said to number upwards of eighty. About century later King Edgar, with Athelwold, bishop of Winchester, as architect, commenced the building of the second church; this structure suffered much from another Danish attack in the eleventh century, and in 1116 it was completely destroyed by fire. Two years lat the present structure was commenced, which took in all nearly one hundred and ten years to complete, and was then consecrated in 1237 by the Bishops of Lincoln and Exeter. The choir had been ready for service in 1177, and was built by Abbot Martin de Beo; the east transept was built by Abbot William Waterville (1155-1177), the mace by Abbot Benedict (1177-1193), who also built part the west transept. The original fabric remains with additions, but no great alterations. At time of the consecration much that we now see had not been erected, viz., the bell tower, the western spires, the new building at the east (often erroneously called the Lady Chapel), built in the fifteenth and sixteenth century by Abbots Ashton and Kirton, and the lant tower. With the exception of Norwi Cathedral, Peterborough is the grand
Norman church left in England. The great feature of the building is the west front: the date of its erection is not on record, but as it is in the best style of Early English, it was probably completed not long before the consecration of 1257. There was a chapel dedicated to St. Thomas-a-Becket, rich in his relics, brought hither from Canterbury by Abbot Benedict, who was a monk of Christ Church at the time of the murder. On no a few occasions has the Sovereign been entertained at the abbey at a great cost; Stephen, Henry III., and Edward I., and their queens, Edward II., Edward III., and the Black Prince, were all among its royal visitors. Catharine of Arragon was buried in the north choir aisle, in 1536, and Mary, Queen of Scots, in the south choir aisle, in 1587, but her remains were removed to Westminster in 1613. In what is called the "new building" is preserved a very curious coped stone monument, having on each side six carved figures in monastic dress: it is said to have been erected by Godric, Abbot of Crowland, as a memorial of Abbot Hedda and his monks. In 1882 the condition of the lantern tower was discovered to be highly dangerous, and it was found that no expedients for patching up and trying to preserve the tower in its existing state would be of any avail, so that it became necessary to reconstruct the whole of it. The work of taking down the tower commenced on April 5th, 1883, under the direction of Mr. J. L. Pearson; but it was found that the piers which support the lantern must also be rebuilt. In the excavations made, remnants of the Saxon foundations of the first minster were met with, but also stones which had formed part of the original Norman tower. The "chief cornerstone," as it was called, was laid on May 7th, 1884, with masonic honours, by Lord Carnarvon as Pro-Grand Master, in the name of the Prince of Wales as Grand Master, of the Freemasons. The work of rebuilding is still progressing.

The income of the See is £4,500. There is an assistant bishop, a dean, three archdeacons, four canons, three minor canons, and twenty-four honorary canons. The diocese comprises the entire counties of Leicester, Northampton, and Rutland, with portions of counties adjacent, and contains 571 benefices.

Peters, Hugh [b. 1599; hanged, 1660].—An English Nonconformist, who, having preached in Holland and America, returned to England in 1644, joined the Puritan party, and was hanged at the Restoration as a recidivist. He wrote in prison A Dying Father's Last Legacy to an Only Child.

Peter's Pence.—The tax paid annually to the See of Rome by England and other countries, and supposed to have been originated either by Offa, King of Mercia, or by Ina of Wessex, for the support of a college in Rome for the education of English clergy. The tax was at first fixed at a penny, to be paid by every family; but was afterwards demanded only from those possessed of a certain fixed income; it was collected upon the feast of St. Peter ad Vincula. Much dissatisfaction was caused by the exaction of payments by the bishops, who were deputed to collect the money, and laws were passed laying a heavy penalty not only on those who refused to pay, but on the bishops in case they should neglect to deliver up the money given into their charge. The custom of collecting Peter's Pence became general in Poland, and was introduced into Prussia and Scandinavia, though the Papal Legates could never succeed in getting it paid regularly; and Gregory VII. tried to exact it from France and Spain, but without success. In England it seems to have been paid more or less regularly till the reign of Henry VIII., but for some time before it had only been regarded as a charity, and was not enforced from the people.

Petrobrusians.—Followers of the heretic Peter of Bruys, who was burnt at St. Gilles about A.D. 1125. The only authorities from which any knowledge of the sect can be gained are a passage in Abelard, and a book by Peter the Venerable, Adversus Petrobrusianos Haereticos. Peter de Bruys appears to have been an ecclesiastical holding some benefice in the south of France, where he first began to publish his heresy, and gained many followers among the Cathari at Arles and elsewhere: afterwards he preached with great success at Narbonne and Toulouse, but was eventually seized and condemned to death. He professed the desire to restore Christianity to its original purity, and accepted the Gospels, to which he would only grant a literal interpretation; the Epistles he partly rejected, and only granted to them a derivative authority. He would not allow infant baptism; declared that the Church being invisible, no buildings are necessary as places of worship, for the Church exists only in the hearts of the people; denied not only the Real Presence in the Eucharist but also that any sacramental character is attached to it, and regarded it simply as a historical incident in Christ's life. He objected to elaborate ritual of any kind, to prayers for the dead, and to music as a part of Divine Worship; and he abhorred the adoration of the cross, as being the instrument of our Lord's torture. After his death the sect continued to flourish for some time, but finally became merged in that of the Henricians.

Pews, Reading. [DESK.]

Pews, or enclosed seats in church, were not known till after the Reformation, and until the seventeenth century were only used by the patron of the church. The earliest pew for the congregation remaining, whose age is determined by the appearance of a date, is in the north aisle of Geddington St. Mary, Northamptonshire, and bears the date 1602. From this time they became more universal, till the episcopate of Wren, Bishop of Hereford, when they fell into disfavour. In his Visitation he says: "Are all the seats and pews so ordered that they which are in them may kneel down in time of prayer, and have their faces up to the holy table? Are there any close pews in your church? Are any pews so lofty made that they do any way hinder the prospect of the church or chancel, so that they which be in them are hidden from the face of the congregation?" With regard to the last point, it has been stated that high pews were first built by the Puritans, so that they might be able unseen to disobey the rubrics, particularly those enforcing bowing at the name of Jesus, and standing at the Gloria Patri.

The following are the laws concerning the holding of pews:—

No person has a legal right to occupy, in the parish church, any pew or seat exclusively without the permission of the churchwardens, except by prescription or by FACULTY [q.v.].

By immemorial use and by reparation [when repairs have been needed] a prescriptive right to a pew may be established as appurtenant to a particular house within the parish; and if a house to which a pew is so legally appurtenant be let, the occupier is entitled to the use of the pew.

But if it can be shown that the pew was not always connected with that particular house, or that it has at any time been repaired by the churchwardens at the cost of the parish, the prescription cannot be established.

A legal claim to a seat or pew, as an inheritance derived from the original holder, or as appurtenant to land, exclusively of a house or residence, cannot be established.

The distribution of pews and seats, which are not held either by faculty or by prescription, rests with the ordinary; the churchwardens are his officers, and they are to allot them to the parishioners according to their reasonable discretion, taking care to afford suitable accommodation to as many as possible. When a parishioner has been placed in a seat or pew by the churchwardens, or has been suffered for some time to occupy it, he is said to have a possessory right in it, which he may maintain against a stranger, but he is liable, when occasion shall require, to be displaced by the churchwardens, who, if more church accommodation be required, may make a different distribution of the pews or seats, so as to supply the deficiency; but if they do so capriciously, and without just ground, the ordinary will interfere. In these arrangements, therefore, it may be useful that the advice of the minister should be taken; but he has no legal power to interfere.

The erection of a pew or seat by any individual at his own charge, even with the leave of the minister, the churchwardens, and all the parishioners, gives him no permanent interest therein; such interest can be obtained only by a faculty.

Churchwardens must not permit pews or seats to be altered in size, height, or form, etc., at the mere pleasure of individuals.

In a parish church a pew or seat cannot legally be let or sold by any person unless by Act of Parliament: and if a pew or seat be appurtenant to a house, it can only pass with the house to which it is appurtenant. As a general rule, a person not being an occupying landowner in the parish cannot retain to his own use, or acquire a right to, a seat in the body of the church, or in the public aisles or galleries.

Philadelphia Society [Gr. philadelphia, "brotherly love"].—A sect founded in 1695 by an aged Englishwoman named Jane Lead. She embraced, it is said the same views as Madame Bourignon [Bourignonists.]. She was a widow of a good family, from Norfolk, and had devoted a great deal of time to the study of the works of Jacob Bohmen. [BEHMEM, JACOB.

She wrote many books of a mystical character; one of them is called The Wonders of God's Creation manifested in the Variety of Eight Worlds, as they were made known experimentally to the Author. She was of opinion that all dissensions among Christian would cease, and the Kingdom of the Redeemer become, even here below, a glorious scene of charity, concord, and happiness, those who bear the name of Jesus, without regarding the forms of doctrine or discipline that distinguish particular communion would all join in committing their souls to the care of the internal guide, to be instructe governed, and formed by His divine impulse and suggestions. She declared that this desirable event would come to pass; and that she had a Divine commission to proclaim the approach of this glorious communion, saints, who were to be gathered in one visible universal Church or Kingdom before the dissolution of the earth. Thus she asserts that her Philadelphia Society was the true Kingdom of Christ, in which alone the Divine Spirit resided and reigned. She died in 171 at the age of 81. She was greatly assisted in forming her society by Dr. Portia, one of the Nonjurors, who had afterwards taken to medicine, and who was a great spirit-seer. The Philadelphians helped to spread the doctrines of mystical piety shown in the writings of William Law [q.v.].

Philippists.—Followers of Philip Melancthon, and distinguished as endeavouring, but without success, to bring about a union between Protestant bodies, especially Lutherans and Calvinists.

Phillimore, Sir Robert Joseph, Bart. [b. at Whitehall, Nov. 5th, 1810; d. at Henley-on-Thames, Feb. 4th, 1855]. Having taken his degree at Christ Church, Oxford, he became an advocate at Doctor's Commons in 1839, and was called to the Bar in 1841; became Chancellor of the dioceses of Oxford, Salisbury, and Chichester, and Commissary of the Chapters of St. Paul's and Westminster; Judge of the Cinque Ports and Admiralty Advocate, 1855; Queen's Advocate-General, 1862; Dean of Arches, and Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, 1867; Master of the Faculties, 1871; and Justice in the Probate and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, 1875. He early became noted for his success as an advocate in ecclesiastical cases, and took part in all the prominent cases of ecclesiastical litigation which have had so marked an influence on modern Church history, notably that of Archdeacon Denison [1857]: "Poole v. the Bishop of London" [1859]; and the case of Essays and Reviews [1862]. His chief works as a legal author are Ecclesiastical Law of the Church of England and Commentaries on International Law, both of which hold a foremost place among law-books. The second gained for him a membership in the Institute of France.

Phillpotts, Henry, D.D., Bishop of Exeter [b. 1778, d. 1869], was born at Bridge-water, and was the son of a wholesale brickmaker. He received his education at the College School, Gloucester, and at Corpus Christi, Oxford. In 1795 he was elected a Fellow of Magdalen. On his marriage, in 1804, he gave up his Fellowship, and in 1806 became Chaplain to Dr. Shute Barrington, Bishop of Durham. He first distinguished himself in theological controversy by publishing a defence of an episcopal charge delivered by Dr. Barrington, whose remarks had been attacked by the Roman Catholic historian, Dr. Lingard. Three years afterwards he was made Prebendary of Durham, and held the cure of one of the largest parishes in that city for ten years, when he was preferred to the rich rectory of Stanhope. In 1821 he took his D.D., and in 1825 he entered into controversy with Mr. Charles Butler, the author of The Book of the Roman Catholic Church. Dr. Phillpotts published his answer in an octavo volume, entitled Letters to Charles Butler, Esq., on the Theological Parts of his Book of the Roman Catholic Church, with Remarks on Certain Works of Dr. Milner and Dr. the Sacramentary of Gregory and in the Lectionary of St. Jerome, as in the English Prayer Book.
Lingard, and on some Parts of the Evidence of Dr. Doyle before the Committee of the Houses of Parliament. In the ensuing year Dr. Phillpotts followed up the controversy by the publication of A Supplemental Letter to Charles Butler, Esq., on some Parts of the Evidence given by the Irish Roman Catholic Bishops, particularly Dr. Doyle, before the Committee of the Two Houses of Parliament in the Session of 1825; and also on Certain Passages in Dr. Doyle's Essay on the Catholic Claims. In the year 1827, when the question of Roman Catholic Emancipation occupied so much public attention, Dr. Phillpotts published two Letters to Mr. Cunning, in which he insisted, as he had done before in a Letter to Earl Grey, that the claims of the Catholics to political enfranchisement ought not to be conceded "without adequate securities for the Church of England." In 1828 he accepted the Deanery of Chester, and in 1830 became Bishop of Exeter. As the income of the See was only £2,700, he endeavoured to get permission to keep the rectory of Stanhope, worth £5,000 a year, in conjunction with the bishopric. This the Government refused, but suffered him to enjoy his Durham prebend, worth not much less, until his death. In Parliament, from 1830 to 1841, he was a bitter antagonist of the Whig Ministry. He was a most determined opponent of the Reform Bill, Irish Church Reform, National Education, the Ecclesiastical Commission, and the New Poor Law. He was a zealous maintainer of what he believed to be the rights, doctrines, and duties of the Church, and in his zeal involved himself in manifold litigations with both the clergy and laity of Devonshire. The most notable case was that of his refusal to institute the Rev. G. C. Gorham, on the ground of his imperfect belief in the doctrine of baptismal regeneration. [Gorham Case.] The case was decided against him, and he ever after that time refrained from any conspicuous action in the politics of the Church. He was a courageous defender of "sisterhoods" at a time when they were highly unpopular, and took the part of Miss Sellon at Devonport when a fierce outcry was raised against her. He died at Bishopstowe, near Torquay, in his 92nd year. A fortnight before his death he had tendered his resignation of the See, but he died before the legal arrangements were completed.

Philo.—A Jew of Alexandria [b. probably a few years B.C. d. during the reign of the Emperor Claudius]. Of his life nothing is known beyond what can be gathered from his writings. He was of noble family, of the sect of the Pharisees, and was well acquainted with the Old Testament Scriptures, as appears from his numerous writings. About 39 or 40 A.D. Philo was appointed to the head of an embassy sent by the Jews of Alexandria to the Emperor Caligula to petition him for redress from the injustice of the Imperial Governor Publius Avilius Flaccus. The manner in which the ambassadors were treated induced Philo to write his book Contra Flaccum. At different times he visited Jerusalem and other parts of Palestine; and it is said that he made another journey to Rome in the reign of Claudius, but the story is surrounded by legends and is probably not true. The works of Philo are divided into three parts: the first containing Cosmopoëtics, the second Historica, and the third Juridica seu Legalia. The influence of Philo's writings upon both Jewish, and through that upon Christian theology and thought, has been profound. He had practically mastered all the learning of his time, and his object was to show that the Divine revelation as given to the Jews was consistent with the highest philosophy known to the ancients, and especially with that of Plato. From the bold anthropomorphism of the Jewish Scriptures he argues the absolute necessity of a symbolic or allegorical meaning, which required study and systematic interpretation—a doctrine carried to still greater lengths in modern days by Swedensborg [q.v.]. This allegorical doctrine is carried much further in the first division of his works than in the last; but he does not deny also the literal sense, which is, as it were, the vehicle of the spiritual.

In Philo's system of Theistic philosophy God is the one ideally good and perfect Being as with Plato [q.v.]. As such He is incomprehensible and inscrutable, but as Creator He manifests Himself to man, and is then the "Beginning, the Name, the Word;" and this manifestation is as natural to Him as burning is to great heat. On the other hand exists a formless chaos, which God has determined to fashion into a universe; but that bring such different existences into relation an intermediary is required. This is found in the Logos [q.v.] or Word, and in its lower intelligent existences. The Logos at different times represented as a Hig Priest, the Image of God, His Shadow, the instrument of Creation, the first-born Son, the Archangel, and so on; and Philo also identifies him with the Lord, or Angel of the Covenan who so often appeared to the Patriarchs.

In the Book of Wisdom we probably see slightly earlier form of Philo's doctrine grafted upon Judaism, Wisdom being, in that book, personified much in the same real sense as the Logos of Philo. By the heathen philosophers the system of thought out of which Philo's grew was corrupted into Gnosticism. On the other hand, its relation to, and influence upon, Christian theology can be clearly traced in St. John's phraseology concerning the Logos or Word, and the teaching of the Epistle to the Hebrews, which also gives striking examples of the allegorical method of interpretation Philo so largely adopted, and whi finally he was suspected of robbery and intrigue, and banished in 886 by the Emperor Leo to Armenia, where he remained until his death. Of his numerous works, by far the most valuable is the Bibliotheca, containing the names and short accounts of 248 authors, many of whom are unknown except from this work.

Piarists.—The Fathers of the Pious Schools, an institution founded by Joseph Calasanctius at the end of the sixteenth century, sanctioned as a congregation by Pope Paul V. in 1617 (and therefore sometimes called Paulinians), and formed into an order by Gregory XV. in 1621. The object was at first to give poor children a religious education, and instruct them in reading and writing only; but afterwards a good modern education, including Latin, Greek, and philosophy, was given. They experienced some trouble from the jealousy of the Jesuits, but in 1870 numbered 2,000 religious. They have never entered Great Britain or France, but are chiefly confined to Italy, Spain, and Austro-Hungary. In the latter country there are said to be 20,000 children under their care.

Picards.—The name of a sect who, according to Sylvius and Varillas, carried the principles of the Adamites [q.v.] to the extravagance of going without clothes. It sprang up in the beginning of the fifteenth century, and took its name from Picard, a Fleming, who set it on foot. He travelled from Flanders into Germany, where it is said he deceived a great many people by his impostures. The Jesuit Ballinus, however, in his account brings no such charges, which many believe to have been mere calumnies charged against him on account of his denunciation of the Church of Rome; and Schlecta, secretary to King Ladislas of Bohemia, in his letters to Erasmus, gives an account from which it would appear the Picards were merely a division of the Vaudois or Waldenses. Picard settled at Tabor, near the river Lüschnitz, in Bohemia; was attacked by Zisca, and he and all his followers were killed, with the exception of two, who were saved that they might give an account of their opinions.

Pie.—The Ordinale or Pie was a table of directions for finding the services for the day in the old Office books, a process of some complexity. It is referred to in the preface to the Prayer Book “Concerning the Service of the Church,” as follows:—

“The number and hardness of the rules called the Pie, and the manifold changings of the service, was the cause, that to turn the book only was so hard and intricate a matter that many times there was more business to find out what should be read, than to read it when it was found out.”

The name “Pie” or “Pica” was in general use about the fifteenth century. Two derivations are proposed: [1] From the initial so profoundly influenced Origen [q.v.] and other Christian Fathers. But as Farrar well points out, while Philo’s conception, splendid as it is, is vague, and only floats in the air, the difference between it and that of the Apostles “is as wide as that between the living and the dead.” “The four words of St. John, ‘The Word became flesh,’ created an epoch,” and tell us more, and give us a more definite conception, than all which Philo and Plato wrote, though it was given to them, not only to see through a glass darkly much of the truth, but also to prepare the way for the coming of its kingdom.

Phonascus [Gr. phōnaskō, “to practise the voice”].—In the ancient church, a precentor, or leader of the choir.

Photinus, Bishop of Sirmium [b. at Anyra], and a pupil of Marcellus. He held that our Lord began to be Christ only when the Holy Ghost descended upon Him at His baptism. This doctrine was condemned by the Synod of Antioch in 344, and by that of Milan in 345. In 351 a Synod, which was assembled at Sirmium to consider his writings, condemned them; Photinus offered to defend them in opposition to Basil of Anyra, and finally, on his persisting in holding and publishing heretical doctrines, he was deposed from his See. It is not certain how long his party held together, but they are mentioned as being in existence in 381. None of his writings have survived.

Photius.—Patriarch of Constantinople [b. at the beginning of the ninth century, d. 891], the son of noble and rich parents, and of great reputation as a statesman. Although he was a layman, he was appointed to the Patriarchate in opposition to Ignatius, who had been nominated by the Empress Theodora during the minority of her son Michael III. The patron of Photius was Bardas, the uncle of Michael III., who persuaded Gregory of Syracuse to promote him, within six days, through the orders of monk, lector, subdeacon, deacon, and presbyter, to the position of patriarch. Ignatius was banished to Terentinah, but secured the support of many influential clergy, and wrote to the Pope demanding to be reinstated as patriarch. The supporters of Photius gained the victory, and he himself took the opportunity to create a breach between the Eastern and Western Churches, and, after calling together a synod in 867, he excommunicated the Pope. Shortly afterwards Michael III. was assassinated, and his successor recalled Ignatius, and caused Photius to be deposed, treated with ignominy, and imprisoned. He was released after a few years, returned to Constantinople, where he became reconciled to Ignatius, and became Patriarch on the death of the latter in 878. The Pope refused to recognize his claims, and he was regarded with dislike by the people;
Pietists.—A party in the Lutheran Church formed first about the middle of the seventeenth century at Leipzig by Spener. He considered that the Bible was neglected in the studies ordered for young men at the University, and organised lectures and meetings for its more careful study. His preaching at Strassburg, Frankfort, and Dresden had great effect, and he insisted on a holy life in both teachers and taught. For this purpose, he formed schools called Collegia Pietatis, where men and women met together for prayer and in-truction, and thence carried their influence throughout the land. The scheme was treated with some contempt, and those who took it up were nicknamed Pietists, on account of their alleged excessive piety as regards outward behaviour. The movement certainly did a great deal of good to society, instilling a purity of devotion in home life whose effects were lasting; and to it were due the foundation of German and Danish missions to the heathen. Amongst Spener's disciples were Francke (q.v.), Thomasius, the Professor of Leipzig and Halle, and Bengel, the great commentator. Their teaching gained ground at Leipzig, but some of the more extreme Pietists so irritated the old school of theologians by their denunciation of the mere doctrinism of many ministers in the Church, that at last the Docents were obliged to leave Leipzig. Frederick William I. of Brandenburg established the University of Halle in 1694, and through Spener's influence his friends found a refuge there, and it became the home of Pietistic professors, who first preached on Scripture and founded the great exegetical literature of Germany. Afterwards they came into collision with the University of Wittenberg. Little more is heard of the party in the history of the Church till the beginning of the present century, when it was at the height of its power. It was entirely the result of the new wave of Evangelical teaching which passed all through Europe about the same time—waking men's consciences, making them dissatisfied with the rationalistic creed which had been considered sufficient the century before, and counter-balancing the refined indifference to religion which we find in the works of Goethe and some of his contemporaries. The work was to a great extent carried on by a publication called the Evangelical Church Journal. The views held by the members of this party were decidedly narrow.

As a groundwork they took the teaching of either Luther or Calvin, but further proceeded to say, that those only who also held these views could hope to be saved; and it was in consequence of this that several famous and learned divines, Neander amongst others, refused to join their ranks. It was not to be expected that the various members in all parts of Germany [for it was in that country that Pietism was principally developed] would think exactly alike. One province wanted the work carried on in one way and another in another; and the consequence was that various communities were formed. The most famous of these was that which established itself at Kornthal, near Würtemberg. It was not in the least schismatic, taking the Augsburg Confession as its basis, but it made several minor alterations in the Lutheran Liturgy, and claimed absolute right to settle its own affairs independently of the ordinary ecclesiastical jurisdiction of Würtemberg. The community is still in a flourishing condition, the church well attended, and the agricultural department a pattern to the surrounding country. Some of the schools, too, are so famous that many boys from America and England are sent there for their education. The population at the present time is about 1,000.

Pilgrimage.—A religious discipline, which consists in making a journey to some place in order to adore the relics of a saint, or to visit the scene of some event in sacred history. Pilgrimages were first made about the fourth century, and speedily came into use as an effectual means of penance, the most celebrated places of devotion being Jerusalem, Rome, Tours and Compostella. The custom of going on pilgrimages reached its height about the eleventh and twelfth centuries, when it was followed by all classes of society from kings to peasants. The Church granted indulgences and special privileges to those who visited certain places of devotion, and some made it their calling in life to traverse from one shrine to another. At some places as at Loretto, and in our own days at Lourdes it was said that the Virgin Mary had appeared and ordained that they should be consecrated to her service; while at others relics of saints were said to exist which had wonderful powers for the healing or sanctification of those who visited them. In almost every country pilgrimages have been common. In England, the shrine of Thomas a Becket was the chief resort of the pious; in Scotland, St. Andrew's; in Ireland, various places. The practice has been discontinued among the Protestants, but is still in favour in Roman Catholic countries, and innumerable shrines are held sacred, and visited for the expiation of sins or the healing of infirmities. Pilgrimages are not confined to Roman Catholics; they are common among Mahometans.
Hindus, and Jews, and are connected with all kinds of superstitions.

Pilgrimage of Grace. [GRACE, PILGRIMAGE OP.]

Pilgrim Fathers.—The name usually given to those Nonconformist Puritans who first emigrated to New England. They had first fled from persecution in England to Holland, where small communities of Protestant Dissenters began to form about 1586; but a further impulse was given to the movement in 1608, when John Robinson and a small company of Independents, in spite of attempts to prevent their even leaving the country, also emigrated to Holland. There, however, their situation was forlorn in the extreme: the language and manners around them were strange, and they had to find subsistence under such disadvantages that—in the words of one of them—"poverty came upon them like an armed man from whom they could not fly." Removing to Leyden, and congregating together, they did better; but they hungered or their own language, and English laws and nationality. All the lands of North America had been granted to two great companies, known as the London and the Western; and about 1617 negotiations were opened with the London Company for power to form a distinct plantation of their own instead from any other. Both the King and the Bishops made great difficulties about eligion, to meet which the Puritans agreed to seven Articles assenting to the Confession of the Church of England and to the Royal supremacy; and in 1617 their patent was granted. They chartered the Speedwell of 10 tons from Delft Haven, and the Mayflower of 180 tons from the Thames; and on July 2nd, 1620, as many as the small vessel could accommodate—only a small minority—left Delft Haven under the care of William Brewster, John Robinson [q.v.], remaining behind to take charge of the remainder, till they could allow. They left, after a solemn leave-taking and religious service, for Southampton, where the Mayflower joined them, and they set sail; but twice had to put back for repairs to the small vessel—it was subsequently roved owing to misrepresentations of the captain. Finally the Mayflower alone left England, on Sept. 6th, 1620, and reached Cape Cod on Nov. 9th. There they bound themselves into a body politic, and sent a boat on an exploring expedition; and, finally, on Dec. 17th, 1620, they landed on Plymouth hook, to found the colony of New England, gain solemnly committing themselves to God in prayer.

Their chief leaders at that time were William Brewster, Elder of the Church; John Bradford, so often Governor of the colony; Edward Winslow, and Miles Standish, the military commander. The heaven was cloudy, the old severe, the rain and snow pitiless; and for several months their privations were extreme. For years they were threatened alternately by starvation and extermination by the savages; but how they triumphed over these obstacles constitutes largely the early history of the United States, and need not be recounted here.

On June 24th, 1629, another colony in unison with Plymouth was founded, under John Endicott, at Salem, Massachusetts. This colony included Francis Higginson, a Puritan who had been driven from the Anglican ministry for his opinions, and many like-minded, who desired to retain what they considered true in their historic Church. Higginson had said on deck to his people, as the English cliffs receded from view: "We do not go to New England as separatists from the Church of England, though we cannot but separate from the corruptions in it." But it soon appeared that the more rigid Puritans had no real conception of the toleration they claimed, and ere long all the prominent Anglican Puritans were violently seized and sent back to England. How this spirit grew is also, unfortunately, matter of history, and the rigidity of the persecution was rather increased than otherwise by the attempt to make the Church synonymous with the State, so that no man could have even rights of citizenship unless he were a communicant. The Book of Common Prayer became a "sinful violation of the worship of God," and the keeping even of Christmas Day was visited by a fine, as also was attendance at an Episcopal Church. Quakers were persecuted even to the death. Roger Williams was banished for no other crime than preaching full liberty of conscience, and the doors of Baptist meetings were nailed up. The simple fact is that none of the religious bodies—only a few rare spirits here and there—understood as yet religious toleration; and the history and deeds of the Pilgrim Fathers form a striking and somewhat grim proof of this. Much of their civil and religious system also failed. Their civil laws were copied closely from those of Moses; and the rebellion of human spirits against overstringtess produced at length a state of morals beneath the surface, which Cotton Mather vividly delineates. They also professed hyper-Calvinism almost without exception, a system which the human heart is never long able to bear without protest [see ELECTION], and thus, as at Geneva, so in America, many of the direct descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers are now Unitarians. But we may also study with profit, and even reverence, their better side—thier simplicity, their love to the truth as they saw it, their earnestness, their manly independence; and, remembering these, need not wonder at the part they played in the history of the world.

Pineda, John.—A Jesuit of noble birth, born at Seville about the middle of the sixteenth century. He was a good linguist, and wrote commentaries on various parts of the Bible, and some theological works. Died Jan. 27th, 1637.

Pinelli, Domenico [b. at Genoa, 1541; d. 1611], Cardinal, son of Paris Pinelli and Benedicta Spinola. He was educated as a lawyer, and his remarkable talents and learning brought him under the notice of Pope Pius V., who employed him in business at the Court. Pope Gregory XIII., successor to Pius V., had also a great regard for Pinelli, and promoted him to be Auditor of the Rota, Clerk of his Chapel, Chamberlain of the Church, and Cardinal. He also sent him as Legate to Roumania, which was in a state of disturbance, and which Pinelli succeeded in quieting. The Pope afterwards put him in command of the fleet, and intrusted him with the completion of the seventh book of Decretals. Pinelli wrote a tract concerning the Pope's authority, and an account of the lives of St. Francis and other saints.

Pinson, Francis, a lawyer [b. at Bourges, 1612, d. at Paris, 1691]. Most of his works deal with ecclesiastical law, the prerogative of the sovereign in disposing of ecclesiastical benefits, etc.

Pisa, Councils of.—The first Council of Pisa was summoned in 1409 to endeavour to restore the unity of the Church; it was unsuccessful, for instead of getting rid of the two contending Popes, Gregory XII. and Benedict III., it added a third to their number in the person of Alexander V. (Papal Schism.)

The second Council of Pisa was of little importance. It was summoned in 1511, in the time of Pope Julius II., ostensibly for the reformation of the Church. It arose out of a quarrel between the Pope and Louis XII. of France because the former refused to renew the League of Cambrai. The Council was composed chiefly of French clergy, and after a few sessions they removed to Milan, where they cited the Pope to appear, and on his refusal gave sentence of his suspension. Julius meantime held a Council of Italians in the Lateran, who excommunicated the members of the Council of Pisa. Louis soon after losing all his Italian conquests, had to submit, and the Council was at an end.

Piscina.—A small drain, or sink, near the altar in a church, generally placed in a niche in the wall, to receive and carry off the water in which the priest washed his hands, and also that used for rinsing the chalice.

Pistoia, Synod of.—A Council was held at Pistoia, in the north-east of Tuscany, in 1782, to consider some articles prepared by Leopold, the Grand Duke, who wished to introduce certain Jansenist changes in the discipline of the Tuscan Church. There were present 234 priests. Ricci, Bishop of Pistoia, was a great ally of Leopold, and the Jansenist doctrines of grace were approved of, principles of a spiritual democracy were asserted and decrees were passed condemning devotion to the Sacred Heart, missions, use of Latin in the Mass, etc., and ordering the destruction of altars and images. This led to a revolt of the people, Ricci had to resign his See in 1787 and seven years later Pope Pius VII. published a Bull, Auctorem fidei, condemning the Pistoian decrees, and Ricci had to recant.

Pits, John, was born at Alton, Hants, towards the close of the sixteenth century, and educated at Winchester, whence he was admitted to New College, Oxford. He became Roman Catholic, and went to study at Douay and afterwards at Rheims, where he was ordained priest. He retired into Lorraine, and was for some time confessor to the Duke of Cleve, daughter of the Duke of Lorraine. Pits died in 1616. He was the author of treatises De Beatitude, De Peregrinatione, De Illustribus Angliae Scriptoribus.

Pius.—There have been nine Popes bearing this name. [Popes.] Of these, the most important were the following:

Pius II. [Eneas Silvio Piccolomini] held the dignity from 1458 to 1464. He took a title of Pius in order to conjoin it with a former name Eneas. The Renaissance was in full swing, and Pius, following the fopish fashion, claimed for himself descent from Virgil's hero. It was much more serious that this fashion had extended itself in Italy to a revival of sheer heathenism, and Pius was not the only Pontiff whose religion was one of negotiations and infidelity. He was man of shameful life, lecherous in your avaricious and grasping in old age.

Pius IV., whose name before was Giovanni Angelo Medici, was born on East Day, 1499, in Milan. He studied law, and 1527 became Protonotary to the Curia and Clement VII. At the same time he gained the favour of the Cardinal Farnese, who having been raised to the Papedom and the name of Paul III., made use of him several embassies, conferred on him many benefices, and created him Cardinal on Apr. 8th, 1549. Julius III. made him Legate of an army against the Duke of Parma. Paul I. was, however, hostile to him; so he withdrew from Rome to his native town of Milan. Paul's death he was recalled, and raised the Papal Chair, being crowned on Jan. 6th 1560. He is chiefly noted as having opened the Council of Trent. Jan. 18th, 156 and in spite of great difficulties it closed Dec. 3rd, 1563. [Trent, Council of.] The well-known creed called the Creed of Pius IV., or the Tridentine Creed, was issued as an embodiment of all the doctrines defined in that Council. He died on Dec. 9th, 1563 having occupied the Chair nearly six years.
Pius V., whose name had been Michael Chisteri, was born at Bosco, in the Duchy of Milan, on Jan. 17th, 1504. He entered the Dominican Order, of which he became Professor, Preacher, and Superior, and afterwards was made Bishop of Satri and Cardinal by Paul IV. He was made Inquisitor-General of Lombardy, and was very zealous in repressing the Reformation. He became Bishop of Mondovi, and was chosen successor to Pius IV., Jan. 8th, 1566. He immediately set himself to regulate his house, to reform the clergy, and to enforce the decrees of the Council of Trent. Under his government the Inquisition exercised great severity. He aided Charles IX. of France in his war against the Protestants with an army of 1,400 foot and 700 horse. He excommunicated Queen Elizabeth, absolving her subjects from their allegiance. He also joined arms with the King of Spain, and took part in the Battle of Lepanto, Oct. 7th, 1571. He died May 1st, 1572, having been Pope for six years.

Pius VI. became Pope in 1775. The early days of his pontificate were embittered by his struggles between the Jesuits and the States of Europe. The Emperor Joseph II. made several enactments striking at their power: thus, in 1781, he dissolved all connection between the religious orders and their generals outside his dominions; in 1784 he evicted a tax on pilgrimages; in 1785 ordered the removal of side altars in churches, and in 1786 that the Mass should be said in the vernacular. But the Belgian revolution compelled him to see to the stability of his throne, and his ecclesiastical legislation came o nought. He died in 1790, but the Pope’s troubles were renewed with the outbreak of the French Revolution. The Pope fought in vain against the oath demanded of the priests by the Revolutionary Government, and he had to submit to terms from Bonaparte. For was this all: riots broke out in Rome, the Pope’s army was subjugated, and he was sent as a prisoner to Dijon, where he died in 1799.

Pius VII. succeeded him, and was able to establish a Concordat with France, and went, though unwillingly, to Paris to crown Napoleon. But their relations became more and more strained, and at length Napoleon made him a prisoner at the Vatican and carried him to Fontainebleau. He was forced to sign Concordat renouncing his temporal power: at afterwards repudiated it, and Napoleon said to acquiesce. He returned to Rome in 1814, and the strength which he had gained as proved by his being able to re-establish the Jesuits. [JESUITS.]

Pius IX. [b. 1792, d. 1878] was born at Nigaglia, May 13th, 1792. His name was Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti, and his family of Lombard extraction. He received his education at the Ecclesiastical College of Volterra, which he quitted in 1810. Five years later he entered the Guardia Noble of the Vatican; but he soon chose the ecclesiastical profession, was ordained, and for several years was chaplain to some hospitals in Rome, and enjoyed the good-will of Pius VII., though filling no post at his Court. In 1823 he went out in the suite of Monsignor Muzzi, Apostolic Vicar in Chili, and travelled over a considerable part of South America. On his return Leo XII. made him Prelate in his household, gave him a canonry in Santa Maria di Via Lata, and named him President of St. Michael’s Hospital in Via Grande. In 1827 he was created Archbishop of Spoleto, and in 1832 transferred to the See of Imola. In the interval Leo XII. had died [1829], and had been followed by Pius VIII., after whose death, in 1831, Gregory XVI. came to the throne. Those were years of great political commotion throughout Europe, and specially in Italy and the Roman States, where the successors of Pius VII. had departed from the mild and wise rule introduced at his restoration by Cardinal Consalvi, and had aggravated their temporal misrule by the reckless exercise of spiritual tyranny. The accession of Gregory was the signal for an insurrectionary outbreak in Central Italy, and Mastai-Ferretti, in his diocese of Spoleto, had to stand the brunt of the movement, and had no little trouble in assuaging the violent passions which raged around him; but his reputation as a man of liberal and benevolent opinions greatly aided him. His removal from the archbishopric of Spoleto to the bishopric of Imola was probably owing to the displeasure of Gregory at Mastai-Ferretti’s humane and enlightened views of a Pontifical Government. At Imola he remained true to his liberal views, and shone as a reformer of abuses, encouraging a more extensive knowledge in his diocesan seminary; he founded an Academia Bibliica, somewhat on the plan of the Protestant Bible Societies, aiming at the diffusion of Hebrew history and the discussion of Scriptural subjects. He enjoyed a great popularity in his diocese, where he was called “the good Bishop.” He was sent on a mission to Naples, and while there the cholera broke out, and he disposed of his plate and furniture in order to bestow their proceeds on the sufferers. He was made a Cardinal in 1840, assuming the title of St. Peter and St. Marcellinus, and continued to reside in his diocese till 1846, when Gregory XVI. died. The Conclave to elect his successor met on June 14th, and the two parties of the Sacred College had each their favourite candidate; those who wished for moderation choosing the Bishop of Imola, while those who clung to the old system put forward the Secretary of State, Cardinal Lambruschini. Mastai-Ferretti was elected by thirty-six out of the fifty voters present, and was crowned on June 21st, 1846, with the title of Pius IX. The first act of his pontificate was to release from their prison all the political offenders placed there by his predecessors, it is said to the number of 2,000; he recalled all exiles and restored them to their civil rights on the sole condition of their signing a declaration of allegiance. This act was received with acclamation, and created a perfect frenzy in the Catholic world throughout Europe. Austria and France, however, were greatly displeased at the Pope's measures of reform. In the great struggle of 1848 he refused to fight against Austria in defence of his Italian subjects, and on a rising of the populace in Rome he saw no way of safety except in flight, in which he was assisted by the Bavarian minister, Count Spaur, who conveyed him safely over the frontier, Nov. 24th, 1848. He took refuge at Gaeta, under the protection of Naples, and went thence to Portici, and it was not till April, 1850, that he returned to Rome. Pius IX. was now an altered man; he seemed to repent of his short whim of patriotism and liberalism, and he gave up all personal rule and allowed himself to be guided entirely by the unscrupulous Cardinal Antonelli, who had shared his exile, and whom he made his Secretary of State. The Pope felt that his political career on the throne had been a failure; but he still clung to the fond conceit that his pontificate was destined to eclipse the glory of his most renowned predecessors. So now he turned to the Church that attention which before his flight he had almost exclusively bestowed on the State. He summoned Jesuit theologians to his side, reconstituted their scattered order, and canonised saints, lavished indulgences, countenanced miracles, attempted and enforced conversions, marked out new dioceses in Protestant communities, and at last ventured on subtle polemic discussions and daring definitions of new dogmas. Thus, he proclaimed the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, Dec. 8th, 1854, and the doctrine of Papal Infallibility, July, 1870. By degrees his dominions were wrested from him, and on Sept. 20th, 1870, Rome itself, and with it ended the temporal power of Pius IX. The Vatican alone was left him, and to that palace and its garden he confined himself year after year. From thence he filled the world with his grievances by means of endless encyclical letters, freely printed in Italian and other newspapers. He lived to the age of eighty-six, dying Feb. 7th, 1878. His pontificate lasted thirty-six years, the longest on record.

Placet [placeatum regnum, regnum exequatur, littera paraxis].—A confirmation of Church law, Papal bulls, or briefs, formerly required to be given by the State before such law could be put into execution. This was made compulsory in England by the Statute of Premunire, 1393, which "vindicated the right of the Church of England to prohibit the admission or the execution of all Papal bulls or briefs within the realm." In the Roman Catholic Church it is no longer in force as regards matters of doctrine, ritual, or the Sacraments; in other matters it is simply limited to an appeal to the Pope, made by the bishops if any constitution appears to them to be unfitted for enforcement in their dioceses. The Pope denies the right of the State to interfere in ecclesiastical matters, and all will attempt to prevent the carrying out of Papal decrees. They are under a penalty of excommunication; but, nevertheless, concessions are occasionally made in order to prevent disturbance.

Platina, Bartholomeus [b. in Cremon 1421; d. at Rome, 1481]. He was the son of poor parents of the name of Sacchi, and the name of Platina refers to the place Platin or Piadena, where he was born. He went to Rome, where his talents brought him under the notice of Pope Pius II., who appointed him Apostolical Abbreviator; and Sixtus IV. afterwards made him Assistant Librarian of the Vatican. He wrote Operis in Vm Summorum Pontificum, published at Venice in 1479, which gives an account of the lives of the Popes from Eugenius IV. to the death of Paul II. He died of the plague at Rome. He wrote a history of the city Mantua and other works.

Plato, the greatest writer of health and philosophy, was born at Athens B.C. 429. The details of his early life little is known. He was well educated, and devoted the early years of his life to writing poetry; but at the age of twenty became acquainted with Socrates [q.v.], and in consequence gave up poetry, and devoted the rest of his life to the study of philosophy. It is related that he discussed the biographer of the Greek philosopher that once upon a time Socrates dreamed that he found an unledged cymnet on his km in a few moments it became winged, a flew away, uttering sweet sounds. Next day Plato came, and Socrates felt his dream filled. From that time Plato became identified with his master that his individuality is almost lost. Some of the writings attributed to him are certainly spurious, though some fragments of them may be genuine giving us some information respecting travels in Sicily. The form which Plato chose to express his philosophy, that of the dialogue was not an invention intended to present truth in attractive form. It was because desirous from his heart to elucidate truth and give to all sides full consideration. His doubts and objections are frivolous but they are such as suggest themselves many minds, and, therefore, have to be read. "The dialogues of Plato," says an Engl.
philosopher, "are literally an education explaining to us how we are to deal with our own minds, how far we are to humour them, how far we are to resist them; how they are to entertain the glimpses of light which sometimes fall upon them; how they are to make their way through the complications and darkness in which they so often feel themselves lost. Nowhere but in the sacred oracles do we find an author so cognisant of our own perplexities, so little anxious to hide them from us; may, so anxious to awaken us to the consciousness of them, in order that we may be delivered from them. Herein lies the art of Plato. Most consummate art it is we dimit; superior in the depth of insight which must have led to it, and in the influence which it exerts, to that which is displayed in almost any human composition. Still, it is not art, in the sense commonly given to that word; it has no independent purpose of deceiving. It does not work underground, leaving the ordinary man to feel its effects imply, and the thoughtful man to judge of its character by its effects. On the contrary, it anxiously draws your attention to its own methods and contrivances: that you should enter into them, and understand all the springs of values that are at work, is as much the writer’s ambition as that you should accept any one of the final results. Indeed, he does of acknowledge the result as yours, till in the region of your own inner being you have one through the processes which lead to it."

The fundamental principle of Plato’s doctrine is probably that which was known to the choolmen as that of Universals [q.v.], i.e. the assertion that there is a constant character which repeats itself in every sample of any natural kind, an invariable attribute, which sakes that object what it is, whilst individual embers of that class have variable accidents. He essential attribute he called the idea—that was the ultimate reality. No object that comes before us in the physical world completely fulfils our idea. I have an idea of a man, but no one man fulfils the whole idea; then I hear the word “man.” But so far as the thing coalesces with the thought, the ideal essence is present. And these ideals or, in rank, the lower rise into the higher, ten until they reach One Supreme, in whom all ideas and all thoughts are centred. Dr. Aristotle in his masterly and exhaustive examination of the Platonic philosophy thus scrutinises its main principles:

"[1] The proper end of man is not pleasure or the attainment of the sensitive nature, but a good which may run counter to this, and the chief elements of which are truth, beauty, right. These are to be sought on their own account as having intrinsic and ultimate worth. [2] This good, though including the first regulation of the active principles of conduct, does not terminate here, but takes in also the right direction of the rational powers. [3] The good which supplies the proper human aim is not merely subjective and dependent on the constitution of the human faculties; it has an objective reality, which would remain though we were not. Ere anything perishable arose, it was. It existed separately, and justifies, therefore, its assumption of the name God. [4] This highest good exists in us and out of us. Its various types, embodied in the visible universe, are also indigenous treasures of the human mind, which has pre-existed as well as they, and been familiar with them in an earlier state. Whatever is good is evolved from us by appeal to memory; virtue is learning, and learning is remembrance. [5] It follows from this that our relation to God as the Divine ground and source of the universe is a relation of likeness, arising from identity of essence—of the little to the great, the mixed and disguised to the pure and clear, the partial copy to the perfect original." [Types of Ethical Theory, vol. i. pp. 84–86.] The learned author shows in a very grand passage which follows where the Platonic idea fell short of the Christian.

Platonism has been made by Providence one of the most powerful handmaids of Christianity. It underlies the grand philosophy of the apocryphal books of "Ecclesiasticus" and the "Wisdom of Solomon," writings of Alexandrian Jews who had drunk deep of the Platonic writings. Philo’s teaching concerning the Logos was derived from the same source, and St. John was inspired to show how far he was right, and how the ideals had been fulfilled in the Incarnate Word. The Alexandrian divinity was Platonic [NEO-PLATONISTS; CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA], and some of the greatest of English philosophers have drawn their doctrines from the same fountains. [Coleridge. See next article.]

Platonists, Cambridge.—In the seventeenth century a number of graduates, fellows, tutors, and masters of colleges in the Cambridge University, most of them from Emmanuel College, revived the study of Plato and his philosophy, and therefore were called the Cambridge Platonists. They were chiefly of Puritan origin and sympathies, but their great aim was to sink all minor differences and endeavour to find a basis of broad Catholic Christian views, in which charity should be the living principle. They were true and devoted Churchmen and believed all the Christian doctrines, yet looked on them from a Platonic point of view, endeavouring to assimilate the doctrines of Plato, and to apply to them the distinctive Christian doctrines. The four chief Platonists were Benjamin Whichcote, John Smith, Henry More, and Ralph Cudworth, accounts of whom will be found under their several names.
Among the minor members were Simon Patrick, John Worthington, while some members of Oxford University, as Joseph Glanvil and John Wilkins, were also so closely connected with the Cambridge Platonists that they are counted as belonging to the same school of thought.

Plenary Indulgence is the remission of all the temporal punishment due to sin. [Indulgences] Plenary indulgences are granted in England at the eight great festivals of the Roman Church, and are sometimes granted by the Pope to the whole Church on solemn occasions, such as a jubilee. They may also be gained by the recitation of certain prayers, or by the performance of good works prescribed by the Church, provided that the person desirous of gaining them be in a state of grace, and penitent for the sins committed. It is also believed that plenary indulgences can be granted to the dead for the remission of the pains of purgatory. Plenary indulgences have been granted largely to confraternities, to the use of certain crucifixes and rosaries, and to pilgrimages to the chief churches at Rome or elsewhere.

Pliny the Younger—so called to distinguish him from his uncle, the celebrated naturalist, whose adopted son he was, and who perished in the great eruption of Vesuvius—was a disciple of Quintilian, and appears to have been, though a heathen, an amiable and just, as well as an able and learned man. He was the friend and favourite of the Emperor Trajan, and while Consul, he delivered in the Senate a panegyric on his patron, which is still extant. In A.D. 103 he was sent as Governor to Bithynia, and there found a state of things which alarmed him. The progress of Christianity had been such that the heathen temples were almost deserted, and the sellers of victims for sacrifice could find no purchasers for their wares; people of both sexes, of all ages and ranks, had adopted the "foreign superstition." And this was not confined to the cities—it had spread to villages and rural districts.

There was then, probably, no definite enactment directed against the Christians; but, nevertheless, they were generally treated as offenders. Their refusal to worship the image of the Emperor, or to sacrifice to idols for his safety, and, more than all, their nocturnal meetings, caused them to be suspected of disaffection towards the Government. Besides this, it was popularly reported and believed that they practised abominable and revolting rites at their secret meetings: for instance, that they were in the habit of killing new-born infants, tearing them in pieces, and drinking their blood. These fictions, though they may not have been believed by Pliny, could not but heighten the feelings of suspicion and dislike with which the Christians were regarded. Accordingly Pliny never doubted that it was his duty to punish Christians, but he was uncertain as to the amount of punishment and the mode of trial. To satisfy his mind he addressed the Emperor a letter [Ep. 96, book x.], which is famous as containing a testimony to the piety and good general character of the Christians, a testimony which is peculiarly valuable as coming from an enemy, and one who had thoroughly investigated the subject.

In this Epistle he makes particular inquiry on three main points: [1] whether young and old should receive the same punishment; [2] whether those who recanted should be pardoned; and [3] whether the very fact of being a Christian was in itself an offence, although no other crime could be brought home to the person charged. He then goes on to describe what had hitherto been his own method of procedure: First, he asked the accused if they acknowledged themselves Christians. Next, if they did not deny the accusation, he repeated the question, with a threat of punishment for refusing to renounce their opinions. If they still adhered to their profession, ordered them to be led away to execute "never doubting that stubbornness and flexible obstinacy ought to be punished." He states that he had examined several agai whom anonymous charges had been prefered but these all abjured Christianity, involv the gods, offered supplications with wine frankincense to the image of the Emperor and reviled the name of Christ, "with a multitude of which things," he says, "can they be really Christians be induced to compl Some of these persons, however, confess that they had once been Christians, but long recanted, some as long as twenty ye before. From them he gathered the follow particulars concerning the superstition:—adherents were in the habit of meeting gether on a fixed day before it was li singing hymns to Christ as a God, and bind themselves with an oath to abstain from th and adulteries. Then they separated, met again to eat bread, which last prac however, was given up when he published Emperor's edict forbidding secret assemb This account was confirmed in every ticular by two paid-servants, whom he examined by torture.

Trajan, in answer, assured Pliny that approved of the measures he had taken instructed him that search was not to be n for Christians: but those who were brot before him were to be executed unless they recanted. If they recanted they were forgiven. He added that anonymous accions were to be disregarded.

These letters are included amongst Plin Epistles, a collection of his correspondence ten books. Their genuineness has been q tioned, but there is no foundation for doubt.
Pluralities Act.—By the statutes 1 and 2 Vict., cap. 106, and 13 and 14 Vict., cap. 98, it is now illegal for a clergyman to hold more than one benefice and one cathedral preferment at the same time. In 1885 was passed the Pluralities Amendment Act.

The chief provisions of this Act are as follows:—

[1] The definition of "ecclesiastical duties," which are stated to include not only the regular and due performance of Divine Service on Sundays and Holy Days, but also all such duties as any clergyman holding a benefice is bound to perform, the performance of which is solemnly promised by every clergyman of the Church of England at the time of his ordination, and shall have been required of him by the bishop.

[2] A commission to consider any complaints for inadequate performance of the "ecclesiastical duties" of any benefice is for the future to consist of four members—one the archdeacon or rural dean; one a canon residentiary, prebendary, or honorary canon elected by the dean and chapter for three years; one a beneficed clergyman of the archdeaconry wherein the benefice is situated, elected by the beneficed clergy of such archdeaconry to serve for three years; one a layman in the commission of the peace for the county nominated by chairman of quarter sessions or lord lieutenant.

To such commission the incumbent complained of may add another commissioner, being either an incumbent of the diocese or a magistrate.

Another point in the Act is that the bishop may assign to any curate or curates, under certain circumstances, a sum not exceeding twenty pounds beyond that allowed now to curates in the care of non-resident incumbents, provided that such stipend or stipends shall not exceed the whole net annual income of the benefice.

Another provision enables the bishop to assign a stipend of not exceeding £200 to a curate during vacancy of a benefice.

Another gives power under special circumstances to the bishop to require an incumbent, even though resident, to nominate a curate to serve with him in the duties of the cure.

But it is provided that any clergyman may like and hold together, under due legal sanction, any two benefices, the churches of which are within four miles of one another by the nearest road, and the annual value of one of which does not exceed two hundred pounds.

Plymouth Brethren.—The name generally given, but not acknowledged by them (who call themselves simply "Brethren"), to a sect now divided into several, which sprang into existence without any precise date between the years 1826 and 1830; which has spread considerably in England, America, and the Continent, and which presents in its history, and not least in its errors and mistakes, points of considerable interest. Strange as it may appear in a body now become almost a byword for sectarian bitterness, the movement took its rise in a sincere desire after more Christian union amongst different denominations, informal meetings being held at private houses for united study of the Scriptures, and mutual edification on grounds common to all. This took place at first chiefly in Ireland, especially in Dublin, where the Anglican Church itself, as natural from local circumstances, possessed at that time a marked ultra-Protestant character. A little later it appeared, to some taking part in these meetings [nearly all of whom practically held Zwinglian views concerning the Lord's Supper], that there was "nothing in Scripture" to hinder those thus meeting together from celebrating the Lord's Supper amongst themselves; and this began to be done, one of the most prominent in these Proceedings being Mr. Anthony Norris Groves, a gentleman who afterwards gave up a dentist's practice worth £3,000 a year to go out as a missionary to Bagdad. About the year 1830 the movement was joined by the Rev. J. N. Darby, born in 1800, and a graduate of Trinity College, Dublin, who up to 1827 had been a curate in the Church of England and Ireland, but who had left that body from conscientious motives. Darby's strong character and considerable gifts in the exposition of Scripture gave him almost at once a commanding influence, and from the date of his accession the movement spread rapidly, especially at Plymouth, where he was joined by the Rev. Benjamin Wills Newton, another Anglican clergyman of great popularity, and the Rev. James L. Harris. Another early accession was the well-known Dr. Samuel Prideaux Tregelles.

Meeting at first on a footing of perfect equality as above stated, the body adopted, almost as a matter of course, the views of Friends [q.v.] in regard to ministry, except that they have never allowed women to exercise ministerial gifts. They also adopted the practice, almost from the first, of a weekly observance of the Lord's Supper. At this observance one of the elder brethren recites St. Paul's account of the institution, in the manner usual among Dissenting bodies, and offers prayer and thanks before partaking of each of the elements. These are passed round from hand to hand, the bread being unseparated and a piece broken off by each in turn, as in their opinion a fitter symbol of the "One Bread" of which all partake. Their public ministry consists largely of exposition of the Scriptures, and there is usually considerable singing [without instrumental aid] and prayer in their meetings. Their theology is almost universally of a strong Calvinistic type, with in many places a considerable leaning to Antinomianism, and the majority of the communities hold Baptist views, and administer that Sacrament by immersion, though Mr. Darby himself and some of his followers advocated and practised infant baptism. As a rule Brethren are strong believers in what is known as the "literal and verbal" inspiration of the Scriptures, and accordingly study its letter with assiduity, and possess a large amount of Scripture knowledge of a certain kind, but with a strong tendency to mystical interpretation. The majority of them have generally held millenarian views respecting the second Advent of Christ.

As Methodists have their "class meetings" and Moravians their "love-feasts," so Brethren still maintain very commonly what they call "reading-meetings." Some of these are held in a public room; but ordinarily a more limited circle meet for tea at the house of one of their number, after which prayer is offered, and a portion of Scripture being read verse by verse, a general conversation takes place upon each verse, under the practical but informal presidency of one or more of the most experienced members present.

For eight or ten years Brethrenism spread rapidly: but from a very early period Darby's peculiar temperament led him to insist upon the duty of "coming out from among the sects," a view of Christian conduct which was foreign to the original intention, but was later formulated in a pamphlet entitled, Separation from Evil God's Principle of Unity. It was not perceived that, since the very "sects" themselves never professedly drew off from one another, but on many occasions sought to show and to profess their essential unity, to act thus was not only to establish a new sect, but to make it the most sectarian of any.* Brethren themselves, however, remained apparently united till about 1845, when Darby returned to England after some years' absence on the Continent, and at once accused Newton at Plymouth of taking too prominent a part in the meetings, and thus reviving "clericalism." On this ground Darby set up a rival meeting to that under Newton's influence, and two years later formally excommunicated Newton and his adherents on the ground of heretical doctrine. This was not without some foundation; for Newton, led away by the literal application to Christ (according to methods of interpretation common amongst Brethren) of every passage in the Messianic Psalms, had undoubtedly taught that our Lord (though taking the position with and on behalf of man, and entirely in grace) commenced his human life under the dissatisfaction of His Father, from which He had to work His way up, by His perfect obedience, to a position of acceptance. There can, however, be no doubt that Darby's own proceedings were embittered by the personal rivalry which had sprung up two years before; and this was shown more clearly the following year, when Darby demanded that large meeting, held at "Bethesda" chapel in Bristol, should agree in excommunicating ipso facto, all coming from Newton's meeting at Plymouth, failing which he excommunicated them also. The Bristol Brethren were then presided over by Mr. George Müller, educated as a missionary to the Jews, and the Rev. Henry Craik, born and educated in Scotland as a Baptist minister, both of whom possessed great influence, and who held that it was sufficient to examine into any allegations as actually held by each individual whenever he sought fellowship with them. There were now a Newtonian party, a Darbyite party (called "exclusives"), and a neutral party. There was another sescention many years later under a former clergyman named Cluff, who adopted Perfectionist views; and only in 1881, the year before his death, Darby was forsaken by Mr. William Kelly, one of his most earnest fellow-workers and partisans up to then through the whole of his stormy history. Before this, however, there had been numerous secessions and sub-division of smaller magnitude, so that in a city like Bath there were at one time no less than five if not six, distinct sects of "Brethren."

Most of these divisions have taken place concerning mysterious points as to the nature or work of Christ, and in their result have been unparalleled for the bitter feeling evoked. A case came to the knowledge of the present writer in which husband and wife taking different sides on such questions, had refused to speak or hold any intercourse for years, even refusing to sit down to eat in company; and such results amongst old and dear friends have been counted by scores.

It is remarkable that Darby himself, toward the close of his life, taught, in print, doctrines which is absolutely indistinguishable from that for which he had excommunicate Newton many years before, being led to it exactly the same way, and being left to some of his old adherents on that account but to the last he spoke and wrote of his own exclusive communion as "the Church of God on earth," and as the sole true representative of that mystical body. The majority of the Brethren, however, have not carried the pretensions, extreme as they are, to such length as this.

The feeling of resentment cherished to ward Plymouth Brethren by most other denominations may be partly accounted for by the facts above stated, but not entirely. More active cause for it consists in the fact that the body has in the main always directed its propagandist efforts far less towards the large residuum which unhappily lies outside of all Churches, than to those professing Christianity in Churches already existing; some of them have gone so far as to openly vow that their mission is "to the awakened in the Churches," and such efforts as they do make in mission work or city evangelisation are as a rule singularly unsuccessful. It is his which has brought upon them the common reproach of being "sheep-stealers rather than shepherds." Their want (in general) of evangelistic success, may possibly be due to the fact that public opinion amongst Brethren requires in every "gospel address" a complete statement of what is considered the whole plan and conditions of salvation, embodied in certain customary phrases, which naturally, by frequent repetition, lose their power over the hearts of men.

The movement, and the history of the body, are of peculiar interest in several respects. It was remarkable, to begin with, or the number of clergymen who took part in it, and who still adhere to it from time to time; and by some strange law of sympathy which it is difficult to understand, it seems also to have peculiar attractions for officers of the army and members of the aristocracy.

It is also remarkable for reviving, in the nineteenth century, those passionate and bitter dissensions respecting mysterious points in the nature, work, or consciousness of theavion, which were so conspicuous a feature in the post-Apostolic age, showing a feverish intellectual activity in the same direction: early all their bitter divisions can be traced to this, and the remainder are due to those personal rivalries which also stand out so clearly in the earlier centuries of Christianity.

It is remarkable that a movement begun in the age that has more Christian communion, should have ended in such a different manner; and is peculiarly suggestive to compare its story with that of the Friends [q.v.]. The writer, who adopted many of the same peculiar views, and who began amid the antagonism of all around them, provoked by their intense aggressiveness, have now settled down to one of the most popular and unobtrusive denominations; whilst the Brethren, commencing their career in apparently the most ciable and kindly manner, have developed the manner above shown. How far Mr. Arby's strong personality, exerting its influence for over fifty years, during the whole of the movement up to 1882, brought about such results, it is yet too early to consider; but one lesson which does stand out most prominently is the utter insufficiency of the strongest "literal" views as to the inspiration of the Scriptures to prevent the most hopeless divergence. It will also have been noticed, that while the fullest "liberty ministry" is claimed and practised, very any of those really prominent in the movement were either actual members of, or had received special training for, the regular ministry in other Churches.

It will be supposed from the above that practice as well as doctrine differs amongst Plymouth Brethren to a considerable extent, and also that there must be another side to such a dark picture. The diligent study of Scripture, though not always on wise methods, and the earnest Christian lives of the majority, are worthy of emulation by other denominations. They support (their own) foreign missions largely in proportion to their numbers, and very generally maintain their own poor. Some meetings recognise no paid ministry at all, while others do recognise some as having given themselves entirely to the service of the Church, and such are supported by the congregations; but always by voluntary contributions, usually dropped anonymously into boxes at the doors. Expenses of their meeting-houses are met in the same way. Some large congregations, such as those in connection with "Bethesda" at Bristol (now grown into three or four large meetings), might in practice be almost described as ordinary Baptist Churches "with an open ministry and weekly communion," and have very friendly relations with the other Churches around them; but this is the exception.

It is impossible to give the numbers of Brethren, because many of them object to make any returns; indeed, a distinct majority of individual members even object to give a vote, or take any part in civic affairs, though this is no part of the system. Their numbers are, however, unquestionably extending, and in all large cities, several large meetings are generally to be found. In London, estimates vary between 15,000 and 25,000 in Church-fellowship, and in Bristol there are about 1,500, not including non-members or children in the same families. On the Continent they are strongest in French Switzerland, but have meetings and missions in all the European countries.

The literature of Brethrenism is very voluminous. Mr. Darby's own works have been published in 32 vols., and their doctrinal tracts and controversial or expository pamphlets can only be numbered by hundreds, the greater part of which, however, have passed into oblivion.

Pocock, Edward, D.D., a famous Orientalist [8. 1604, d. 1631], was born, educated, and died at Oxford. In 1630 he went to Aleppo, where he made a collection of Oriental manuscripts and coins at the request of Archbishop Laud; he continued his researches for two years in Constantinople. In 1636 he became Professor of Arabic at Oxford, and in 1643 Rector of Childrey, in Berkshire; in 1648
Canon of Christ Church. He was famed for his knowledge of Oriental languages, and for his valuable collection of antiquities, and wrote numerous works, antiquarian as well as theological. Among the latter are various commentaries on books of the Old Testament, and he translated the English Liturgy into Arabic.

Penitentiale.—A manual for priests, relating to the subjects of confession and penance.

Poggio Bracciolini [b. 1380, d. 1459] was secretary to no less than eight Popes, holding his office for nearly half a century. He was appointed by Boniface IX., and held office during the great schism, attending Pope John XXIII. to the Council of Constance. He is honourably known to posterity as the visitor to monasteries and the discoverer of several important MSS., some of them works up to that time supposed to be lost. He witnessed the martyrdom of Jerome of Prague, and wrote a vivid account to his lifelong friend Bruni, in which he expressed his pity and admiration of the martyr so strongly that Bruni wrote back to warn him to suppress his feelings, lest he should share a like fate. After the Council was dissolved he went to England, whether in disgust at the corruption of the Papal Court (as some assert) is unknown, but he was the guest of Cardinal Beaufort. In some of his letters he gives amusing accounts of English life and character, not flattering to us. He soon returned to Italy, and resumed his duties, but sat somewhat loose to them, spending much time at Florence, and continuing his quest for MSS. He wrote some essays and disquisitions against the vices of the clergy, and especially of the monks, but his own writings are much disfigured by licentiousness. After fifty years' service he finally retired from the Court, and wrote the history of Florence. There he died, and was buried with great honours in the church of Santa Croce. His varied life, his high position, the services which he rendered to literature, and his own works, made him one of the most remarkable literary men of the fifteenth century.

Points, Hebrew.—The Hebrew points which stand for vowels have led to great controversies. It was generally believed that they were added by Ezra to the Chaldee alphabet, till Elias Levi, a German Jew, contradicted this opinion about the sixteenth century. He was upheld by Louis Cappell, a French Protestant and Hebrew Professor at Saumur [d. 1658], who in Arearum Functa-tiones Revelatun, and Diatriba de Veris et Antiquis Hebraorarium Litteris maintained the comparatively recent introduction of the Hebrew points. He was opposed by the Buxtorfs, father and son, the former of whom [d. 1629] wrote Concordantia Bibliorum Hebraicæ et Chaldaicæ, and the latter [d. 1664], De Literarum Hebraicarum genuina Antiquitate, and De Punctatorum Origine, etc. In later time Dr. Humphrey Prideaux [d. 1724] wrote an extensive work on this subject, and endorsed Cappell’s opinions that the vowel points were invented by the Masorites shortly after Ezra’s time, but were not received in the public schools till after the composings of the Talmud.

Pole, Reginald, Cardinal and Archbishop of Canterbury [b. in Sussex, March, 1500; d. Lambeth, Nov. 18th, 1558, within a few hours of the death of Queen Mary]. He was nearly related to royalty through his mother, Margaret, Countess of Salisbury, the niece of Edward IV., and was educated at the King’s expense at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and afterwards in Italy, where he remained from 1520 to 1523. Though not ordained until many years later, Pole held several ecclesiastical appointments, whence he derived a large income; but in 1535 he lost the through the publication of a book called. Unitate Ecclesiae, in which he expressed his disapproval of the project for the King’s divorce from Catharine of Arragon. So afterwards he started for Rome, when Pope Paul III., having made him a Cardinal, sent him to assist in the scheme which was being formed in the Netherlands to dethrone King Henry. The plot failed, and Pole received other commissions in Spain and elsewhere; but he was generally looked upon with suspicion as a traitor, and his mother and brothers were put to death by Henry VIII., 1541, on the charge of being concerned in his treason. He returned to England in 1547 on the accession of Queen Mary, was made Archbishop of Canterbury, received by England to Papal allegiance in a solemn ceremonial held in Old Palace Yard, and devoted himself to the task of restoring the Popish authority in England. How far he is held responsible for the persecution which blackened Mary’s unhappy reign is a disputed question. Mr. Froude is convinced that he was the mainspring of the cruel Archbishops Parker called him Cornifer flagellum Ecclesiae Anglicanae, “the hangman and scourge of the English Church.” was, nevertheless, believed by many to secretly attached to Lutheranism, especially to the doctrine of Justification by Faith, the book Del Beneficio di Genu Christi Conf. has been attributed to him. He had actually received the majority of votes for the Pope on the death of Pope Paul III. in 1549, was debarred from the honour on the false of holding heretical opinions. He was summoned in 1557 to answer to the charge before the Inquisition, but he died before the pointed date of the trial, and was proclaimed by the tribunal after his death a heretic, personal character was irreprouachable, Froude says that he was enormously v.

* Polygamy. *—Though the law of Moses did not forbid polygamy, the spirit of the Jewish religion was clearly and unmistakably against the practice, and before the time of Christ monogamy had come to be regarded as God's appointment to man. When Christianity was first preached in the world, however, polygamy was in practice among heathens, and, as we shall presently see, there is good reason for assuming that it was not made a bar to admission to Christianity any more than was the holding of slaves, and that it was the spirit of Christianity, and not enactments, which finally drove it out of the Church.

In the last century a London clergyman (no other than the author of the popular hymn, "Lo, He comes in clouds descending"), observing with sad eyes the prevalence of immorality and the wide extent of female dishonour, wrote a work entitled Theophilobora, in which he maintained that cases of seduction should necessitate marriage, and thus, that polygamy should be legalised in the interest of morality. This singular book is now only remembered as having called forth an indignant satire of Cowper against it. Few nowadays would believe that such a doctrine could obtain in a Christian country. But another question has arisen of a very serious character. Polygamy is in use among the Mohammedans and in heathen countries; and it is a difficult and much debated question what attitude ought to be taken by the Christian Church with respect to converts from heathenism who have a plurality of wives. Bishop Colenso, before publishing his works on the sacred narrative which made his name so prominent in theological controversy, had boldly expressed his conviction that a Caffre or Zulu who embraced the Gospel ought not to be compelled to put away his wives before being admitted to baptism. And ever since then, the question has been a moot point among those who are engaged in missionary work. At the Wakefield Church Congress held in October, 1886, the subject was somewhat fully discussed, and by giving an abstract of the arguments used there, we shall be enabled to see what is the prevailing opinion in the Anglican Church at the present time. The Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Bickersteth, read the first paper. He first, by a careful induction of passages from the Old Testament, proved what we have already stated, that it became more and more apparent to the Jewish mind that polygamy was opposed to the original institution of marriage and to the Divine Will. He quoted among other passages Ps. cxx.vii.; Prov. v. 15-18; Eccl. ix. 9; Mal. ii. 14, 15; Mark x. 5-9; 1 Cor. vii. 3; Eph. v. 25-32.

"Bearing these Scriptures in mind," he went on, "we may confidently say that Christianity, as it prevails, will assuredly in time abolish polygamy, as it abolishes all other social evils. But the question which now presses for a definite answer in so many of our mission fields is not whether a Christian convert from among the heathens or Moslems may after his baptism take to himself more wives than one, because the practice is legal among his heathen or Mohammedan fellow-countrymen. This we should all refuse him, as contrary to the law of Christ and his baptismal vow. But the question is, ought a man who has married more wives than one in the days of his heathen or Mohammedan darkness to be refused Christian baptism if he will not put away all wives but one? And ought the second, or third, or fourth wife of such a man to be refused baptism if she will not leave her husband?" The Bishop then quoted General Gordon, as saying that he could convert all Africa with ease if a continuance of polygamy to such an extent might be allowed. Then, having said that missionaries in general appear to refuse baptism to those converts who decline to put away all wives but one, he proceeds to ask, "If, then, the man determines to be baptised at any cost, the terrible question must arise, which wife must he retain, and what is to become of those he rejects? Suppose a not improbable case. A man has three wives, the first old and childless, the second the mother of all his children, the third the last married and the best beloved. And yet this is the sore necessity to which some would reduce the catechumen who desires baptism." Henry Venn has answered, that as the first marriage only is legal the first wife must be kept, and the others repudiated as unlawful connections.

"But," says the Bishop, "does this hold good? In the case supposed, the convert would have no choice. But surely the second marriage is as much a marriage, according to the laws of the country in which the matrimonial contract was made, as the first marriage and the first wife. When Jacob had married Leah and Rachel, would he have been right to put away the mother of Joseph on the plea that the first marriage was the only true marriage? I trow not. In saying this, I do not justify polygamy, but there are contracts, legal according to the laws of the country where those contracts are made, though mingled with human infirmity, and in themselves harmful to the contractor, which, when once ratified, honesty and honour, fidelity to God and man, forbid him to violate. Such contracts, the legal marriage of a polygamist before his conversion appear to be. And he who 'swareth to his neighbour, and disappointeth him not, though it be to his own hindrance, is among those who the inspired Psalm assures us shall never fall.'

The Bishop then refers to 1 Tim. iii. 2, Tit. i. 6, where it is ruled that the bishop must be "the husband of one wife"—a passage which the earliest commentators were unanimous in interpreting as forbidding a simultaneous polygamist to hold the pastoral office, as implying that a convert who had married more wives than one were compelled to put them away; yea, that divorces would have been doing wrong in producing bad consequences in domestic life, and increasing the opposition of the powers to Christianity. And the Bishop comes to the resolution, "I would admit polygamist to baptism, but if a baptised convert took to himself more wives than I think he ought to be excommunicated. This discipline faithfully observed in case of a conversion of a tribe or nation to Christianity, would stamp out polygamy in single generation." We have only given main points of an elaborate and exhaustive paper. The Bishop of Zululand thought the other hand, that polygamists should be baptised. If Christianity was in the habit of abolishing polygamy by its own inherent force, that force must not be allowed to become less by any means of ours. Heathen marriage contract was not a covenant he could at present recognise. The Rev. R. Johnson, a native missionary of West Africa, took the same view. "The question whether they would be laying too great a burden upon a convert in requiring him to give up all his wives but one before he was baptised. But if polygamy was degrading to manhood, and injurious to man's character, and if baptism was a matter of inward grace and consecration to God, in his opinion, they had no right to advise polygamy into the Christian Church. Rev. J. Faithfull, who concluded the meeting, said he hoped that nobody would entertain the idea that the Bishop of Exeter or any other churchman, wished to restore marriage. The question was simply a practical one. Some persons were not quite clear that Scripture explicitly forbade a polygamist to be baptised, and his opinion whether they would have a right to withhold baptism to a polygamist convert without calling him to put away all his wives but one, felt that under certain circumstances putting away might be itself an immoral

Polyglot [Gr. polya, "many," and glotta, tongue"]).—The name given to two or more versions of the Bible arranged side by side.
The polyglots seem to have existed from very early ages. The ancient editions of the New statement which appeared in the first ten nuries, and which contain the Greek and vacular languages, are sometimes wrongly amed polyglot. The name is also sometimes ed for the Hexapla of Origen, which ains the Hebrew text and six Greek rions. The Polyglots, properly so called,
e the four greater and the many lesser poly-nts. The four greater are the Compluten-
, the Antwerp, the Parisian, and the ondon.

The Complutensian Polyglot [so called be-use it was printed at Alcala da Henares, Latin name of which is Complutum] was ared at the cost of Cardinal Ximenes by ous Spanish scholars between the years and 1517, but was not published till
. It is in six volumes, of which the first contain the Old Testament, the fifth the
and, the sixth Hebrew and Chaldee mars and lexicons. It gives six different
: the Hebrew, the Chaldee, Onkelos's rum, the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and Greek New Testament. There are also al Latin translations of the Chaldee and ptuagint Greek versions.

The Antwerp Polyglot was published there 1569 and 1572 by the famous printer istothe Plantin, at the cost of King lip II. of Spain, under the direction of dict Arias Montanus. It is in eight mes, and contains, besides what is in Complutensian Version, the Chaldee Para-se upon the other books of the Old ment, with the Latin interpretation of Syriac. The eighth volume, which has Hebrew and Greek texts with the Latin ion of Pagninus, altered in a few ces by Arias, has been often reprinted.
Polyglot is not of very much value, as depends very much on the Complutensian alterations are made from some

The Paris Polyglot, the largest of the poly-ts, was published in Paris in 1646 at the dence and under the superintendence of Michel le Jay. It is in ten large folio mes, and contains, besides the versions in Antwerp Polyglot, Syriac and Arabic ions, arranged by some Maronites from ne, the Samaritan Pentateuch, and another aritan version, each with a literal Latin translation. It contains many defects, and has little critical value.

The London Polyglot was published in 54–7 in London in six volumes. It was ited by Brian Walton, afterwards Bishop of chester. There are two sets of copies—the Republican [1657], those dedicated to Oliver romwell, and the Loyal [1660], which were dicated to Charles II. on his accession.
The work engaged all the most learned men in land for many years. It contains Hebrew, maritan, Greek, Arabic, Chaldee, Ethiopian, syria, Persic, and Latin versions, all but the ULate being accompanied with literal Latin lations. The sixth volume contains readings and critical remarks. The Prolegomena by Walton discusses Bible texts and versions. This work was followed in 669 by the Lexicon Heptaglotton of Edmund astell, containing lexicons of all the uages of the polyglot except the Latin and reek.

Polytheism, as the word implies, is the belief in and worship of many gods—whether one god is considered supreme or not—as distinguished from the worship of the one te God only. Although there is reason to believe that heathen religions were anciently omothestic, they certainly became polythe-istic, and are so now. We infer from the istory in Genesis and Joshua xxiv. 2 that, although family of Abraham in Ur worshipped the true God, they likewise believed in and orshiped other false gods as lesser deities.
"Every form of Polytheism has sprung from ature-worship. Man looked round on the powers of Nature and gave names to them—the sun, the moon, the stars, the wind. In time he assigned sex to them, and then various attributes, until they were completely personified. Thus, in Persia the blazing sun was adored as Ormuzd; in the bleak north
the Norsemen called on Odin, the stormy;
in Gaul and Britain pillars were raised to the sun, altars to the moon.” “At first, man was conscious only of physical inferiority,
and thus his gods were his superiors in brute force alone; when his intellect grew, he felt how unequal it was to grasp the laws of Nature, and then the gods were treated as his superiors in wisdom and understanding.
At last his moral consciousness awakened, and with it a consciousness of sin; then he raised his gods to an altitude of moral holinness and purity which he himself despaired to reach” [S. Baring-Gould]. Polytheism can lead its followers no further; here it leaves them without help, and its utter failure, even as a moral restraint, was felt by the best minds of the civilised world when Christ appeared.

Pomps [lit. “processions”].—The phrase “poms of the devil” included anciently all heathen spectacles, public games, etc. A definite is thus given by Chrysostom: “The poms of Satan are the theatre and games of the circus, together with the observation of days, and pressages and omens.”

Pontifex or Pontiff.—An order of heathen priests at Rome. Four pontifexes, chosen from the patricians, were created by Numa; in a. u. c. 454 four more, chosen from the plebeians, were added. Sylla further increased the number to fifteen, and it afterwards became indefinite. The Pontifex Maximus was the head of the College of Pontiffs, and was a person of considerable power.
The office of Pontifex Maximus was assumed by the Emperor Augustus, and was held by his successors, including the Christian em-perors, till Gratian [a. D. 367–383]. The term “ponitiff,” as applied to Christian bishops, is borrowed from this source.

Pontificale.—A book of rites which can only be performed by a bishop [ponitiff]; e.g.
the coronation of kings, the ordination of priests and deacons, and confirmation.

Poole, Matthew, a Nonconformist writer, was born at York in 1624, and educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge. He became Presbyterian minister of St. Michael-le-Querne, London, in 1648; but lost his living in 1662 for his Nonconformity. He devoted himself to Biblical studies and writing, and died at Amsterdam in 1679.

His chief works are Synopsis Bibliorum Criticorum, published in 1669, which has gone through many editions; *The Blasphemer slain
by the Sword of the Spirit*, directed against John Biddle, the Socinian [1654]; *A Model for the Maintaining of Students of Choice Af-ties in the University, and two works again Romanism, The Nullity of the Roman Pontiand Dialogues between a Popish Priest and English Protestant. He left uncompleted

English Annotations on the Holy Bible, were finished by his friends, published 1685, and passed through many editions.

Poor Clares.—An Order of St. Fran-called the Povere Donne or Clarisses, which was founded by St. Clare of Assisi, who entered the Portiuncula in 1212. She was joined by her sister, St. Agnes, and they were given the church of St. Damian. This followed the rule of St. Benedict till 12 when St. Francis drew up a written or which was approved by Pope Innocent III
in 1246. St. Clare died in 1253. In 1
Cardinal Cajetan, with the approval of Uni
IV., drew up a fresh rule; some of the nuns preferred that of St. Francis, which caused a division into the “Urbanists” and “Clarisses.” The first monastery of Franciscan nuns of Minories was founded 1293, outside Aldgate, and has given its name to the “Minories.” There were only merly a great number in France, but most disap eared at the Revolution, and but five six remain. The greatest number are Austria. There are five convents in En-land and six in Ireland.

Poor, The.—Although Christianity developed the care of the richer classes
the poor, yet a provision for their main-ance existed among the primitive nati
 and was adopted as a matter of S policy. Among the Athenians, those those who were slain, were maintained by out-door relief in the case of the sick and aged, but it is no longer given to the able-bodied as a supplement to low wages. Fifty-four public auditors examine the expenditure, and one or more district medical officers are attached to each union to attend on the sick poor.

Scotland and Ireland have similar, though separate, legislation as regards the poor. In Scotland out-door relief is the rule. In Ireland, where there was no poor-law till 1838, relief is administered almost entirely in the workhouse.

Christianity has been greatly instrumental in the reduction of pauperism. Mr. C. L. Brace thus writes in Gest the poor:—

"It is almost a common-place to say that all the varied and blessed institutions of charity throughout Christendom, all the monasteries, hospitals, and reformatories, the provisions for the lame, blind, and deaf, for the idiot and insane, for the sick of every possible disease, for the widow and orphan and homeless, for the aged and infirm, are only blossoms and fruit of the life and teachings and death of the great Benefactor." And again [p. 417]:—

"The Christian, other things being equal, is less likely to be very poor, and a pauper he cannot easily be—that is, he cannot have that spirit of dependence, idleness, and dishonesty, which are the essentials of pauperism. . . . It is not claimed that religion alone in future ages can remove pauperism from the world, but the Christian belief will tend to a more just distribution of property; it will promote temperance and good morals; it will stimulate co-operation between labourers, and between labour and capital; it will encourage many forms of insurance, and above all elevate and train the character, so that the human being, though unfortunate, cannot be degraded, and thus, under the influence of Christ on the world, the labouring classes will be less likely to fall into extreme poverty, and, if they do, will be more readily assisted, or will not sink morally."

Popes.—This word is derived from the Latin papa, a childish or endearing word for father. In the days of the early Church, it was undoubtedly applied to all the clergy, as it is in the Greek Church to this day. In the Western Church it was soon restricted to bishops, and then to those only who held important sees, such as Alexandria, Carthage, and Rome. It was Gregory VII, who first ordained that the Bishop of Rome, and he only, could bear the title. We have already fully entered into the history of the growth of the Papal power, [PAPAL POWER.] The following is a list of the Popes, taken from Milner's End of Controversy, a standard Roman Catholic work. Notices of the principal Popes will be found under their respective names. The references in brackets opposite some names are reminders of events which occurred during their pontificates. Porphyry [233-304] was a native of Syria. His original name was Melch [Heb. for "king"], and his preceptor, Longinus, afterwards named him Porphyry [i.e. "empurpled"], because purple was the royal colour. He was for a while a pupil of Origen, then of Longinus, then of Plotinus. He wrote fifteen books against Christianity, which were unhappily destroyed a century later by order of Theodosius the Emperor. We say unhappily, because it is impossible but that, if we had them, they would furnish much information on doubtful points respecting the early Church. His life of Pythagoras is extant, and some other books, one of which was Porteus, Beilby, D.D. [b. at York, 1731, d. 1809].—An English prelate. He was educated at a small school in his native city, went as a sizar to Queen's College, Cambridge, where in due course he became a Fellow. In 1757 he was ordained. He first became known as a writer by obtaining the prize for the Seatonian poem. Archbishop Secker made him his chaplain, and gave him first a small living near Sevenoaks, then Hinxton in the same county. In 1767 he became Rector of Lambeth, and soon after was made Chaplain to George III. and Master of the hospital of St. Cross at Winchester. In 1776 he was appointed to succeed Bishop Markham at Chester, and on the death of Bishop Lowth in 1788 he was translated to London, which See he occupied till his death. He published some lectures on St. Matthew, delivered on the Fridays in Lent at St. James's, Piccadilly, and these in their day were highly popular. He was also the editor of Archbishop Secker's works, to which he prefixed a biography. But he is best remembered now by his philanthropic deeds, by which he ameliorated the condition of the poor clergy of his dioceses. The Porteus library in the Bishop of London's palace at Fulham is another memorial of his munificence.

Port Royalists.—Port Royal was the name of a Cistercian nunnery near Versailles, afterwards removed to Paris, and which became very famous in the seventeenth century. It was founded in 1204 by Mathilde de Garlande, as a work of piety to propitiate Divine favour, and insure the return of her husband, Matthieu de Marli, from the Crusades. It was built by the same architect as Amiens Cathedral, and was erected to receive twelve ladies. Not long afterwards it was licensed by the Pope to receive those persons who, without becoming nuns, wished to retire from the world. Pope Honorius III. granted to it special privileges, allowing the celebration of Mass within its walls, even though the country around were under an interdict. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries the discipline of the convent was greatly relaxed, and the appointment of being its Abbess was much coveted. In 1602 M. Marion, the Advocate-General of Henry IV., procured this position from the King for his granddaughter, Jaqueline Marie Angélique Arnauld, then only eleven years old, while her younger sister, Agnes, aged only five, was made Abbess of St. Cyr. Jaqueline took the name of Mère Angélique. Many members of the Arnauld family joined the nunnery, and, until the final dispersion of the sisterhood, the posterity of the Arnaulds ceased not to rule the house.

In 1608 Mère Angélique determined on complete reformation in her community, and established a most austere system of discipline. She was roused to this by the preaching of a Capuchin friar. After a time General of the Order sent Angélique to carry out some reforms in the Monastery of Maubuisson; but she again returned to the valley of Chevreuse, her own nunnery, taking with her many of the nuns from Maubuisson. 1633 the community removed to the Faubourg St. Jacques, Paris, and one of the most important consequences of this change was the connection of Du Vergier de Hauranne, Abbé of St. Cyr, with the society. He was an adherent of Cornelius Jansen, and he occupies a place in ecclesiastical history as the founder of Jansenism in France. [Jansenism.]

The old establishment of Port Royal des Champs was used for a lay community of men, numbered amongst its members some of the most brilliant scholars of the time, who established a school, and prepared education books for the instruction of their pupils, Pascal, Nicole, Arnauld, Le Maître, J. Séricourt, De Saci, etc., looked up to St. Cyr as to a father for guidance in the studies as well as their lives. He was the author of the Port Royal Grammars of Greek, Latin, and Italian. The prosperity of this establishment drew down the jealousy of Richelieu, and he caused St. Cyr to be imprisoned in Vincennes, in 1638, on account of some of his writings, and here he remained a captive till after the death of the Cardinal. In 1643 Antony Arnauld published his book De la Fréquente Communion, which was decided attack on the Jesuits, and thus commenced the seventy years' religious war which ended in the destruction of Port Royal. Arnauld was cited by the Pope and Cardinal Mazarin to appear at Rome, but he refuse and went into voluntary retirement for five years at Port Royal des Champs. The Sisters, who now lived in Paris, had planned an ineffectual scheme of devoting themselves to the perpetual adoration of the Holy Eucharist, St. Cyr, who from prison was still their guide, directed the energies to the more useful project of teaching children of their own sex. Angélique and most of her associates then returned the quiet of their country establishment, as the recluse moved to a farm near, called L'Orangerie, where some of them were employed in making a translation of the Fathers. St. Cyr appointed Antoine Singlin as general confessor to both nuns and recluses. The tranquillity did not, however, last long. The wars of the Fronde came to disturb their peace and the nuns returned to Paris; and the recluse, who numbered three hundred, defended themselves at Les Granges. Mère Angélique remained and took care of the poor peasants.
But Port Royal had become an abomination to the antagonists of Arnauld. His doctrines were a reproof to the Jesuits, and Father Coruct framed the "Five Propositions" concerning the mystery of Divine grace which were said to be contained in Jansen's book Augustinus. Arnauld denied that such teaching was to be found in the book, but the Parisian doctors appointed to examine the matter declared that they were, and they were condemned as heretical by Innocent X., in a Papal Bull. [JANSENSISTS.] The Queen-Mother, Anne of Austria, urged by Mazarin, decreed the fall of Port Royal and Les Granges; but it was hindered for a time by the so-called miracle performed on Madame Henriette Perrier, the niece of Pascal, by means of a thorn said to be preserved from her Saviour's crown: this relic was exposed at Port Royal in Lent, 1656, and the young lady, who was suffering with a fearful malady in the eye, on touching the sore with the thorn was instantaneously cured. This miracle seemed a special mark of Divine favour to the monastery, and Anne of Austria cared to carry out her plan, and so once more her school was spared. The story of the Holy Thorn is upheld by Arnauld, Le Maître, and Pascal; the last embodied it in his Provincial Letters, and it will be found in English in Memoirs of Port Royal, by Madame von Schimmelmann. But the brief respite came to an end with the death of Mazarin and the assumption of power by Louis XIV. in person, in 1660. Louis was a friend of the Jesuits and a hater of Port Royal and Jansenism. He at once consigned Singlin to the Bastille, and decreed that all at Port Royal and Les Granges alike should sign the formula condemning the five Propositions. This they refused to do, and their schools were dispersed, and the refusals were banished from their valley, Fère Angélique, now quite old, quitted Port Royal des Champs and went to Paris, where he found her monastery guarded by soldiers as a prison, and here she and many of her nuns died. Sœur Flavie, one of the remaining ones, proved a traitor to her society: she injured her Jansenist heresies, as she called them, in the hope of being made Abbess, and she procured from the Archbishop of Paris the imprisonment of many of her Order, and a renewed command to subscribe to the five Propositions. This was again refused. Instead of Sœur Flavie, another sister became Abbess, who procured a separation of the Paris community from that at Versailles. Those sisters who had been imprisoned were sent back to Port Royal des Champs, and derived of the Sacraments of the Church. Yet see more the dissolution of the nunnery was stayed by the intervention of Anne of Bour- son, Duchesse de Longueville, and sister of the great Condé. She, after a life of dissipation, entered the ranks of the ladies of Port royal in Paris, and addressed herself to Pope Clement IX. on behalf of the persecuted Order. He made terms of peace with them, and once more allowed Arnauld and his associates to recruit their monastery, open their schools, and receive back the scattered refusals. But the doom of the stronghold of Jansenism was fixed. Cardinal de Noailles, one of its bitterest enemies, had become Archbishop of Paris, and he persuaded Clement XI., in 1707, to issue the Bull, Vincit Dominus, requiring the nuns of Port Royal to subscribe to it; this they declined to do, except with certain restrictions, and their fate was sealed. De Noailles obtained an order for the suppression of the convent, and the nuns were finally dispersed in 1709 by armed police, and left to die without priestly absolution or Christian burial. Not content with this, a royal order, in 1710, caused the demolition of the monastery and the church; and nothing now remains of this once celebrated place but the ruins of a Gothic arch.

Positivism.—Positivism consists essentially of a Philosophy and a Polity, and to these may be added a Religion. It was originated by Auguste Comte [b. 1797, d. 1857], who set forth his ideas in some fifteen volumes. The books are rather verbose, and the difficulties connected with his system are met with the easy assurance, or "thereforeism," so often found in French philosophical and theological writers.

The name "Positivism" was chosen by Comte as implying reality and usefulness as well as certainty and precision, since he teaches that we have nothing whatever to do with anything which cannot be positively demonstrated. The existence of God, and the belief in a future state, are thus practically excluded from his system.

Positivism as a Philosophy.—"Each branch of our knowledge," says Comte, "passes successively through three different theoretical conditions—the theological or fictitious (or supernatural), the metaphysical or abstract, and the scientific or positive." These conditions are radically opposed to one another, and hence entire freedom from theological belief is necessary before the positive state can be perfectly attained. "In the theological state, the human mind, seeking the essential nature of beings, the first and final causes (the origin and purpose) of all effects in short, absolute knowledge—supposes all phenomena to be produced by the immediate action of supernatural beings . . . . The theological system arrived at the highest perfection of which it is capable when it substituted the providential action of a single Being for the varied operations of the numerous divinities which had been before imagined." In other words, it began with Polytheism and advanced to Monotheism.

"In the metaphysical state, which is only a modification of the first, the mind supposes, instead of supernatural beings, abstract forces, veritable entities (that is, personified abstractions) inherent in all beings, and capable of producing all phenomena. What is called the explanation of phenomena is, in this stage, a mere reference of each to its proper entity. . . . In the last stage of the metaphysical system, men substitute one great entity (Nature) as the cause of all phenomena instead of the multitude of entities at first supposed.

"In the final, the positive, state the mind has given over the vain search after absolute notions, the origin and destination of the universe and the causes of phenomena, and applies itself to their laws; that is, their invariable relations of succession and resemblance. Reasoning and observation, duly combined, are the means of this knowledge. What is now understood, when we speak of an explanation of facts, is simply the establishment of a connection between single phenomena and some general facts, the number of which continually diminish with the progress of science. . . . The ultimate perfection of the positive system would be (if such perfection could be hoped for) to represent all phenomena as particular aspects of a single general fact, such as gravitation, for instance. . . . The point of departure of the individual and of the race being the same, the phases of the mind of a man correspond to the epochs of the mind of the race . . . Each of us is aware . . . that he was a theologian in his childhood, a metaphysician in his youth, and a natural philosopher in his manhood." [Comte's Positive Philosophy, translated by H. Martineau.]

"The principle of theology is to explain everything by supernatural wills. That principle can never be set aside until we acknowledge the search for causes to be beyond our reach, and limit ourselves to the knowledge of laws." "The true positive spirit consists . . . in a word, in studying the how, instead of the why, of phenomena. [General View of Positivism, translated by H. Bridges.]

The ultimate aim and end of all knowledge is, according to Comte, the progressive well-being of Humanity; hence he places Sociology at the head of all the sciences—that to which they lead up. The pursuit of a science into regions where it has no practical bearings, direct or indirect, he condemns as useless, and a departure from positive principles, whilst he brands the speculations themselves as "metaphysical," as a mere return to an exploded philosophical system.

Comte arranges the sciences in six primary divisions, according to the increasing complexity of their phenomena. Mathematics, being the most simple, comes first; and then follow astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology, and sociology. Each passes through the three stages, theological, metaphysical, positive, before the one succeeding it. Sociology has not yet become positive, as theological and metaphysical modes of thought still retard its progress. Comte has also constructed a philosophy of history as set forth in his connected view of universal history. He argues that human activity passes successively through the stages of offensive warfare, defensive warfare, and industry. The respective connection of these states with the preponderance of the theological, the metaphysical, or the positive spirit leads at once to a complete explanation of history. It reproduces in a systematic form the division of history into ancient, mediæval and modern.

The subjective principle of Positivism is the subordination of the intellect to the heart, the objective basis is the external order of the world as revealed by science. The function of the intellect is to discover the laws, or order of the external world—"the immutable necessity of the external world"—and thus to serve the feelings by controlling them, with the ultimate purpose of regulating action. Hence thought must be systematised before feelings, feelings before actions, though it is quite certain that the feeling and activity have much more to do with any practical step that we take than reason. In other words, reason, thought, subordinate to affection, which in the positive system is the preponderating element, needed to direct and control it. Reason deals with the external order of the world the laws of the various sciences, including the laws of sociology—but only as the handmaid of the affections.

When, next, Positivism is regarded as polity, its weakness becomes apparent. Its positivist motto is "love, order, progress" but the means for carrying out such ideas are Utopian, and no sufficient basis is ever one of the three is laid down. In generating society Comte looks for help three sources—to philosophers as supplying the intellectual element, to the working-classes as supplying the active element, and to women as bearing the element of feeling. With the third element we may be confident that the intellectual and practical faculties will keep in due subordination to universal love and Polities are to be subordinated to moral.

To the Positivist, the object of morals is to make our sympathetic instincts preponderate as far as possible over the self-instincts; social feelings over personal feelings. Between personal feelings, or self-love and social feelings come the home, or dome affections, and hence these are to be cultivated as a step towards the development of social feelings, since the latter constitute the first principle of morality. To live others is the happiest happiness. Self-love in the Positive system, is regarded as a great infirmity of our nature. The object education, which is to be strictly regulated to develop the social feelings to the high degree. But even then the spiritual power composed of philosophers, etc.), which is to be rigidly separated from the temporal or political power, must prolong the influence it has already exercised in education so as to recall individuals, or even nations, to the principles which they have forgotten, and his power will act through public opinion. If the spiritual power awards its praise and blame justly, public opinion will lend it the most irresistible support. As a help in the work of moral education is the Positive system of commemoration; for example, the yearly celebration on suitable days of those whom Comte regards as the three greatest of our predecessors—Cæsar, St. Paul, and Charlemagne. Positivism banishes the idea of rights and allows only of duties; there is no right of property, but only the duty attending its possession. Supposing that the proprietor asks a becoming, that is, a Positivist, view of his duty, he will be allowed to administer his property for the public benefit, otherwise he will be glad to give up possession. Spiritual rewards and punishments will preponderate over temporal ones; but moral influence could not be sufficient alone to secure order.

Carry out the vast work of social regeneration, Comte proposes that a "Positive Occidental Committee" should be formed from the philosophers, working men, and women of the five Western European nations. This committee would bring forward measures for the formation of an Occidental navy, an international coinage, school, flag, etc.

A Positivist may be able to trace, in all this, the foundations of a regenerated society, but the "theologian" in his darkness there seems no adequate motive for a love which surpasses the Gospel standard, "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," no guarantee or order, no hope of the promised progress.

Positivism as a Religion.—Positive Religion, or the Religion of Humanity, as Comte calls it, is a curious invention. Having dismissed, as mere fables, the belief in God and the instinctive longing for immortality, some central intent was wanted towards which Feeling, Reason, and Activity could alike converge, and this was found in the great conception of Humanity—the abstract idea of mankind the past, the present, and the future. If the peculiar characteristic of Humanity, or the Great Being, who is here set forth, to be empngoed of separable elements; mutual we knve unite together its various parts; and towards Humanity, who is for us the only infinite Being, in the conscious elements whom she is composed, we shall henceforth reet every aspect of our life individual or collective. Our thoughts will be devoted to a knowledge of Humanity, our affections to love, our actions to her service." [General View of Pantheism, since the Great Being of Positivism submits to the laws of the external world instead of originating them. [Pantheism.] This idea is to be illustrated by the organisation of festivals at regular intervals setting forth the various aspects of Humanity: the Nation, the Town, the Domestic Relations, Polytheism, Monotheism, etc., will have their festival days; in fact, there is to be a "Positivist Calendar." On the last day of the year there is to be a commemoration of the dead and of their services.

Throughout his system, Comte assigns to Woman a peculiar and exalted position. He seems to find the answer to Solomon's question, "Who can find a virtuous woman?" in the great majority of women. Woman's mission is, he says, in one word, Love; they are charged with the education of Sympathy, the source of human unity. As mothers and wives it is their office to conduct the moral education of Humanity. In return for these benefits women are to enjoy immunity from out-door and other toilsome labour, and besides they are to be the objects of Worship, publicly and privately, as the first permanent step towards the Worship of Humanity. Man will, in the days when Positivism prevails, kneel to Woman, and to Woman alone; the source of his reverential feelings being a clear appreciation of benefits received, and a spirit of deep thankfulness for them. To her, as the concrete form of the abstract idea of Humanity, Prayer—i.e., the outpouring of men's nobler feelings—is to be addressed daily. If a suitable living object of devotion does not present itself, a dead wife or mother may be selected, or even some historical personage, so long as she once really lived. For women themselves, however, Comte does not consider himself competent to suggest an object of devotion.

We have seen that love is said to be the principle of Positivism; it is to amount to an abnegation of self; the motto on the Positive flag is to be "Vivre pour altrui," Live for Others; and the great moral principle itself Comte called Altruism; hence "to love Humanity may be truly said to constitute the whole duty of man." And then, after having "lived as far as it is possible for others, both in public and private, and having given a charm and sacredness to our temporary life, we shall at last be for ever incorporated with the Supreme Being [Humanity], of whose life all noble natures are necessarily partakers." [General View—condensed.]

If we look for the sources of this novel religion, we are not much assisted by Comte's own life. He seems to have been an eccentric genius, with one of those bitter despotic tempers which led him to quarrel with everyone! He was separated from his wife, and lived on intimate terms with a married woman, Clotilde de Vaux, notwithstanding the strict morality of his system. We must rather turn for an explanation to what he calls "Catholicism," by which he means sometimes Christianity, sometimes modern Romanism; and then we cannot but be struck with the singular imitation of Christianity and the Christian Church which Positivism presents. Thus, for the Positive principle of love, "live for others," we have the Gospel grace of love as "the fulfilling of the Law," and "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," with the Christian rule of self-denial. For the abstract idea of Humanity, we have the Incarnate Son of God, the Second Adam, and the Church of many members, His Mystical Body. For the worship of woman, extended to women generally in imitation of Mediaeval Chivalry, and perhaps not without reference to the goddess of Reason of the French Revolution, we have the Romanist cultus of the Virgin. The Madonnas of art had likewise their influence, for the Positivist flag has for its device a young woman with a child in her arms. For the festivals and commemorations we have the Christian Seasons and the roll of Saints. The leading principle and the form of the Religion of Humanity are thus obviously borrowed from Catholic Christianity.

Positivism is not on the increase, in this country, at any rate. It numbers amongst its adherents some men of high ability and many of good moral character. But a system that asserts that there is no sense of, or feeling after, a God in our nature, which does not acknowledge a sense of sin or guilt as we understand it, nor an instinctive longing for, or expectation of, immortality in man, gives us little ground for hope that the exalted love and the strict morality which it professes would bear fruit in practice if it were freed from the pressure of surrounding Christian opinion. It seems, by its negations, rather to be the philosophy of those who are absorbed in the sense of life, and to whom this world is the whole of existence. Taking Positivism at its own estimate, it would appear to be easier to live as a consistent Christian than as a moderately good Positivist; and certainly the promise of eternal life is more attractive than, at the best, the possibility of an idle commemoration after incorporation into the Supreme Being of Humanity.

Post-Communion.—The part of the Communion Service following the reception, beginning with the Lord's Prayer.

Postils.—Sermons or homilies. They followed the reading of the Gospel, whence the name [post illa—i.e. evangelica].

Postures.—The bodily attitudes assumed in the various parts of Divine Worship. Reason, Scripture, and universal consent testify that all postures are not equally appropriate in that worship and in its different departments. Kneeling and prostration seem peculiarly expressive of penitent humility, bowing, of deep veneration; standing, of joy and thanksgiving. Thus, as a general rule the Church enjoins kneeling in confession and prayer; standing in praise, the recitation of the Creed, and in the exhortations of the liturgy; and allows sitting during the reading of Scripture and the delivery of sermons. In Scotland, however, they sit, and in German sit or stand, during the prayers.

Potamo, Bishop of Heraclea, was imprisoned for his faith in the Maximinian persecution. He was present at the Nicean Council, and was strongly opposed to the Arians. He also accompanied St. Athanasius to the Council of Tyre [335]. When the Arian Bishop Gregory seized the See of Alexandria in 342, Potamo was so tortured that he died.

Potter, Christopher, D.D. [b. 1591, 1646], Dean of Worcester from 1633 till his death. He wrote, Want of Charity just charged on all such Romanists as dare affirm that Protestantism destroys Salvation, which was an answer to Edward Knott's Charity Mistaken, who retaliated in Mercy and Truth, Charity maintained by Catholics.

Potter, John, Archbishop of Canterbury son of a linen draper of Wakefield [b. 167, d. 1747]. He was educated at Oxford, and when only twenty-three years old published his book on Greek Antiquities, which until recent times has been a standard work though it is now quite superseded. Next year he took Holy Orders, and from that time his studies were exclusively professional. Archbishop Tenison made him his Chaplain and gave him the living of Great Mongeham in Kent. He was also Chaplain to Queen Anne, and Regius Professor of Divinity at Oxford. He became Archbishop in 1737.

Power of the Keys. [Keys, Power of.]

Praemunire [corrupted from premoner —A term used in a writ passed in the reign Edward III. Its primary object was to curtail the Pope's authority, and accordingly ordained that no one, and particularly no clerk, man, should appeal to the Pope against the authority of the sovereign, or on matters belonging to his jurisdiction. It also declared that the Pope had no right to dispose of ecclesiastical preemptions in England. This writ became Statute of Praemunire in the reign of Richa II., and the penalty for the offence was fixed at imprisonment for life, confiscation of land and goods, and forfeiture of the king's protection. Since that time the name has been applied to other statutes, all relating to the king's authority, but differing as to the offences forbidden.]

Pragmatic Sanction.—A name applied to ordinances relating to the affairs
Church or State, more particularly those authorised by the Kings of France. An ordinance of this nature, issued in 1268, directed that cathedral churches should have the right of electing their own prelates; that simony and the selling of benefices should be abolished; that no money should be exacted for the Court of Rome but with the consent of the sovereign; and that the liberties granted to ecclesiastics by former kings should be respected. The most famous Pragmatic Sanction was one granted by Charles VII. in 1438, and confirmed by the Parliament of Paris in the following year. Its object was to restore the primitive custom of the election of prelates by the people instead of by the king, and it also regulated the matter of excommunication, appeals, and judgments, abolished expectative graces, and limited the number of cardinals. This sanction gave rise to numerous controversies, and it was finally revoked by Francis I. in 1516.

Praxeas.—A heretic, of whom nothing is known except that at the end of the second century he came to Rome from Asia [where he had suffered imprisonment], and taught the errors of Montanus. Thence he went to Africa, where he was convinced of his errors, and wrote a recantation, but soon relapsed into heresy. Praxeas was the first of the Monarchians who maintained the Catholic faith that Christ is Son and Man. By denying he distinct personality of the Son and of the Holy Ghost he inferred that the Father was uncreated and suffered, and therefore is cokned with the Patripassians; but he contended that the Father only sympathised with the Son and did not suffer in Him. The errors of Praxeas are very similar to those of Nothus. They soon died out.

Prayer.—In its wider meaning, and as used very often in Holy Scripture, prayer excludes not only petition to God for ourselves and for others, but also confession of sin, thanksgiving for mercies received, and the praise and adoration of God for His greatness and glory, to which last the term worship is properly applied. These various aspects of prayer are abundantly illustrated in the Psalms, the great book of inspired public and private devotion. Thus, in the compass of one Psalm we sometimes find in or more of these elements of prayer joined together, and this may remind us that the hard line we often draw between prayer and praise is an artificial one. In our Collects, and, indeed, in the prayers of the Western Church generally, petition predominates over worship or adoration; but in the anger and more rhetorical prayers of the Eastern Church adoration holds an important place.

We read of prayer ages before God directly joined it, and in such a way that we can only believe the idea of prayer to be intuitive. Man naturally turns to God in prayer. The Psalmist was but uttering a universal truth when he said, "O Thou that hearest prayer, unto Thee shall all flesh come" [Ps. lxiv. 2]. Nor is this idea of prayer confined to those who know one God. In various ways heathens appeal to their gods; they hardly enter upon any event in their lives without first of all approaching, in some form of prayer, the powers they think able to help them. This is matter of history, as well as of observation by missionaries now. We find prayer made to God throughout Holy Scripture, from beginning to end, accepted by Him, and answered by Him. Here and there, as in the Psalms, there are declarations as to the kind of prayer to which God will hearken, until at last, in the New Testament, Christ was plainly set forth as the medium through whom it is to be offered, and the Holy Spirit was made known as co-operating with the human spirit in its utterance. Christians pray as members of Christ; God hears and answers our prayers only because we are members of His beloved Son. The duty of prayer is inculcated, not only by the example of the Old Testament saints, but also directly by our Lord and His Apostles [Matt. vi. 5–13, xviii. 19, 20; Luke xviii. 1–14; John xiv. 13, 14, xvi. 24; Rom. viii. 26; 1 Cor. xiv. 15; Ephes. vi. 18, 19; Philipp. iv. 6; 1 Thess. v. 17; Jas. i. 5, v. 13–18].

Remembering, then, the many-sidedness of prayer, some points connected with it in its aspects of petition for ourselves, or of intercession for others, require examination. We must first clearly recognise that God puts prayer before us as necessary if we would gain our ends. There is a signal instance of this, and of the store which God sets by His people’s prayers, when our Lord bade His disciples “Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, that He will send forth labourers into His harvest.” [Matt. ix. 38]. The disciples were bidden to ask God to do His own work, and thus to co-operate with Him in His labour of love. But this is only a sample of all prayer. God is ever seeking the salvation and well-being of His creatures, and yet He requires them to ask Him for those very things of which He knows they stand in the direst need. How there can be a place for petition when God foresees everything, is the mystery of prayer; but there is likewise the mystery of our free-will, and the one is the necessary complement of the other. If we are free to rule or misrule our lives and conduct, our very nature leads us to prayer in our perplexities and distresses. If we are free to wander, we must appeal to a guide. This may be an intellectual difficulty, but it is one involved in the mystery of God, and in the mystery of our own being.

been raised as to prayer and its efficacy. [1] It has been said that prayer is merely a superstitious custom, handed on from generation to generation in civilised countries; that it is a human invention altogether. But, unlike other superstitions, which have crumbled away in the light of truth and of modern discovery, prayer still holds its ground. In spite of all that is alleged as to its uselessness, men of the acutest intellect, as well as uncultured men, still pray, and still believe in the power of prayer. Besides this, we cannot pass over the fact already mentioned, that prayer is an intuitive idea with man, and is not due to education—that it fulfills a universal need of human nature. [2] It is said that prayer is unreasonable, because request is made for things contrary to the immutable laws of Nature. It is needful to state this objection to prayer plainly. The laws of nature are merely statements of the orderly condition of things in nature, a summary of what has been found by competent observers. The order is so perfect that we do not look for any deviation from it. And in the spiritual world, as far as we know it, we have every reason to believe that law likewise reigns, or, to speak more correctly, that the most perfect order prevails. Thus we must believe that every thought of our hearts is the result of some previous combination of ideas, either existing there already or introduced from without. Thoughts do not come into our minds by chance. Such being what we understand by law, we can suppose that prayer may be answered, or apparently answered, in two ways. Thus, fine weather may be prayed for, and many natural laws acting together may bring it about in the ordinary course of things, to all appearance as a direct answer to the prayer; or, on the other hand, natural causes not sufficient to cause fine weather, God may see fit to bring about the result prayed for by suspending or controlling some of the laws of nature. It is to the latter of these answers to prayer that objection is made. Again, prayer may be made for some spiritual blessing, and the blessing may come, either from ordinary causes, i.e. as a result of the religious circumstances in which God has placed us, or He may put a fresh thought into our minds, or change the intensity of some feelings already there, and thus bring the blessing prayed for. It is the latter case to which objection is made. Objectors regard those answers to prayer for temporal or spiritual blessings which come in the ordinary course of natural laws as the only possible ones; they look upon them as mere coincidences, and they wholly deny the possibility of answers of the latter kind, because they are contrary to unchangeable laws—in short, because they are miraculous, and miracles are incredible. [The question of the credibility of miracles is discussed in the articles Miracles and Resurrection, and reference may also be made to the article on Natural Law.] But there is also a class of theologians who are disposed to deny that miraculous answers to prayer are vouchsafed; one of them has recently expressed his opinion as follows:—

"To the best of my understanding, we do well and reasonably to ask God—just as we do for a daily sufficiency in the Lord's Prayer—to bless and preserve the fruits of the earth, leaving the immediate process to the ordinary workings of His all-wise law; and then, after doing our duty in the matter of trust, that, in spite of appearances, He, in perfect wisdom, perfect love, is working for the best.' In all troubles, temporal or spiritual, we do well to put them up before God and ask for His guidance to do our duty towards mitigating or relieving them, and to take to heart the many moral lessons thus inculcated. This prayer, with the understanding, I deem to be our reasonable service to the Almighty; while, according to our light and knowledge of God's world-wide and salutary law of 'reaping what we sow,' I deem it unreasonable to ask Him to contrive this law for our special or national possible benefit." This writer would think it unreasonable to be asked to pray against the inundations of the Thames in Lambeth, and would consider the Thames Embankment authorities the proper source of help. True, he would say, the seasons lately have been unfavourable for agriculture; the remedy for this is to alter our system, rents, etc. And he goes on, "Why I strike again special petitions to the Almighty to intervene directly in certain things when they become painful, is because we practically therein charge God with directly and special sending such visitations, when, as a fact, we are but reaping what we or others have culpably or ignorantly sown. . . . I do not say that God cannot so administer His law, moral and physical, as to give an withhold what we ask. I simply say the to the best of our understanding, acquire from revelation and experience, God will a work signs and wonders that we may believe." Now, as nearly the whole of our needs and adversities can be traced to culpable or ignorant sowing of ourselves or others, prayer, according to this view, should be limited to petitions for patience and guidance as to how we can best help ourselves. Unquestionably these are right objects of prayer, since all real prayer always accompanied by work on our part but it is impossible to accept them as the whole, or even the most important, matter of prayer, without ignoring what is told in Holy Scripture. Prayer is there represented to us as the remedy for our sins at their effects, and the only conditions placed upon our petitions are, that they must according to God's will, and the outcome
a sincere and obedient heart. These conditions being fulfilled, the promise is that God will grant us our requests whatever they may be. [A reference to the texts already named will make this clear.] To deny this would be equivalent to denying the efficacy of prayer altogether, except as a moral agent affecting ourselves only as a kind of religious exercise; for it must be remembered that even if we only believe that God will give us patience and guide us as to how we should help ourselves, we yet admit—though we may not avow it—the efficacy of prayer, since patience and guidance are themselves, if specially granted, miraculous gifts of God.

For the sake of plainness, it may be added that: [1] No distinction can be made between prayer for temporal and spiritual blessings; both alike are put before us as proper objects of prayer in Scripture, and both the one and the other are promised in answer to it. [2] When prayer seems to be specially answered, we can rarely say how much is due to the operation of natural laws, how much to some modification of those laws; we know not where ordinary law, so to speak, ends, and where miracle begins. [3] Taking the history of the Apostolic Church for our guide, although we are encouraged to make known all our requests, freely, to God, we are not, generally speaking, led to expect such an answer to our prayers as would involve an obvious miracle—e.g. the raising of the dead, the floating of a hopelessly-sinking ship in mid-ocean—but we must believe that He does really and directly answer prayer, as well in our temporal as our spiritual concerns, though we know it not. By a logical necessity we are compelled to take one side or the other; there is no middle course. Prayer, in the Scripture sense of the word, is and can be, or it is not and cannot be, answered. [INTERCESSION; LORD'S PRAYER.]

Prayer-days.—The name given to the days of the week selected in the American Episcopal Church for the holding of morning or evening service, as it is not the custom there to hold daily services.

Prayers for the Dead. [DEAD, PRAYERS FOR.]

Preaching.—This function was at first performed by all grades of the Christian hierarchy, and sometimes even by laymen. Origen, when visiting the Holy Land in A.D. 215, was desired by the Bishops of Caesarea and Jerusalem to preach in their churches, though he was not then ordained, and they defended themselves from the charge of irregularity by producing predecessors showing that it had been sometimes permitted to laymen to preach in the presence, and with the sanction, of a bishop. Later, preaching was restricted to bishops and priests; but deacons, about the fourth century, regained the right. The history of preaching in the ancient Christian Church is one of the most interesting branches of ecclesiastical annals. Basil of Caesarea, St. John Chrysostom, Gregory Nazianzen, were among the most famous preachers of the Greek Church. In the Latin, Jerome and Augustine were probably the greatest. Such records as we have of the great preachers of ancient times show that they differed much in pulpit action, but the greater part seem to have used very moderate and sober gesture. They delivered their sermons extempore, while there were notaries who took down what they said. Probably an hour was about the usual length. Sermons were generally both uttered and heard standing, the preacher preceding his sermon with "Peace be with you," to which the assembly responded "Amen," and later, "And with thy Spirit." The Middle Ages produced great preachers like Bernard, Bonaventura, Anselm; but the development of the Scholastic philosophy was not favourable to the development of homiletic power. The Mendicant or Preaching Friars wrought a revolution in this matter by the vigour and homely common-sense with which they replaced the subtleties of their predecessors. The greatest preacher of mediæval times—the most like, it has been said, of all Christian preachers to the ancient prophets—was Savonarola. But, unfortunately, the ignorance of the clergy, and the neglect into which the study of the Scriptures had fallen, became a fatal drawback; and it was the first great work of the Reformation to restore preaching to its place of dignity as a means of grace. The avidity of the common people to read Scripture and hear it expounded was wonderful, and the result was that the "unpreaching prelates, whose pulpits, as Latimer expressed it, had been "bells without clappers" for many long years, were obliged to set up regular preaching again. The same variation which marked the early preachers characterised the great homilists of the Reformation. Thus, it was said, the preaching of Knox was like a thunderstorm; Calvin resembled a whole day's set rain, Beza was a shower of the softest dew. Latimer, in a coarse frieze gown, trudged afoot, and instructed the people in rustic style; while the courtly Ridley, in satin and fur, taught the same principles in his cathedral.

Since the Reformation the Roman Church has produced no famous preachers in England; but Bourdaloue, Massillon, and Bossuet, in France, were probably never surpassed. The English preachers of the same period have won themselves a deathless name: Jeremy Taylor, South, Baxter, Owen, Calamy, Wesley, and Whitefield, in the eighteenth century, roused England from the torpor into which she had fallen.

It is difficult to weigh accurately the estimate in which popular preaching is held at the present time. On the one hand it is certainly the fact that never probably were preachers who drew larger audiences than some in all denominations who could be mentioned at the present day. On the other it must be confessed that one hears "the sermon" often mentioned contemptuously, and the wish expressed that it might be omitted. The most powerful of living statesmen has expressed his conviction that the preaching power of the Church of England was never so great as it is at the present moment. But it is unpleasant to read advertisements in the Clerical newspapers of "manuscript sermons" at a cheap rate, which imitate handwriting so well that they cannot be detected in the gallery! This we may be sure of, that if preachers will take pains and have the ability to make their sermons worth hearing, they will not lack hearers, simply for the reason that the spirit of inquiry is abroad eager and keen. The writer of these lines has had a large experience of poor as well as rich audiences; and no one knows better, that the average agricultural labourer is one of the ablest of critics, knows a good sermon, and knows a bad one; no man better. A very clever essay by Mr. Mahaffy [Macmillan, 1882] thus analyses the causes of the decay of modern preaching:

1. Historical Causes: Loss of novelty.
   Increase of education.
   Quietness of modern life.

II. Social Causes:
   Need of social uniformity.*
   Absence of debate.
   Friendly life of the clergy.

* The preacher is required, on fixed and very frequent occasions, however indisposed or empty he may feel at the act of preaching, to ascend a narrow pulpit, where he has no power of movement or action. Indeed, all action more violent than that of speaking very loud, or thumping the cushion, is prohibited, and even these symptoms of energy have come to be considered excessive and ill-bred. He is obliged to find a text of Scripture from which to draw his lessons, even though there he now exactly appropriate and though he be forced to empi

III. and IV. Personal Causes:
   Want of ability.
   Want of piety.
   Want of general culture.
   Want of special training in rhetoric and in theology.

V. Defective Types:
   The logical extreme.
   The emotional extreme.
   The orthodox extreme.
   The heterodox extreme.
   Excessive saneness.
   Excessive variety.

And this is followed by an able and striking chapter suggesting remedies.

The Church of England Liturgy, so far as the rubric goes, has made but scant provisions for preaching. The only place where a sermon is provided for in the Prayer Book is in the Communion Service. Preaching, therefore, it has been said, is an essential part of that service, while it is merely an adjunct to Evening Prayer. The rubric giving directions for the sermon allows, as a substitute, "one of the household already set forth, or hereafter to be set forth by authority." But as we have shown practically the Church has recognised the great value of this ordinance, and there are a few churches probably where there are not at least two sermons a week. Queries on this point are always found in Bishops’ Visitations.

Preaching Crosses. — Crosses set up in the highway or places of public resort, which the friars and others were accustomed to preach. St. Paul’s Cross was one of the most remarkable; it was there that Latine preached some of his famous sermons.

Preaching Friars. [DOMINICANS.]

Pre-Adamites. — A name given to the supposed inhabitants of the earth before the creation of Adam; also to those who believe that such persons existed. The Pre-Adamite theory was first propounded in 1655, in a book by Isaac de la Peyrere, otherwise called Pericus, a native of Bordeaux, and in the service of the Prince of Condé. He says the great issues of poverty and wealth, for great par struggles which involve the weak and woe of millions, do not disdain to attract and to divert the audience by an appeal to that peculiarly human quality, the faculty of laughter. There is no art in the world, speaking on the subject nearest his heart, and most vital to those he addresses who avoids this great help to persuasion, exec the preacher. To him, while wit is wholly insensible, even humour is only allowed in the for of bitterness and sarcasm—the very forms which are really most unsuitable to his sacred office. There is, moreover, a large section of Christian who will not tolerate any variety of subject, w think that the preacher has but one message bring, and that so paramount in importance, th every moment not devoted to it is lost or waste and they require him to repeat this message even Sunday of his life."

Pre
n the sixth day God created men and women in all parts of the earth; and that long afterwards he made Adam and Eve to be His own peculiar people, the ancestors of the Jewish race. Moses intended to write the history of the Jews, and therefore says little of the first creation of man, or of his history; for the events recorded in Genesis are only those connected with the Jews, and have no reference to the other races living on the earth. As the Law was given to the Jews only, and to the Gentiles, so no sin could be imputed to the latter, according to St. Paul; no only evil, therefore, which the author of the book recognises is natural evil. To prove is theory, Peyreire had recourse to the dubious antiquities of the Chaldeans, Egyptians, and Chinese, and to the opinions of some Rabbins, who imagined there had been another world in existence before that described by Moses. He was apprehended by the Inquisition in Flanders, but released through the intercession of the Prince of Condé, and retracted his opinions. Modern scientific discoveries, in the opinion of some, have afforded grounds for the revival of the pre-Adamite theory. [EVOLUT10N; MAN.]

Prebend [Lat. prebenda, “an allowance”] was originally the portion of food allotted to each monk at the table where they were all accustomed to assemble. In course of time the Church revenues were divided among the monks and clergy, according to the election of each; but the term continued to be used to denote the fixed income which the division gave. The prebends were either prebenda capitulares or prebenda domicilares, the former being those held by a regular member of the chapter, and the latter, by a junior. They were of four degrees—majores, media, minores, or semi-prebenda. The holder of a re mend is called a prebendary, and receives a fixed income in return for certain services.

Precentor.—The leader of the choir and musical director; usually in cathedrals and collegiate churches. The precentor may be either a clerk or a layman. In Scottish churches, where there is no organ, there is early always a precentor to lead the singing.

Preces.—Prayers said by the priest and people alternately, as distinguished from antiphons, recited by the priest alone. In the Offices, the preces were said daily at prime and Compline, and also at Lauds and vespers on week-days. The verses and responses following the Creed and Lord’s prayer in our Prayer Book are a selection from these preces, and hence are sometimes alluded by that name.

Pre-Communion. [ANTE-COMMUNION.]

Preconisation [Lat. preconisare = praecoriri, “to announce publicly”].—The notice given by the Pope, signifying his approbation of the appointment of any person to a high ecclesiastical dignity. The notice is sent to the Cardinal-Protector of the nation to which belongs the candidate submitted for approval, and a Bull of Preconisation is given to the latter, and also posted up at the doors of the church. The term is also used to denote a public proclamation in meetings of Convocation.

Predestination.—A word used to denote the eternal purpose of God, whereby He has preordained whatever comes to pass. The Seventeenth Article of the Church of England declares that “predestination to life is the everlasting purpose of God,” etc. But this doctrine has been the occasion of considerable disputes and controversies among divines. If, say they, God has foreordained some men to election, the converse must be true that He has foreordained some men to reprobation. It is impossible to reconcile the doctrine of predestination with our ideas of the justice and goodness of God, as it makes God to be the author of sin, destroys moral distinction, and renders all our efforts useless. This doctrine had its origin in the attempts to define the relations between the human and the Divine will. It began with the discussions of Pelagius and St. Augustine. Pelagius held that a choice of salvation lay in man’s will; Augustine, that at the Fall, man lost all freedom of choice, and was deprived of the exercise of his free will. [FREE-WILL.] But the first advocate of extreme Predestinarianism was Gottschalk, a monk of the ninth century, who was condemned at a Council of Mainz for heresy, and died during his imprisonment at the Monastery of Hautvilliers. Other Predestinarians came forward from time to time during the Middle Ages, but the doctrine reached its fullest development with the teaching of Calvin [q.v.]. The doctrine of Predestination has been moderated within the present century, and in very few cases is the belief in double Predestination retained.

Preface to the Prayer Book. —The original preface [1549] was the Article now headed “Concerning the Service of the Church,” and was almost entirely drawn from the reformed Breviary of Cardinal Quignon, published in 1535. The present one was prefixed in 1661, and was probably drawn up by Bishop Sanderson of Lincoln.

Prefaces, Proper.—The special forms to precede the hymn Ter-Sanctus in the Holy Communion. Such prefaces are found in most ancient Liturgies, and have been variously styled Prefaces, Illations, Contests, and Prayers of the Triumpal Hymn. In the early English Church there was probably one for every day which had a Collect, but the number was afterwards reduced to ten, of which the Reformers retained five, viz.: for Christmas Day, Ascension Day, Easter Day, Whitsunday, and Trinity Sunday. That for Ascension Day was probably written by Gregory the Great; those for Easter and Trinity Sundays are from the Sacramentary of Gelasius; while those for Christmas and Whitsunday were composed in 1549.

Prelacy.—The office or dignity of a prelate or bishop.

Prelate.—This term, which is now limited to the highest of the three orders of the ministry, was formerly applied to all clerics who bore rule over other clerics, or who were highly esteemed in the Church. So Archbishop Secker says, "Parish priests are Prælati;" and Latimer, "A Prelate is that man, whosoever he is, that has a flock to be taught by him."

Premonstrants. [Norbert, St.]

Pre-sanctified.—In the Roman Church it is customary to have no consecration on Good Friday, a portion of the bread consecrated on Maundy Thursday being reserved for the following day. In the Greek Church this principle is extended to every day of Lent, except Saturdays, Sundays, the Feast of the Annunciation, and Maundy Thursday. For the days on which the pre-sanctified or pre-consecrated elements are used, a special service, omitting the Act of Consecration, is appointed, called the Mass of the Pre-sanctified. The idea underlying this practice is that the Holy Eucharist, being essentially a feast, is unsuitable for fast days. The use of the Pre-sanctified was enjoined by the Council of Trullo [A.D. 680] on every day in Lent except the Sabbath Day, the Lord's Day, and the Annunciation. The Council of Laodicea had previously forbidden consecration during Lent, except upon the Sabbath Day and the Lord's Day.

Presbyter, Presbyterian.—The Greek word presbyteros, "senior" or "elder," is frequently used in the Greek translation of the Old Testament to signify a ruler or governor—one chosen not for his age, but for his merits and wisdom. In the Christian Church a presbyter or elder is one who is set apart to a certain office and authorized to discharge the several duties of that office and station in which he is placed. The office of the presbyter consisted in feeding the flock of God, and exhorting and convincing the gain-sayers by sound doctrine, baptising, and celebrating the Eucharist, and leading the public prayers of the congregation. The body of Christians who call themselves Presbyterians hold that all the powers and rights of the Christian ministry, including ordination, are held and exercised by the single order of presbyters; that there is no order in the Church as established by Christ and His Apostles superior to that of presbyters; that all ministers, being ambassadors of Christ, are equal by their commission; that presbyter and bishop, though different words, are of the same import; and that prelacy was gradually established upon the primitive practice of making the moderator or speaker of the presbytery, a permanent officer. This is the point of controversy between the Presbyterians and Episcopalians. They maintain their position against the Episcopalians by the following Scripture arguments. They observe, that the Apostle planted churches by ordaining bishops and deacons in every city; that the minister who in one verse are called bishops, are in the next, perhaps, called presbyters; that we nowhere read in the New Testament of bishops, presbyters, and deacons in any one church, and that therefore we must of necessity conclude "bishop" and "presbyter" to be two names for the same office. They take the passage 1 Pet. v. 2-3, and say it is evident that the presbyters not only fed the flock of God, but governed it with episcopal power, and that Peter himself as a church officer was nothing more than a presbyter or elder. In Heb. xiii. 7-17 and 1 Thess. v. 12 the bishop is spoken of as discharging various offices in which it would be impossible for any man to perform for more than one congregation, for they were to be as such as all the people were to know, esteem, and love, they could not have been diocesan bishops, whom ordinarily the hundredth part of their flock never hear nor see. Again, in James v. 14, the elders whom the Apostle James desires the sick to call for when the highest permanent order of ministers: is evident that these elders cannot have been diocesan bishops, otherwise the sick would have been often without the reach of the remedy proposed for them. From Acts xx. 17, etc., where St. Paul sends from Miletus to Ephesus to call the elders of the Church, the Presbyterians argue that the was in the city of Ephesus a plurality of equal authority without any superior pastor or bishop over them, for the Apostle directs his discourse to them all in common and gives them equal power over the whole flock. They argue, therefore, that Paul left in the Church of Ephesus, which he had planted, no other successors to himself than presbyters-bishops, or Presbyterian ministers and that he did not devolve his power upon any prelate. Timothy, whom the Episcopalians allege to have been the first Bishop of Ephesus, was present when this settlement was made [Acts xx. 5]; and had he been their bishop, it is not to be supposed that the Apostle would have devolved the whole episcopal power upon the presbyters before his face; for if ever there were a season fit than another for pointing out the duty of a supposed bishop to his diocese and his presbyters' duty to him, it would have been with St. Paul was taking his final leave of the bishops of Ephesus. And by the Apostle invested with authority, ordain and rebuke presbyters, are facts about which both parties are agreed. What, then, was his office in that city? To this Presbyterian replies that his power was that of an evangelist, 2 Tim. iv. 5, and not of a fixed prelate. It will thus be seen that they identify the office of bishop with that of presbyter, and hold the presbyterate to be the highest permanent office in the Church, every faithful pastor of a flock being successor to the Apostles in everything in which they were to have any successors.

The modern Presbyterian theory of Church government dates from the Reformation. Latter earnestly taught that all Christians are priests unto God. Even had he been desirous of preserving an Episcopal form of government, he course which the Reformation took on the Continent, so different from that in England, would have prevented him. It was, however, Calvin, with that genius for organisation which so remarkably characterised him, who established the Presbyterian form of government. He incorporated his ideas with that of the State control, and so arranged that the Council of State in consultation with the people, should choose the presbyters, each of whom was to have his allotted work, and the assembly of whom together in Consistory were to deal with all cases of ecclesiastical discipline. There were ministers who were to preach and teach, and the elders who ruled the Church. Both, however, were recognised a holding spiritual office. His idea was adopted in the Reformed Church of France, and also in Scotland [Scotland, Church of], where there are now three main bodies of Presbyterians, viz.: the Established Church, the Free Church, and the United Presbyterians. In England Presbyterianism was started in 1572 at Wandsworth, when a presbytery was opened with its "Book of Order." In the struggles between the House of Stuart and the House of Commons, Presbyterianism represented the side of the latter, and the downfall of Charles I. was the signal or the abolition of the Episcopal Church on June 29th, 1647. The famous Westminster Assembly, and its Catechism, which we have noticed in its place, represents the zenith of Presbyterianism in England. But in a very few years it was displaced by Independency under Cromwell. The result was that Presbyterianism became altogether weakened as a power in England, and on the Restoration, he non-Episcopal ministers, most of them Presbyterians, were ejected from their livings. Even in Scotland, Presbyterianism was downtrodden until the Revolution. In England, there it had not gained the affection of the people, most of the congregations, in reaction from Calvinism, became Unitarian. Nevertheless, Presbyterianism upon the old Puritan lines has been revived in the present century in England. In 1836 two Presbyteries were formed in union with the Church of Scotland, no more were added in 1839. On the Scottish disruption, in 1843, the English Presbyteries severed this connection, and joined the English congregations of the "United Church." In 1876 they were all united under the title of the "Presbyterian Church of England." In the census of 1881, 275 congregations were returned, of which seventy-five are in London. One of its noblest works is the China Mission.

In Ireland, Presbyterianism is the largest denomination in the province of Ulster, where there is a large population of Scottish blood. In America the first Presbytery met at Philadelphia in 1705. After many divisions and offshoots a reunion was established in 1870, when a great General Assembly met again at Philadelphia. It was then found that the Presbyterian Church contained no less than 4,238 ministers, with 446,561 members. In 1882 the ministers were 6,143, the Church members 592,128. The Presbyterian Church, therefore, of the United States is at present a very flourishing body.

Presbyterii Corona ["the crown, or circle, of the presbytery"].—An allusion to the fact that the seats of the presbyters in ancient churches were frequently arranged in a semi-circle, with the bishop's throne in the centre.

Presbytery [from the Greek word presbuteron, a word which is used twice in the Greek translation of the New Testament for "sanhedrin" (Acts xxii. 5, Luke xxii. 66)]. In the early Christian Church it signified the assembly of all the clergy of the diocese, both presbyters and deacons, as may be seen from the writings of St. Cyprian, Pope Siricius, St. Ignatius, etc. The word is often used in Scotland to designate the presbyter's house.

Presence, Real. [Lord's Supper.] Presentation is the offering of a clerk by the patron to the ordinary for institution into a benefice. It is sometimes confounded with nomination, which, however, signifies the offering of a clerk to the patron that he may be presented. After presentation the bishop may, if the clerk presented show want of learning, or if he has been convicted of perjury or other great crime, refuse to institute him. If a presentation is not made to the bishop within six months after the living is vacant, it lapses to the bishop; after another six months, to the archbishop, and from him to the Crown.

Presentation of Christ in the Temple. [Purification, Feast of.]

Prester John, or John the Presbyter.—A king whom tradition declared to be reigning in the Indies, or Tartary, during the twelfth century. It is now doubted whether he really existed, and the legends concerning him are vague and contradictory. It was reported that a Christian king was reigning somewhere beyond Persia who had gained brilliant victories over the Mohammedans, and who was a priest as well as a king. In the thirteenth century messengers were sent to seek the Presbyter John, or his kingdom; they returned saying that a Nestorian king of that name had existed some time before, but was now dead. It is now generally believed that the name was not John, but Jorkhan, or Coirkhan; that he ruled in some district of Central Asia, and was converted to Christianity from Buddhism.

Price Lectures.—A series of lectures delivered annually in Lent at Boston, according to the will of William Price [d. 1770]. The preacher receives £16, and after each lecture there is to be an offertory for the poor, to which the churchwardens must contribute 5s.

Priestley, Humphrey, D.D. [b. at Padstow, Cornwall, 1648; d. at Norwich, 1724], was descended from an ancient Cornish family, and was educated at Liskeard, Bodmin, and Westminster, and Christ Church, Oxford. While at Oxford Prideaux published an edition of Lucius Florus, and a commentary on the inscriptions of the Arundel Marbles. He was presented in 1679 to the rectory of St. Clement's, Oxford, and to the Hebrew lectureship at Christ Church in the same year; became Archdeacon of Suffolk in 1688; in 1781 he was made Prebendary of Norwich, and in the next year Rector of Bladen with Woodstock, near Oxford. This he exchanged later for the living of Saham, in Norfolk. He became Vicar of Trowse, near Norwich, in 1696, and Dean of Norwich in 1702. During his residence at Saham, Prideaux entered into a contest against the Roman Catholics, and wrote in favour of the validity of the orders of the Church of England. He afterwards did his best to preserve the Church of England from the plans of James II. He published a Life of Mahomet in 1697; Directions to Churchwardens in 1707; a work upon Tytches in 1710; and The Connection of the History of the Old and New Testaments, 1715-1717. At his death Dr. Prideaux left a large collection of Oriental books to the library of Clare Hall, Cambridge.

His Life of Mahomet is a most violent production, taking the lowest view of the prophet's character, and accusing him of being a rank impostor. The Connection is a very learned and valuable work, which is still read, and has never been superseded.

Priest [a contraction of the Latin presbyter, which is derived from the Greek presbuteros, "elder"].—The Greek and Latin words, hiercus and sacerdos, which we translate "priest," are derived from words which signify "holy," and so a priest's functions are of a holy or sacred character. But in the Jewish Church it signified one set apart for the performance of sacrifice, and it has often been said that there can be no official priest in the Christian Church but Christ, as He alone can offer a sacrifice to God. Against this is quoted, "Ye are built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifice i.e. of prayer, praises, and thanksgiving, etc. [1 Pet. ii. 5]. This passage, however, most strongly applies to the whole body of the faithful. In Episcopalian language, the word "priest" designates the second order in the Christian ministry. The use of the word in the Prayer Book was objected to at the Savoy Conference in 1662 by the Presbyterians, who requested that "as the word 'minister,' and when, 'priest' or 'curate,' is used in the absolution, and in divers other places, it may throughout the whole book be so used instead of the two words." To which the Episcopal commissioners replied that "it is not reasonable the word 'minister' should be only used in the Liturgy. For since some parts of the Liturgy may be performed by a deacon, and others, such as absolution and consecration, by no one under the order of a priest, it is fit that so such word as 'priest' should be used for the offices, and not 'minister,' which signifies, large, every one that ministers in that office of what order soever he be." The Church of England in her "Office of Institution," witnesses to the existence "sacerdotal functions;" these are the offering of sacrifice, of praise, and thanksgiving, the Eucharist; "the declaring and pronouncing the absolution and remission of sins;" the blessing of the people in God's name.

Priestley, Joseph, an eminent Unitarian writer, the son of Jonas Priestley, a cloth-dresser at Birstal Fieldhead, near Leeds, was born at Fieldhead on March 18th, 1733. His mother dying when he was six, he was adopted by his aunt, who took him to a free grammar school, where he learnt Latin and Greek, and during his education taught himself Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic. He was intended for the ministry, but for a time obliged to give up study on account of ill-health, and was engaged in mercantile pursuits. However, in 1752, becoming stronger, he entered a Dissenting academy at Daventry. His father and aunt were Calvinists, but Priestley had many discussions on the subject, and was himself inclined Arminianism, though he declares he then "had no means rejected the doctrine of the Trin or of the Atonement."

On quitting the academy in 1755 he became minister at Needham Market, in Suffolk, went thence to Nantwich in Cheshire in 1757, and in 1761 was Professor of Language and Belles-Lettres at the Dissenting academy at Warrington. He became very famous for his scientific works, and was made a member of the Royal Society and a Doctor of Laws by the University of Edinburgh. In 1767 he became minister at Millhill, near Leeds, and in 1773 librarian and literary companion of Lord Shelburn, on leaving whom he returned to a congregation at Birmingham.
here he wrote a reply to Burke, Reflections on the French Revolution, for which he was made a citizen of the French Republic. This so angered his fellow-citizens that a mob broke into his house and destroyed all its contents. In 1791 he removed to Hackney, but did not remain long, being very unpopular on account of his opinions. He sailed for America in 1794, and died at Northumberland in Pennsylvania, Feb. 6th, 1804.

Dr. Priestley is mostly noted for his discoveries in chemistry, etc.; but he also wrote many theological works, as The Scripture Doctrine of Remission, which shows that the Death of Christ is no proper Sacrifice nor Satisfaction for Sin, Letters to a Philosophical Unbeliever, and other works containing criticisms of Fane's doctrines. This led to his being called in England an atheist, to refute which he wrote Disquisition Relating to Matter and Spirit, in which he argues that our hopes of resurrection must rest solely on the truth of the Christian revelation, and have no foundation in science: History of the Early Opinions concerning Jesus Christ, which led to controversy between him and Dr. Horsley, Priestley maintaining the doctrines of Necessity, Materialism, and Unitarianism.

Primate.—A title formerly given to all metropolitans in the Western Church, but afterwards confined to those of the more important cities, or those who gained the title by request from the See of Rome. The Primate of the West corresponded to the Patriarch of the East. He was authorised to hold ecclesiastical synods, to confirm bishops, and to perform the most honourable functions in the Church, such as the consecration of the sovereign. These privileges were first granted to Rome by the bishops of Thessalonica. In Roman Catholic countries the title has become title more than a name, as the Pope has resumed the rights granted to primates. Such nominal primates are the Archbishop of Olong, of Spain; Bourges and Lyons, of France; Pisa, of Italy, and others. The archbishop of York is primate of England, and the Archbishop of Canterbury primate of England; the archbishops of Armagh and Dublin primates of Ireland; and St. Andrew's, Scotland.

Prime. [Canonical Hours.]

Primer or Prymer.—A manual of private devotion and elementary religious instruction. The Primer, in its earliest form, containing the Creed, Lord's Prayer, and Ten Commandments, was probably in use in Anglo-Saxon times. In course of time prayers and offices were added, and it seems rare that for two centuries, at least, before the Reformation "The Primer" was the book of devotion authorised by the Church of England for the use of the laity. It was usually in English, but sometimes partly Latin and partly English. The following is a table of the contents of one of a date about 1400:

Matins and the Hours of Our Lady.
Evensong and Compline.
The vii. penitential Psalms [vi., xxxii., xxxviii., li., ciii., cxxx., cxliii.].
The xv. Psalms [Songs of Degrees. Psalms cxxx. — cxxxiv.].
The Litany.
Placebo [the Vespers for the dead, beginning Placebo Domine].
Dirge (the Office for the Dead, beginning with the anthem Dirige in conspectu tuo vivam, Psalm v. 8). The Psalms of commendation [Psalm cxxix.]
Pater Noster.
Ave Maria.

Cred. The Ten Commandments.
The Seven Deadly Sins.

In the reign of Henry VIII. several books of devotion were published under this title, but lacking authority. Such was Marshall's Primer, published in 1530, which omitted the Litany, on account of the invocations of saints contained therein. The Litany was inserted in a second edition [1535], but a warning against the invocations was added. In 1539, Hilsey, afterwards Bishop of Rochester, published another, "at the commandment of the right honourable Lord Thomas Cranwell." Hilsey's Primer contains "the bidding of the beads," on which our "bidding prayer" [See Canon LV.] is founded, and retains the prayers for the dead, but omits most of the invocations of saints from the Litany.

In 1545, Henry VIII. authorised the issue of what is called King Henry's Primer, "set forth by the King's Majesty and his clergy, to be taught, learned, and read; and none other to be used throughout all his dominions." It contained:

The Kalendar.
The King's Highness' Injunction.
The Prayer of Our Lord.
The Sainctation of the Angel.
The Creed or Articles of the Faith.
The Ten Commandments.
Certain Graces.
The Canonical Hours.
The seven Psalms.
The Litany.
The Dirge.
The Commendations.
The Psalms of the Passion [xxii., lix., lxxxviii., lii., and lxi.].
The Passion of Our Lord.
Certain godly prayers for sundry purposes.

This was several times reprinted and revised by the Bishops. The edition of 1549 omitted the remaining invocations of saints from the Litany; that of 1551 expunged the "Hail Mary" and other passages. To the editions of 1552 and 1559 the Catechism, as far as the end of the Lord's Prayer, was added. In 1560 a Latin version of the Primer, called the Horarium, was issued.

Princetis. — Followers of Henry James Prince, an Evangelical clergyman [b. 1811], who established the sect about 1840, declaring:
that the Holy Ghost, in his own person, had established it by a new dispensation to supersede that of Christ. Prince studied at Lampeter College, where he organised a small body of students, under the name of the "Lampeter Brethren," to meet together for prayer and the study of the Scriptures, especially the Song of Solomon. He next became curate at a village near Bridgewater, where he converted the rector and some other persons to a belief in his mission, and created such an uproar that his licence was withdrawn, and he removed to a curacy in Suffolk, with the same result. In 1842 the Lampeter Brethren met together at Swansea to discuss their plan of action; Prince, as "the Holy Ghost personified," was acknowledged as their leader, and a temporary community, called the "Agapemone, or Abode of Love," was established at Weymouth. A great number of rich ladies joined the sect, and Prince became possessed of great wealth, with which he enlarged the institution at Weymouth, and he and his friends settled there to live in luxury. Adopting the principles of the American Perfectionists, the Princeites declared there was no need for prayer, and abandoned themselves to enjoyment, without seeking to gain fresh converts. As in other similar cases, there have been very gross scandals in relation to Prince's moral conduct, the more revolting as connected with certain blasphemous pretensions which can only be barely alluded to here.

Prior.—The superior of certain convents of monks, second only in rank to the abbot, and holding a position very similar to our deans. The use of the word in this sense seems only to date from the thirteenth century, the older term being propositus or "pro-vost." Monasteries attached to a cathedral were ruled by a prior, as the abbot was in all such cases the bishop himself; and the alien priories were so called because they were under the abbot of some large monastery, the prior acting as his lieutenant. There were two kinds of priors—the priores clausulares, who were subordinate to the abbots, or acted as their substitutes; and the priores conventuales, who were masters in their own monasteries, and had under them other "officials," such as "chief dean," "cellarer," etc. There were also claustral and conventual priores.

Priscia.—A Roman virgin, whose martyrdom is commemorated on January 18th. She suffered in the reign of Claudius [about A.D. 270]. The story is that she was exposed to the lions in the amphitheatre, but the animals refused to harm her, and crouched at her feet instead. She was finally beheaded, and an eagle came and watched her body until it was buried.

Priscillian, an heresiarch of the fourth century, was a Spaniard of good family, considerable wealth, and great eloquence at learning. Numerous heresies, including Gnosticism, Manicheism, Arianism, and Sobellianism, contributed to form his system, and he was also addicted to the practice of astrology and magic. His principles were ascetic, and he has been falsely charged with secretly encouraging impurity. He allowed his followers to use decoct to conceal their opinions, and they were in the habit of attending Catholic services, and receiving, but not consuming, the consecrated elements. The held that Christ was not a real man, but he only assumed the appearance of one. They fasted on Sundays and Christmas Day. Women were allowed to officiate in their services. The system was mainly built on some apocryphal books, but Priscillian recognised the complete canon of Scripture, altered and explained to support his views.

Priscillianism gained many converts, especially of the weaker sex. About A.D. 379 a provincial Council was held at Saragossa at which the heresy was condemned. Priscillian, however, found supporters in the Bishops Salvianus and Justianus, and Iginus of Cordova, who, wishing to convert the heretics, was consecrated Bishop of Avila; but by the influence of the orthodox party these were banished from Spain with the heresiarch. After a time they returned, and, by means of bribery, procured the restoration to their sees and the banishment of Ithacius and Idacius, their chief opponents. But after the murder of Gratian Ithacius succeeded in persuading the usurper Maximus to call a Council at Bordeaux [A.D. 384], which condemned the heresy. Priscillian appealed to Maximus, but after a formal judgment was pronounced against him, and, in spite of the remonstrance of Mart, Bishop of Tours, he was put to death, with of his companions, by beheading [A.D. 385]. The heresy did not disappear with the death of its founder. His followers flourished, despite of their further condemnation at Synod of Toledo [in 400], till the sixth century when they began to diminish, and recasted their death-blow at the Synod of Braga in 5

Private Baptism.—The present Pra Book allows private baptism only when there is some "great cause and necessity," does not provide for its administration any but a "lawful minister." The mediae Offices, however, provided for the pri administration of the Sacrament by lay rubrics of which the substance was tained in the first Prayer Book of 1549 follows:

"The pastors and curates shall oft adhor the people that they defer not the baptism infants any longer than the Sunday or of holy day next after the child be born, un upon a great and reasonable cause declare the curate, and by him approved."
"And also they shall warn them that, without great cause and necessity, they baptise not their children at home in their houses: and when great need shall compel them so to do, that then they minister it in this fashion:—

"First, let them that be present call upon God for his grace, and say the Lord’s Prayer, if the time will suffer. And then one of them shall name the child, and dip him in the water, or pour water upon him, saying these words: ‘N., I baptise thee,’ etc."

But lay baptism was regarded with disfavour among the clergy, and in 1575 a canon was passed by Convocation, forbidding laymen "to intermeddle with the ministering of baptism privately." Elizabeth, however, refusing to sanction this, the rubrics remained unaltered till 1604. In that year they were altered so as to exclude any hint of the performance of the rite by laics. There still remained considerable freedom as to the prayers to be used, but this was removed in 1661 by the insertion of the words which in the present rubric follow the phrase, "And say the Lord’s Prayer."

Privilege.—An enactment in the Roman church, granting some special benefit against or without the law; it differs from a dispensation in that it legalises many acts done in pursuance of it, whereas a dispensation refers to a single act. Privileges are against the law when the duty of paying taxes or of submitting to the ordinary is omitted, and outside the law in the cases of authorising acts allowable only in certain cases, as in dispensing, absolving, etc.

Probabilism.—The theory that in all matters where there is any doubt as to the right course of action, there is no sin as long as the probable course is taken. There are some glimpses of probabilism in the works of some of the early Greek Fathers, but the doctrine did not assume any importance till the sixteenth century, when it was adopted by Medina, a Spanish Dominican, and in the following century was held by many of the Jesuits. It was soon divided into four classes:—

Probabilism simple, that is, the doctrine that is lawful to act upon any probable opinion, however slight its probability; Equi-probabilism, which declares that an opinion may be acted upon if it is equally probable with another; Probabiliorism, in which only the more probable opinion may be acted upon; and Sentorism, which requires that the more safe opinion shall be followed, even if it be the less probable. The first Jesuit to adopt probabilism was Gabriel Vasquez. It was further developed by Escobar, Coninich, Hurdo de Mendoza, and Henríquez. There were very many who were hostile to the doctrines, especially in France, the most famous among the Jansenists. It was first condemned at the Council of the Sorbonne in 1620, and it was afterwards condemned by several of the Popes, notably by Innocent XI. In the last century probabiliorism was the more popular doctrine, but in the present century that theory has entirely disappeared, and probabilism is the only existent theory. The greatest modern probabilist writer has been St. Liguori [q.v.].

Processional Banner.—A banner carried in processions (e.g. on Rogation Days). Usually embroidered with some sacred emblem or picture.

Processionale.—A book of services for use in processions.

Procession of the Holy Ghost.—The doctrine of the Procession of the Holy Ghost is important as distinguishing His personality from that of the Son, who is Begotten. The Council of Constantinople, in extending the Nicene Creed to meet the Macedonian heresy, asserted it in our Lord’s own words from John xv. 26: "I believe in the Holy Ghost, the Lord and Giver of Life; who proceedeth from the Father," thus expressing the belief of the universal Church. But though there was never any doubt in the Church as to the fact, there afterwards arose a serious controversy as to the manner of this procession. The Western Church generally held what is called the doctrine of the Double Procession, viz. that the Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father and the Son, and the phrase "and the Son" soon found its way into copies of the Creed. The addition is first heard of at the Council of Toledo, A.D. 589, at which was recited a Latin version of the Constantinopolitan Creed, containing the words et filio. The records of the Council make no mention of any discussion or dissent on the point, and it seems that those present were ignorant that any addition had been made to the original Creed. It is probable, therefore, that this form of the Creed was already widely current in the West. Nor does it seem that the doctrine of the Double Procession was yet denied by the Eastern Church, for we find it asserted without discussion at the English synod of Hatfield [A.D. 680], presided over by Archbishop Theodore, who had lately come from Tarsus. But in the eighth century we hear of disputes on the subject at the Council of Gentilly, where the envoys of Constantine Copronymus reproached the Western Church with adding to the primitive Creed, and again at the Council of Friuli, A.D. 796, where the "Filioque" clause was defended as being an explanation, not an addition. About this time Charlemagne entered into a correspondence with Pope Hadrian, demonstrating with him for approving a version of the Creed put forth by Sarasin of Constantinople, in which it was said that "The Holy Ghost proceedeth from the Father by the Son," and protesting against the statement "that the Holy Ghost proceedeth not from the Father and the Son, according to the Faith of the Nicene Symbol, but from the Father by the Son."

The Pope, in his answer, defended himself by quoting the Fathers, but, strange to say, does not deny that the words "and the Son" are in the primitive Nicene Creed appealed to by Charlemagne. The controversy had now assumed serious proportions, and in 809 a Council was convened by Charlemagne at Aix for its consideration. A complaint was here received that a certain monk of St. Saba's, named John, had attacked some Latin monks of Mount Olivet on account of this doctrine, and had even attempted to expel them forcibly from the place. The Council condemned John's action, and approved the Filioque clause. A report of the proceedings was forwarded to Pope Leo, with a request that he would confirm the decision; but he, while agreeing with the doctrine, condemned its insertion into the Creed as unauthorised, and caused two silver tablets to be set up in the church of St. Peter, engraved with the original form of the Creed in Latin and Greek. It was not long, however, before the addition was received and sanctioned by the Church of Rome as well as by the other Western Churches. The disputes on this subject between the Churches of the East and West seem now to have ceased for a time, but they were revived at a later period; and these, increased by the mutual jealousy of the bishops of Rome and Constantinople, led in 1054 to the schism between the two branches of the Church which continues to this day.

Procopius.—Successor to Ziska as lead of the Hussites. Procopius was born a noble though poor family. He had rich influential friends, however, through who means he received a good education, and was able to travel in foreign countries. He entered the Church; but on the outbreak of the quarrel between his country, Bohemia, and German, he threw himself heart and soul into the struggle, and took command under Ziska, leader of the Hussites. After the death of Ziska, their opponents planned a vigorous attack, thinking that as the Hussites had in their leader they would be easily conquered. They found out their mistake, however, in the field of Aussig [June 15th, 1426], where Procopius, with a small army, utterly defeated the Germans. After this battle the Hussites were joined by many of their Roman Catholic countrymen, and with their aid Procopius defeated an army led by those Electors the Empire who had taken up the cause consequence of a crusade preached against the Reformers of Bohemia by Pope Martin the year 1427. In 1429 Procopius called together a Diet at Prague to ask permission to go to Vienna and plead before the Emperors personally the wrongs under which the Bohemians were suffering. He demanded of Sigismund the free preaching of the Gospel, communion in both kinds, and an arrangement with regard to ecclesiastical property. His journey was ineffectual, and the same year he marched into Germany at the head of 80,000 men, a returned home victorious. By this time terror of their arms had spread through Europe, and Pope Eugenius IV. was prevail upon in 1439 to preach another crusade, to offer all sorts of inducements and relief from penances to all who should take part in the expedition, and the result was an army 130,000 men. There is no doubt that the lit army under Procopius would have been crushed by such overwhelming numbers but it not been that, when the armies met Reisenberg on Aug. 14th, 1431, a sudden a most unaccountable panic seized the invader army, who to a man turned and fled with striking a blow. But this marvellous success was not destined to last long. A quarrel broke out between two sects of the Church and anthems, first sung in processions, were early replaced by solemn Litanies. Note worthy amongst these is the Litania Septem of Gregory the Great, or the Great Litany of St. Mark's Day, which provides for seven processions setting out from different starting places and meeting at a central church for solemn service. It was from this Litany the an anthem, chanted by Augustine and his monks on entering Canterbury, was derived. According to Scriptural and ancient usage the procession was a distinct service in itself and not, as now, a mere adjunct to some other service.

Procesions.—Ecclesiastical processions are of early origin in the Church, being heard of as early as the time of Gregory Thaumaturgus [A.D. 254]. They were introduced into Constantinople by Chrysostom [A.D. 398]. The Church historian, Socrates, relates that the Arians, being forbidden to use any churches in the city, were accustomed to assemble about the porches, and march to their meeting-houses without the walls, singing anthems on the way. To counteract their influence, Chrysostom established processions of the orthodox, in which clergy and people ambulated the city singing hymns, and carrying large silver crosses and lighted wax tapers. By the fifth century, processions had come into general use in the Church. In 467, Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne, on the occasion of a great earthquake, instituted processions to be held annually in Ascension week, for the purpose of imploring God's grace and protection. The observance of these Rogation days became general. In England they received the name of Gospaegan or (procession days), and the perambulations of parishes then performed still survive in the custom of "beating the bounds." The joyful hymns chemia, which resulted in civil war, and in the first battle, fought at Lipan in 1434, Propius was killed. Without him the army could make no stand, and with him to a great extent died the energy and vitality which had ood the Bohemians in such good stead.

Procurations.—This was the name in the Middle Ages for banquets which at stated times were provided by the vassals for their lords, and also by the incumbents of parishes to their bishops and archdeacons at the time of visitation. It afterwards became the custom give a sum of money instead, and under the name of “Procurations” they are still asked from the clergy.

Prodicus.—A heretic of the second century, who founded the sect of Prodicians, and taught doctrines similar to those of the Antimian Gnostics. They declared that, being the sons of God, they were exempt from venery by law; for the same reason they could not keep the Sabbath, nor submit themselves to the external ordinances of religion. They professed to be the disciples of Zoroaster.

Propaganda.—A committee of Cardinals others at Rome established by Gregory 7. in 1622, for the Propagation of the Faith. It meets weekly under the presidency of the Pope, and deals with such matters as the mission and support of missionaries, the publication of religious books, and the assistance conversion. The full title is Colloquium de pagand Fide.

Propagation of the Gospel, Society of.—This Society was founded by Archbishop Tenison in 1701, the objects being to aid the emigrants and colonists from our own, and to evangelize the heathen. When this was first started there were probably not many clergymen of the Church of England to be found, while now in the countries which the Society labours there are 147 churches, nearly 7,000 clergy, and about 10,000 members of the communion. The president is always the Archbishop of Canterbury; and the bishops of England, Ireland, he Scotch Episcopal Church, as well as colonial and missionary bishops in common with the English Church, are vice-presidents. In 1885 the receipts amounted to 1,257 8s. 10d., and the payments to 1,307 8s. 7d. [Missions.]

Proper Lessons.—Special lessons to be read on certain holy days, instead of those printed in the Lectionary for the day of the week.

Proper Prefaces. [Prefaces.]

Proper Psalms.—Special psalms applied for certain holy days, instead of the Psalms for the day of the month. They are provided for Christmas Day, Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, Easter Day, Ascension Day, and Whitsunday.

Prophecy [Gr. pro, and phasis, “speech”].—The prefix pro has the three-fold meaning of “beforehand,” “in public,” “in behalf of.” But in its original meaning the second and third are the most important, and the word “prophecy” expresses the same idea as the Hebrew nabi, “forty-teller,” rather than “forteteller,” and in a yet deeper sense expounder and interpreter of the Divine Mind and Will. This is the ancient and Biblical meaning of the term, which includes all who are called prophets in the Old and New Testaments. There is no direct mention of a prophet in the early Patriarchial age. The name is, indeed, given to Abraham, but he utters no prophecies, and the predictions and prophecies which are made to him are never so called in the Bible. But Moses receives the name continually, and in the well-known passage in Deut. xviii. 15-18 he is made the type of the greatest of the prophets. With the death of Moses the gift seems to have fallen into abeyance. Joshua was highly indignant when he heard of Eldad and Medad prophesying in the camp. In the period of the Judges the only prophecy that of Deborah. At the close of that period the office of Prophet becomes fixed and established. Samuel is the true founder of the Prophet order. The expressions in the New Testament, “until Samuel, the prophet,” “Samuel and the prophets,” exactly express his position. In his time we first read of the “companions of the sons of the prophets,” called, in modern phraseology, the “schools of the prophets.” Under the shadow of his name they dwelt as within a charmed circle. Their influence extended with a glow of inspiration over their lawless age of change and confusion. The two most remarkable of the succeeding age were Nathan and David. At the close of Solomon’s reign the prophetic order became a ruling power in the State. Ahijah was the medium of transferring the crown of the kingdom of Israel to Jeroboam. From henceforth for two centuries, though glimpses of them appear from time to time in Judah, the prophets are almost entirely confined to Israel. The great prophetic centres were all within the northern kingdom,:--Bethel, Gilgal, Carmel, Jericho, Ramah. The prophets of this period are essentially prophets of action. They are remarkable not for what they said but for what they did, not because they created but because they destroyed. Of this class Elijah is the great representative. He attained a place equal to those of Moses and Samuel in the annals of his country. He threw a new halo around the whole order. He prepared the way for the succession of prophets who come before us within the next hundred years. He was the one who lingered longest in the affections and the expectations of his countrymen. Others who bore a more or less prominent part in this period were Iddo, Jehu, Obadiah, and, chieftest of all, Elijah's immediate successor, Elisha.

The next period is that of written prophecies, represented by Amos, Hosea, and, according to some learned critics, the unknown prophet whose writings are contained in Zechariah ix.–xii., xiii. 7–9. These are the prophets of the northern kingdom; while in the southern kingdom we have Isaiah i.–xxix., Micah, Joel, Zephaniah, Habakkuk, Jeremiah, Obadiah, and, according to the same critics we have before referred to, the unknown prophet who has, like the one just mentioned, been incorporated in the works of Zechariah, and whose writings are contained in chapters xii., xiii. 1–6, and xiv. There are also two prophets especially connected with the Captivity—Ezekiel and the evangelical prophet called by the greatest German Hebraists, followed by Dean Stanley and others, the "Second Isaiah" or "the Great Unknown," whose writings are joined on to those of his great predecessor and namesake in chapters xl.–lvi. In the period following the Captivity are Haggai, Zechariah, the unknown messenger called Malachi, and, if we accept the late date assigned by some of the modern critics, the Book of Daniel. The only prophet whose date cannot be fixed with any certainty is Jonah. An early Jewish tradition makes him the son of the widow of Zarephath. Others place him in the reign of Jeroboam II.; while many eminent critics think the book was not put together in its present form till long after the Captivity. It does not profess to have been written by Jonah, nor does it deal with the history of "the chosen people."

Such is a sketch of the history of the order; we proceed to consider its leading characteristics as an institution, and the character of the prophetic teaching.

We have said that in the highest sense of the word the prophets were the messengers and expounders of the Divine Will. They were usually called to their office through visions, such as those of the Burning Bush to Moses, of the Lord of Hosts to Isaiah, of the Wheels to Ezekiel. But their ordinary teaching was conveyed through the medium of their own thoughts, coloured by the circumstances in which they lived, and illustrated by the images of their every-day life. They were drawn from all classes of the community, from every station of life. David the king, Amos the herdsman, are instances to show the freedom of the order from any given circle of society. They were historians and biographers, though most of their work in this department is lost. The lives of David by Samuel, Gad, and Nathan; the lives of Jeroboam and Rehoboam by Iddo and Shemiah; the acts of Uzziah and Hezekiah by Isaiah—unless we conceive Isaiah xxxvi.–xxxix. to form a part of the latter work—have all perished. It is, however, certain that, however composite their parts may be, the Books of Samuel and Kings were the work of one or more of the prophets. Another important feature is to be found in their relation to the State. They were statesmen; they identified themselves with their country more than any other class; they laboured to maintain the national unity. In this position, sometimes in opposition to, sometimes in agreement with, the sovereign of the time, they maintained the true religion. They dwelt with undeviating emphasis on the great truths of the unity and the spirituality of the Lord on the supreme importance of charity, justice, goodness, and purity; and on the uselessness of the Ritual, apart from the Moral, Law. They were constant, vigilant watchmen after every kind of abuse and crime, and the fact that they lived constantly in the presence of God gave them the courage to say and do what was right and to be indifferent to human praise and blame. Another reason of their independence was their constant looking forward to the future. As we have already said, the use of the word which confines their work to mere prediction is not in accordance with fact. The cases of prediction of minute details fade away when submitted to minute examination, so that some critics have hesitated to assert, when a passage in Prophet coincides with historical narrative that this clearly indicates that the fact came first. This, however, is certainly an exaggeration, and though we may grant that the prophets of Christianity who come before us in the Acts of the Apostles are more declare of the Divine Will than predictors of its future, prediction is certainly a part of the function [e.g. Acts xi. 28; xxi. 11]. The rationalising school of German divines has on this ground maintained that the Book of Daniel was not written until the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, and, in fact, simp history written in the form of prophecy, Th view is accepted by Dean Stanley in his Jesus-Church. It was earnestly controverted by D. Pusey, who wrote a very learnt treatise on the purpose of proving that the common accepted date of Daniel is correct, that the book was written during the Captivity and is, in truth, prophetic and not narrative. Yet it may be fairlyasserted th there has been no diminution in the revere with which, even by the most "rationalist" critics, the Hebrew Prophets are regarded. Their greatness is recognised these critics as consisting not in the curio foretelling of future events, but in their erring vision, their profound and admiral insight, the unflinching boldness and subtil force with which they said that the god unrighteous kingdoms of the heathen co not stand, the intense fervour with which they asserted that the world's salvation lay in recourse to the God of Israel. It is constantly bearing in mind that the prophecies have two sides—a side towards their nation and its history at the moment, and a side towards the future of all mankind—and that without the historical and literary substructure the full religious significance of the Bible can never build itself up in our minds, that we shall alone be able fully to understand them.

A remarkable illustration will be found in the famous prophecy of the child whose name shall be called "Immanuel" [Is. vii. 14]. That birth was to be a sign to Ahaz that the confederacy of Rezin and Pekah should come to nought. It would certainly seem clear, therefore, that the prophecy had a fulfilment in the prophet's own time. But the Evangelist declared the perfect fulfilment was found in Christ, that He is the very "God with us." This is but one example. Such passages as xis. xii. 9; Zech. xi. 12, 13; Hosea xi. 1, and multitude of others, will occur to the reader, which one class of interpreters refuse to see any reference to our Lord, while the exponents on the other side interpret of Him alone.

The right method of regarding the controversy seems to be to guard, on the one hand, against mere fanciful speculations, which end not in edification, but to profitless ingenuity; and on the other, to weigh well the whole of the prophetic writings. "The mind," well writes Mr. Maitland, "is irresistibly led on by them [the circumstances and times of the writers] to search for some wider, complete fulfilment. Each lesser application may possibly be true as far as it goes; each may, for ought we can tell, have in time adorned, and left its trace in, the texture of the marvellous rain. But surely the whole soars to a loftier place, and demands grander events for its full and final signification. In a word, nothing short of the great Messianic expectation seems at all adequate to satisfy it; and Him it weaves together the brighter and the more sombre elements, the rejection and offering with the exaltation and the glory, with the precision and a fulness that could hardly have been surpassed if, instead of being a mysterious foreshadowing, it had been an actual history of the 'cross and passion, the precious death and burial, the glorious resurrection and ascension,' attributed by Christians to the Redeemer in whom they believe."

The simplest and the most striking explanation of the whole body of Messianic predications is that they are typical rather than exact, that God so ordered the course of events and the formation of individual characters, as to lead men's expectations by series of steps to the golden age of the future, to the manifestation of the most unique Character, the most extraordinary power, the greatest Name that has ever crossed a stage of history. When in the Prophets we are carried along with their burning words, we are admitted not by any fanciful straining of words, or by any doubtful application of minute predictions, but by the likeness of spirit with spirit, to their highest and most universal application. We gradually learn that the most natural meaning is also the most supernatural; that while not excluding a really predictive element, it is largely through the likeness of situation and feeling, that the connection of the words of the original author with Christ and with the Christian Church is to be explained. The Prophets are especially prophetic of Christ, because they treat of those truths of the spiritual life of which He was the Great Revealer and Illuminator; because more than any other characters of the Sacred History they share in the Divine views respecting life and death, righteousness and sin, success and failure, which were most fully exemplified in Him; because they gave utterance to the noblest hopes and aspirations that ever entered into the heart of man to conceive, and which find their first and only entire fulfilment in the life and death, in the teaching and the revelation of the Divinest and Greatest of the Prophets.

Prophesyings. — A name given to meetings in the latter part of the sixteenth century, the object of which was instruction and increase of spiritual life by means beyond those provided in the Liturgy of the Church. They were gatherings, sometimes of clergy, sometimes of both clergy and laity. A moderator presided, and each clergyman present delivered his views on some subject settled beforehand. They are first mentioned as taking place at Northampton in 1571, and became extremely popular. But there was obviously a danger of irregularity. The clergy were tempted to frame their discourses in such manner as to win popularity by flattering the prejudices of their lay brethren, and to become congregationalists rather than men controlled by their bishops. Before long Archbishop Parker took alarm at them, and when they reached Norwich, the head-quarters in those days of Nonconformity, he wrote to the Bishop commanding him to stop them. Some lay Privy Councillors wrote a counter-letter begging the Bishop to hold his ground; but Parker repeated his command, and they were stopped. Archbishop Grindal, believing that the Church was greatly lacking in efficient preachers, encouraged the prophesyings. Queen Elizabeth severely rebuked him, and commanded him to see that they were everywhere stopped. The Archbishop replied that they did much good, and that he would not suppress them. "I would rather offend your earthly majesty than the heavenly majesty of God." And he followed this by reminding the Queen that there was a judgment to come at which she must herself appear. She immediately convened a meeting of the Star Chamber, and proposed that Grindal should be deprived. With some difficulty the courtiers persuaded her to a milder course; the Archbishop was suspended, and confined to his house. Then the Queen sent a letter to all the bishops charging them to allow "no other service in the churches except that appointed by law, nor any to take part in public services except persons duly licensed." If any disregarded this command they were to be imprisoned. Most of the bishops obeyed. But Grindal's firmness—for he refused to apologise to the Queen, and remained for some years under her displeasure—had a great effect on public opinion. The prophecies still continued, and in 1585 the Bishop of Chester is found making regulations for their better management, chiefly in the direction of limiting them to the clergy. Jeremy Taylor wrote in their favour his treatise on The Liberty of Prophecying.

Protesytes.—Converts to some religion, or religious sect, but especially to Judaism. Among the Jews they were of two classes: the first were called "proselytes of the gate," and were allowed to live among the Jews and enjoy the same protection, on the condition that they should observe the moral laws given to Noah; the second were the "proselytes of justice," who received circumcision, bound themselves to keep the whole Law of Moses, and became thenceforward "sons of Israel," holding all the rights and privileges belonging to the Jewish race. Slaves born in the service of a Jew were circumcised, but this only bound them to servility during their master's pleasure, and they were not regarded as "true Israelites." But if the master set him free, the slave was baptised in the presence of three witnesses; and, if he refused to undergo this ceremony, he was sold again within twelve months. A proselyte who was not the son of a Jewess was not allowed to be a member of the Sanhedrin, or to hold any other public office.

Protestant Confessions.—These are Creeds, or Confessions of Faith, drawn up by the Reformed Church. The chief are:

[1] Confession of Augsburg.—A document drawn up by Melancthon with the approval of Luther, which was read at the Diet of Augsburg, June 25th, 1530, and was signed by the Elector of Saxony, the Margrave of Brandenburg, the Landgrave of Hesse, and many others. It caused a deep impression, even on the Romanists. It was divided into two parts. The first, which contained twenty-one articles, stated the various points of belief held by the Reformers, and the second enumerated the seven principal abuses of the Church of Rome upon which Luther founded the necessity for leaving it, viz.:—Communion in one kind, celibacy of priests, private masses, confessions, the admission of tradition, monastic vows, and indulgences. Eek, and other Roman theologians, prepared a confutation, which was read on Sept. 3rd. The majority declared that the Reformers had been confuted, and they were commanded to conform to the Roman views, which they refused to do. Meanwhile Melancthon had prepared an

[2] Apology of the Augsburg Confession, which was presented to the Diet, Sept. 22nd but refused. He re-wrote it, and published it together with a German translation by Justus Jonas, at Wittenberg, April, 1531. It is seven times as large as the Confession, and greatly superior in point of style and learning. It chief value is as a commentary on the Augsburg Confession.

[3] Confession of Basle, formulated by Ecolampadus in a speech at the Council of Basle in 1531, but elaborated by Myconius, and promulgated Jan. 21st, 1534. It is chiefly concerning the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and takes a position between the doctrines of Zwingli and Luther.

[4] The First Helvetic Confession, sometimes known as the Second Confession of Basle drawn up by delegates from several Swiss cantons at Basle in 1536. An attempt was made to draw up a confession that would be adopted by both the Lutherans and Reformer and both agreed to the German translation 1 Leo Jude. The Reformers first refused the Latin version; but after it had been altered by Myconius and Gryneus, both German and Latin were formally adopted by both parishes [Feb. 26th, 1536].

[5] Confession of Wurtzburg, based on Melancthon's Confession, was adopted by Swiss and Wurtzburg divines in 1552.

[6] The Forty-nine Articles, which we drawn up by Cranmer and others in 1536 and adopted the next year, and revised a reduced to Thirty-nine under Queen Elizabeth and have ever since been retained in the Church of England. [ARTICLES, THIRTY-NINE.]

[7] Confession of France, adopted by the Huguenots at Paris in 1559, was Calvinist. Their ecclesiastical constitution was representative, combining independent congregations and a united general Church.

[8] The First Confession of Scotland was consummated by the Scottish Parliament, August 24th, 1560. It corresponded with the German Confessions, but is not copied from any of them. It is much simpler in its structure than the Swiss Confession.

[9] The Belgic Confession was written French by Guis de Bles and Adrien Saravia in 1561. It was revised by Frar Juius of Bourges, a student of Calvin's, and was sent to Geneva and other Churches approval. It was formally adopted at Awerp in 1566, and translated into Dutch, German, and Latin. It is still the recognised symbol of faith in the Reformed Churches in Holland and Belgium, and in the Reffor Protestants.—A name first taken in Germany by those followers of Luther who protested against the decree of the Diet of Spires 1529, signed by Charles V. and other Roman Catholic princes. This decree entirely rescinded the reforms of the former Diet of Spires 1526, by which several reforms, including marriage of the clergy, communion in both kinds, the use of the vernacular, were suspended, and by which several abuses were abolished. The Protest was signed by the elector John of Saxony, the Margrave George of Brandenburg, the Landgrave Philip of Hesse, and others. The name of protestants was also given to the Calvinists, who since 1560 had from that day, and is now applied indiscriminately to all the Reformed Churches, though it has never been generally adopted by the Church of England.

Protevangelion.—The name of a book attributed to St. James, the first Bishop of Jerusalem, containing an account of the birth of the Virgin and that of Christ. A copy of the book in Greek was brought by Postelus from the East, and by him translated into Latin. The fables with which it is filled testify against its genuineness.

Prothesis.—A side-table in a church near the altar, on which the elements are to be placed before they are laid on the altar. This table, called in the East “Prothesis,” and in the West “Credence Table,” has been in almost universal use from the earliest Christian times. Though there is no actual mention of the prothesis in the Communion Office, yet there is a distinct allusion to it, as immediately before the prayer for Christ’s Church militant, it is made the duty of the priest to “then place upon the table so much bread and wine as he shall think sufficient.”

Up to this point, then, the bread and wine must be in some convenient place near at hand, and this can only be on the Prothesis or Credence Table.

Protonotary.—This title seems to have been first used at Constantinople in the eighth century, and to have designated the chief of the notaries [from protos, “first”]. After A.D. 800 the title was introduced into the West, and now designates any of the College of Protonotaries Apostolic. Bishop Clement of Rome is supposed, in the first century, to have appointed a notary for each of the seven wards of the city, to keep a record of the sufferings of martyrs, etc. When it became necessary to appoint others, the seven original notaries were called “protonotarii Apostolici.” Sixtus V. afterwards increased the number to twelve. In the Papal chapel they sit in the second tier, but in the consistories they sit with the Pope. Their duties are to register the Pontifical acts, to make and keep the official records of beatifications, etc.

Providence.—The superintending care which God exercises over creation. The arguments for the providence of God are generally drawn from the light of nature; the being of a God; the creation of the world; the wonderful disposing and controlling of the affairs and actions of men; the various blessings enjoyed by God’s creatures; the awful judgments that have been inflicted, and the wonderful preservation of the Bible and the Church throughout every age, notwithstanding the attempts of earth and hell against them. Some have denied that the providence of God reaches beyond a general superintendence of the laws of nature, and say that He never interposes in the particular concerns of individuals. This would be to render His government imperfect, and would leave no ground for reposing any trust under its protection, for then the majority of human affairs would be fortuitous, without any regular direction, and tending to no special scope. But the uniform doctrine of Scripture is that nothing in the universe happens without God, that His hand is ever active. His decree or permission intervening in all; that nothing is too great or unwieldy for His management, nothing too minute or commonplace to be beneath His care; that while He is guiding the planets in their course through the heavens, or ruling the nations of the world, He is still watching over and guiding the humblest of His creatures. We cannot, it is true, understand the manner in which Providence interposes in human affairs, and we are equally at a loss to explain how it directs the motions of the heavenly bodies; but the fact remains that there does exist an overruling influence in the moral world, as certainly as in the natural. It would be impossible to conceive God acting as the Governor of the world, unless He were to govern all the events which happen in it; He would then be no more than an unconcerned spectator of the behaviour of His subjects, regarding the obedient and the rebellious alike with an eye of indifference. From the imperfection of our knowledge to ascertain what is good for us, and from the defect of our power to bring about that good when known, arise all those disappointments which continually prove that man is not master of his own lot; that, though he may devise, it is God who directs—God who can make the smallest incident an effectual instrument of His providence for overturning the most carefully elaborated plans of man. Accident, chance, and fortune are words to which much is ascribed in the life of man; but what are they but synonyms for the unknown operations of Providence? In God's universe nothing happens in vain or without a cause; in that chaos of human affairs and intrigues, or that mass of confusion and disorder in which we can see no light, all is clearness and order in the sight of Him who is governing and directing all, and bringing forward every event in its due time and place.

Province.—The district under the jurisdiction of an archbishop. In England there are the provinces of Canterbury and York.

Provost [Lat. propositus].—A name used in many senses during the first eight centuries, but first applied to the official next in authority to the abbot in a monastery, and, according to the rules of St. Benedict, of equal rank with the diaconus. The office of provost in a cathedral chapter was often incorporated with that of the archdeacon, and the term is now used in the Roman Catholic Church to denote the head of the cathedral chapter. Formerly the name was also given to the president of a meeting; to the chief of a body of canons; and to the member of the chapter who managed church estates, distributed the common income, and superintended discipline.

Prudentius of Troyes.—A Spaniard whose real name was Galindo. He became Bishop of Troyes in 817, and died there in 861. He took part with Gottschalk in the controversy concerning Predestination, and wrote Ad Hinikarum and De Præd. contr. Jo. Scotus. He also wrote part of the Annales Bertiniæn, from 835 to 861. He was revered after his death as a saint.

Prussia, Conversion of.—The earliest attempt to convert Prussia to Christianity was made at the end of the tenth century by Adalbert, Bishop of Prague, who made a few converts at Danzig; but was martyred by the savage inhabitants, April 23rd, 997. Boleslaus, Duke of Poland, was more successful in continuing the work which Adalbert had begun and compelled the people, about 1018, to submit to baptism; but Christianity had not taken deep root, and in 1161 we find that the people made a bold stand against the new religion, which they feared would interfere with their freedom, and succeeded in throwing off their yoke. They continued to resist attempts for their conversion till the thirteenth century, when the knights of the Teuton Order undertook a crusade against them, and after about fifty years of war the heathen population was almost exterminated. By this means Christianity became permanently established in the country, as the Teutonic Knight settled in the territory from which they had driven their opponents.

Prymer. [Primær.]

Prynne, William [b. at Swanwick, Somersetshire, 1600; d. in London, Oct. 24, 1669].—A Puritan writer. He graduated Oxford, 1620, and afterwards studied law. He Histrionastix, an attack upon the amusements and frivolities of the time, created a great sensation, and he was arrested on a charge of seditious writing. He was tried before the Star Chamber, 1633, and, at the instigation of Archbishop Laud, was condemned to mutilation, lifelong imprisonment, and the payment of an enormous fine. He was released by Long Parliament, of which he was elector member, 1641, and took an important part in the trial of Laud, in which he was solicitor. He was violently opposed to Crc well, and pleaded in the cause of Charles which caused his expulsion from the Ho of Commons. His services in the cause the Restoration were rewarded by an appointment as Keeper of the Records in the Tow a work which was carried out with the greatest accuracy. Prynne also wrote News f. Ipswich, which was condemned with the Histrionastix as libellous and seditious.

Psalmistæ [Singers].—One of the inferior orders of clergy in the early Church, whose duty it was to lead the music.
origin of the order is to be placed not later than the beginning or middle of the fourth century. Psalms were admitted to their service by the priest, with this formula, "See what thou singest with the mouth thou livest in thy heart, and what thou believest in thy heart thou approvest by thy works."

Psalmody.—The art or practice of singling psalms.

Psalms, Psalter.—The Book of the psalms. The use of the Psalms in Christian worship undoubtedly dates from Apostolic times [See Col. iii. 16], and has been continued in all ages of the Church. They were held in very high esteem, and St. Athanasius calls them "the epitome of the whole Scriptures." A Syrian Christian education began with the psalms; and in the early Church generally they were so often repeated that the poorest Christians knew them by heart, and used to sing them at their work. From St. Basil d. 370 we gather that the service in his day consisted mainly of psalmody and prayer, and this is still the arrangement in the daily offices of the Greek Church. During the first twelve centuries, candidates for holy orders were usually required to have the Psalter by heart; Gennadius, Patriarch of Constantinople a.d. 494, refused to ordain anyone who did not fulfill this condition. Canons to the same effect were passed at the Eighth Council of Ochrid [A.D. 653] and the Council of Orviedo a.d. 1050.

The arrangements of the Psalter for divine service have been numerous. Some Churches appointed twenty or thirty psalms for a service, as many as fifty or sixty; while others were content with twelve. By the rule of St. Columbanus, the number varied with the length of the night and the season of the year, the whole Psalter being sometimes sung through in two nights. In the medieval church, as in the Church of Rome at the present day, the Psalms were distributed amongst the days of the week, so that the whole Psalter might be read weekly. The results of this arrangement were: [1] that one used on Sundays never varied; [2] that by the frequent occurrence of Saints' days, the arrangement was continually being disturbed, with the result that half the Psalms are not sung at all. "Notwithstanding at the ancient Fathers have divided the psalms into seven portions, whereof every one is called a Nocturn, now of late time a few of them have been daily said, and the rest tenderly omitted" [Prayer Book of 1549, Preface]. The gravity of this objection is shown in the fact, that in the Roman Church at sest or about fifty psalms are practically used.

To avoid these difficulties, the English Reformers divided the Psalter into sixty parts, that it is read through monthly, and the Sunday congregation have the whole presented to them in course of time.

There have been several modes of singing the Psalms. The earliest practice was for the whole congregation to sing each verse, but the custom, derived from the Jews, of antiphonal singing was early introduced. Pliny, in his famous letter to Trajan, speaks of the Christians as singing a hymn in turns, and St. Basil states that they sang responsibly. Sometimes verses were sung by the precentor and choir alternately, and sometimes the choir and congregation were divided into two bodies singing alternate verses. An order of singers [PSALMISTAE] arose about the beginning of the fourth century, and Ambrose of Milan [A.D. 374] and Gregory the Great [A.D. 590] devoted considerable attention to the subject of psalmody, and introduced the systems of chanting which bear their respective names. [Music.] In our Prayer Book the Psalms are said to be "pointed as they are to be sung or said in churches." This refers to the colon in the middle of each verse, corresponding with the division of the chant. The Gloria Patri is ordered to be said or sung at the end of every Psalm, "thus turning a Jewish Psalm into a Christian hymn." In the Breviary the Gloria was added to some, but not to all; and the American Church follows this rule to some extent in providing that the Gloria may be said or sung after every psalm, and shall be said or sung at the end of the whole portion or selection of psalms for the day. The Prayer Book version of the Psalms is taken from Cranmer's Great Bible, "set forth and used in the time of King Henry the Eighth and Edward the Sixth." It was retained when the present Authorised Version was published for two reasons: because the choirs and people had become familiar with it and because its language was smoother and more adapted for singing than the Authorised Version.

The Preface, giving the "Order how the Psalter is appointed to be read," states that "the Psalter followed the division of the Hebrews." There are two other "divisions" besides that of the Hebrews followed in our Prayer Book, viz.:—the Greek, in which Pss. ix. 10 and cxiv. and cxv. are joined, and cxv. and cxlviii. are each divided into two; and the Syriac, in which Pss. cxiv. and cxv. are joined, and cxlvii. divided.

Public Worship Regulation Act. [Ecclesiastical Courts.]

Publicani or Paulicians.—A name given to the Western Cathari, whose religion was similar to that of the Paulicians of the East. The name was given them by the crusaders in the twelfth century. A small band of Publicani arrived in England about the year 1160, under the leadership of one Gerard, an enthusiast who seems to have had some education, though his followers were entirely ignorant, and obeyed him blindly. In order to put a stop to the spread of their heresy, the King ordered them to be brought before a Council of Bishops at Oxford. On examination they professed a belief in the doctrine of the Trinity, and in all points connected with the attributes of God, but rejected the Sacraments and marriage. They were condemned to be branded as heretics, and whipped out of the town, and the people were forbidden to shelter or feed them, so that they soon perished of cold and hunger.

Pulpit.—An elevated place in a church, from which the sermon is preached. Formerly the sermon was preached from the altar steps, while the pulpit was used for the reading of the Gospel.

Purchas, William Morley, a famous Wesleyan minister, was born at Doncaster in 1824. He was apprenticed to the lumber trade, but began preaching, and having passed through the Wesleyan College at Richmond, went to Marden, Kent, in 1845. While here the fame of his preaching spread, and he was ordained. In 1868 he went to America; but returned to England in 1873, and became a secretary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, which post he held till his death in 1881. He was made a member of the "Legal Hundred" in 1859, and an L.L.D. in 1873. Among his works are: Select Lectures and Sermons, Life Thoughts, Sabbath Chimes, The Prodigal Son, and Sermons.

Purchas Judgment.—This was one of the several cases which have come before the legal courts of late years concerning the "ornaments" of the minister. The Rev. John Purchas, a clergyman of Brighton, was prosecuted for wearing the chasuble and a biretta. Sir R. Phillimore, as Dean of Arches, ruled that these were lawful; but the Privy Council set aside his judgment as regards the chasuble, and ruled that the biretta, which Mr. Purchas carried in his hand in the manner of a college cap, was not unlawful. They also ruled against the mixed chalice and wafer bread, and the Eastward position. This judgment was delivered before the passing of the Public Worship Regulation Act, the prosecution being instituted under the Clergy Discipline Act. It was delivered in Feb., 1871. An attempt was afterwards made to have the question reopened on the ground that Mr. Purchas had not appeared before the court, but the application for rehearing was refused. 4,700 clergy, however, signed a "remonstrance" against some portions of the judgment, and the whole question was afterwards reopened on a fresh suit. [FOLKSTONE JUDGMENT.]

Purgation, Canonical. [OATHS.]

Purgatory.—A place to which the souls of the faithful are supposed to go after death, to expiate sins committed during their lifetime, and not repented of, which yet do not merit eternal punishment. In the Councils of Florence and Trent the Roman doctrine on this subject is given thus:—"That there is a Purgatory, and that the souls detained there are helped by the prayers of the faithful, and above all, by the acceptable sacrifice of the altar." To prove this, it is said that all sin being offence against God, deserves punishment from Him, and will be punished by Him hereafter; that small sins do not deserve eternal punishment; that no one dies absolutely pure in God's eyes, or free from the debt due to His justice, and that all must therefore suffer according to the rule of justice by which He treats every soul according to its works and the state in which it is found in death. To prove the doctrine, a text from Maccabees is quoted, and one or two from the New Testament. In opposition, it is alleged that the books of Maccabees have no evidence of inspiration; that the texts quoted from the New Testament have no reference to this doctrine, whereas numerous texts from Scripture give evidence against it; and it is derogator to the doctrine of Christ's satisfaction. Christ indeed redeemed the souls of the faithful, the idea of meritorious suffering detracts from the perfection of His work, and places merit in the creature. Article XXI of the Anglican Church says that the doctrine is a "fond thing vainly invented, ground upon no warranty of Scripture, but rather repugnant to the Word of God."

Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary, or Presentation of Christ in the Temple. This double event is commemorated on Feb. 2nd, forty days after Christmas [See Lev. xii. 3-4.] The festival was established not later than the sixth century, and was originally called the Hypopontre, or Meeting of our Lord Jesus Christ, i.e., with Simeon in the Temple; but in the medieval Church the great reverence paid to the Virgin Mary led to the substitution of the title of the "Purification." Our Prayer Book combines the two titles. The festival was substituted for the Pagan Lupercalia, which was celebrated with processions of torchbearers, and it was observed in like manner with the use of wax lights; hence its name of Candelmas, and hence also the custom of women bearing light at their churching.

Puritans.—This name was used in the primitive Church for the Novatians, because they would never admit to communion any one from whom death of death had apostatised from the faith. In the sixteenth century was given in derision by their adversaries the Nonconformists and Presbyterian. The as an English body first arose from those who had fled to Germany during the reign of Queen Mary, and who returned to England with new ideas at the accession of Queen Elizabeth. They refused to agree to the Act of Uniformity which the Queen had published
n the ground that it was too favourable to Popery. Unfortunately the way that way was not to peace whilst race was still within reach. They urged the Presbyterian form of government as that of the New Testament; Archbishop Whitgift set them, not by defending the Episcopal form, but maintaining that it was in accordance with primitive Christianity, but by the argument that the form of church government was thing indifferent, and therefore the nation might choose whichever it thought most visible. Such an argument was hardly to offer to deeply religious men, as certainly some of them were, and when they sisted it they were sent to prison. But, however, the old-fashioned clergy who had their Mass in the days of Mary, and now conformed to the Prayer Book, were unhappy and dast under the change. The younger iritans had no lingering regrets for the past, and inclined to Puritanism. Their zeal was this side, though towards the end of Elizabeth's reign there was a reaction in favour of the comely forms and decent order, "which the iritans in their hatred of medievialism had mewhat set at nought. They strove hard for ascendency in Parliament, preparing the book of Discipline [q.v.] for acceptance, and ging the abolition of the Book of Common Prayer. But public opinion as well as the king's Minister went against them, and cocker's Ecclesiastical Polity marks the final sition of the Church of England against em. Their anger manifested itself in the unrility of the Martin Marprelate tracts, such called Church ordinances "froth and stuff," declared that the books ought "to be burned in fire to the Lord at Smithfield," mandated the destruction of the cathedrals with their "piping organs, twirling of psalms, and squeaking choristers," called the bishops "lusty governors," "cozening knaves, noble like dogs." It seems difficult now to loe that such expressions could have proceed from religious men, and it is needful remember the very different character of the time, and that the reputed author of the acts (they are believed to have been written by Henry Barrow) paid the penalty with his life. On the accession of King James I. the iritans presented the Milenary Petition [q.v.], demanding revision of the Prayer Book, conference was called to discuss the matter [Hampton Court Conference], and the Puritans were defeated and treated unceremoniously and harshly. About 1620 some of them began emigrate to America, and founded a colony New England and Massachusetts. It is said that during twelve years the emigrants counted to 21,000 persons. The tyrannical duction of Charles I., both in the Church and Government, resulted in the Great Rebellion and overthrow for the time being of Church and Throne. In September, 1642, an Act was abolished abasing prelacy in England, and commanding all to take the covenant. It is said that the number of clergymen who were rejected for refusing amounted to 7,000, and that more were turned out by the Presbyterian in three years than were deprived by the Roman Catholics in Queen Mary's time. After the Restoration the name "Puritans" was dropped, and that of Nonconformists [q.v.] adopted.

Pusey, Edward Bouverie, D.D.—A great Hebrew scholar and leader of a school of thought in the English Church [6, at Pusey, near Oxford, 1800; d. at Ascot Priory, Oxford, Sept. 16th, 1882]. In 1822 he took a first-class in classics at Christchurch, and in the next year was elected Fellow of Oriel, and was thus brought into contact with Newman, Keble, and Whately. He travelled in Germany during 1826 and 1827, and studied German theology—a region hitherto almost unexplored—under Dr. Tholuck; and the result was the publication, on his return, of a book in favour of German rationalism. The ability of the work was soon recognised, and at the death of Dr. Nicoll, Regius Professor of Hebrew, in 1828, Pusey was appointed to the chair, which carried with it a canonry of Christchurch. From this time he was accustomed to hold meetings of clergy for theological discussions at his house. Already the movement for Church reform had begun, and Pusey, after a long hesitation, joined the Anglo-Catholic party, and began writing some of the Tracts for the Times. The first which he wrote was Thoughts on the Benefits of the System of Fasting enjoined by our Church, and soon after followed Scriptural Views on Holy Baptism. The power with which he wrote placed him far in advance of the greater number of his fellow-workers, and on Newman's secession to the Roman Church Pusey took, by common consent, the leadership of the movement. As a matter of fact, the party was already known as "Puseyites," the reason being that, though Newman was the real leader, he was comparatively unknown except in Oxford, whereas Pusey held a greater position. Newman was Fellow and Tutor of his college, but Pusey was Hebrew Professor and Cathedral Canon. In 1843 he preached a sermon called The Holy Eucharist a Comfort to the Penitent, for which he was suspended by the Vice Chancellor from preaching at Oxford for two years. The sentence defeated its own end, for he was looked upon as a martyr, and his books gained a wider circulation than before. His teaching has exerted more influence on the Church of England than any other of the present century, and gave a new life and energy to religion, in its corporate or Church capacity, as distinguished from the individual direction which had been given by the Wesleyan movement a hundred years before. His works consist chieflv of sermons, two treatises on The Doctrine of the Real Presence in the Eucharist, and Biblical expositions. His quarto volume on the Minor Prophets is the best work on this part of Holy Scripture which has ever been published in England, and there is no book, whether produced at home or on the Continent, which displays the minute scholarship and research of his work on The Prophet Daniel. This work is not in the form of a commentary, but a series of disquisitions intended to show that the book is not the late production which the leading modern scholars of Germany, followed by Dean Stanley, have pronounced it, but that it was really written in the days of the Babylonian captivity. Dr. Pusey also published works on the Royal Supremacy, and on Marriage with a Deceased Wife’s Sister. Dr. Newman in his Apologia expresses his conviction, that though they had worked together so harmoniously, Pusey was “never near the Catholic Church.” In 1865 Pusey published his Eirenicon, intended, while justifying the position of the Church of England, to show that re-union with the Church of Rome by mutual explanations was within hope. One remarkable result came from this. Pusey had attacked very severely the cultus of the Blessed Virgin in the Roman Church, and had quoted some passages from popular books of devotion, to Protestant ears at least most painful and offensive. Newman wrote a reply in which, after saying that Pusey had “discharged his olive-branch from a catapult,” he declared that the prayers and devotions quoted by Pusey were so shocking and repulsive to him that they were like a nightmare, that nothing should induce him to use them. One might say that here already was a concession made, an acknowledgment that the popular practice of the Roman Church needed correction. Another work of Pusey was occasioned by Archdeacon Farrar’s work entitled Mercy and Judgment. Pusey replied to it in a volume What is of Faith Concerning Eternal Punishment? In conjunction with Keble and Charles Marriott, Pusey began editing the Library of the Fathers of the Holy Catholic Church, and the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology. No biographical notice of this remarkable man would be complete without reference to the revival of the Confessional in the Church of England, which was largely owing to him. He was in the habit of receiving many confessions, and acting as spiritual director, and some of his writings were in support of the practice. Of his deep personal holiness and fervent piety there was no question, and there is no name of this century which has been more generally revered in the Church of England.

Pyrrho, the founder of a school of scepticism, was born in Greece in the fourth century B.C. The mainspring of his teaching was the belief that there was no exact criterion for the knowledge and distinction of things; and therefore he suspended his judgment and declined pronouncing upon the nature a quality of anything. Eusebius quotes Aristotle as saying of these philosophers, “They preyed upon each other, to their own principles; and by bidding other people stand clear of all opinion and not aware that they recommend and dissuade at the same time; for they pronounce in some measure upon things, when they say nothing is to be affirmed about them.”

Pythagoras.—A Greek philosopher, born in the island of Samos probably about the year 570 B.C. He is said to have been a disciple of the philosopher Anaximander, who taught him geometry. The high imaginative and earnest spirit of the youth took fire as the possibilities of exploration seemed to open before him. The science spoke of limitations of distinctness, and definiteness, but around it he became conscious that there were mysteries and sublimities which it hinted but did not reveal. Beyond the finite was the infinite, among all the numbers somehow existed Unity. With the desire for further knowledge he set forth to travel, but although there are many traditions and stories of they are but little to be trusted. Everywhere, however, the number mystery seems to be present with him: all society, government became connected with it in mind; he observed the periodic occurrences in Nature, all the religious regulations, observances of different races, and so reasoned on the Unit, on the Triad, on the Square, until numbers seemed to him living things. The vital principle of the World held to be breathing, consequently he reason that the First Cause, the Unit, is “The finite Breath, or Spirit,” which divides it into a countless multiplicity of numbers and things. The world he conceived to consist of five elements—Fire, Air, Water, Earth, Eth. In the centre of the Universe was the Principle of Life, and all moved in harmony, music of the spheres.

Turning from the Universe to Man, Pythagoras recognised that there is more than physical frame. For he could carry him back to the age of Achilles and Hector, could project himself into the age to come, limits of space and time were therefore transcended. And he came to the conclusion the soul, which can thus look before, and can also shrink and shrivel it into incapacity of contemplating aught the present, must be capable of infinite alation and infinite degeneracy. Pythagoras did not originate the doctrine the transmigration of souls; he may have learned it in his Egyptian travels or in initiation into the sacred mysteries. It harmonised with his thoughts and readings, and he adopted it. Soul, he taught might descend into beasts or rise to Divinity; there is a law accurately determining their elevation or descent. Consequently Quaeriture in the first Sunday in Lent, the vessel in which the consecrated ad is placed in Roman churches. A lamp is not burning before it whenever the Host is present.

Quadragesima.—The first Sunday in Lent, so called because it is forty days before Easter. The name does not, however, occur in the Prayer Book, and has to a certain extent ten into disuse.

Quadratus, a disciple of the Apostles, Bishop of Athens in the second century. The time of the persecution of the Christian Emperor Hadrian, he wrote a very eloquent Apology for the Christian Religion, which he presented personally in 126. It was work in existence till the seventh century, when it seems to have disappeared irreparably, with the exception of a few passages which had been quoted by Eusebius, and have been preserved. Two other men of the same name are mentioned by different writers having lived in the same century, but later lori ans agree in identifying them all with Bishop of Athens.

Quakers. [Friends.] Quarles, Francis, prose writer and poet, born at Romford, Essex, in 1592. His only possessions in that county, and father held an honourable position under Queen Elizabeth. Francis Quarles was educated at Cambridge. After studying the law, he spent some years, he set his mind on serious private study and devotional reading, to the exclusion of all ambition for art preferment which he might easily have had. In the Memoir by his wife we find that Quarles shared in the almost universal admiration and love for the Princess Elizabeth, Queen Bohemia, herself a poetess, and that he served as "cup-bearer" until the ruin of the actor Palatine's affairs caused him to go over to Ireland. It is probable that the intimacy began, 1621, between Quarles and Ussher, Bishop of Meath. We find his son, John Quarles, aserting in one of his poems that he had received his education in this Prelacy. The purity of the writings of Quarles is marred by eccentricity which pervades it, but his style is vigorous, and a high religious tone is to be found in nearly all his works. Emblems Divine Moral, Divine Poems, and Divine Fancies are perhaps the best known and most admired of his works. The Elegies, written in memory of his friend, Dr. Allmer, Archdeacon of London, have a peculiar beauty and pathos of their own. In 1631 he lost his friend Drayton, and he wrote the epitaph on the monument to him in Westminster Abbey. The Hieroglyphics resemble the Emblems, but are very eccentric in measure, yet are peculiarly impressive. Some beautiful lines were written by Quarles on the death of Archbishop Ussher, to whom he was secretary for some time, and who wrote of Quarles to a friend as "a poet held in considerable esteem for his sacred compositions." The home life of Francis Quarles showed consistent piety. His wife writes, "that he was courteous and affable to all, and moderate and discreet in all his actions." He was an ardent student, rising before three o'clock in the morning for that purpose. He possessed, too, a great charm in conversation. His fatal illness is said to have been brought on by sorrow when a petition was presented by eight men, imputing to him serious errors in his religious belief. He died in September, 1644, and was buried at St. Leonard's, in Foster Lane. His widow writes in the Memoir that "the blessed end of her dear husband was in every way answerable to his godly life." It has been said that if Quarles had written Eucharidion at Athens or Rome, he would have been classed among the wise men of his country.

Quartodecimans.—On what day the festival of the Resurrection ought to be celebrated was a question which caused much anxiety thought and bitter dispute in the primitive Church. Some aimed at observing the actual anniversary by keeping it on the same date in each year. Others, guiding themselves by the Jewish reckoning for the Passover, chose the fourteenth day of the first month in the new year, whatever day of the week that might happen to be; others again deferred the commemoration to the first Sunday after the first full moon. For both of the two latter customs Apostolical authority was pleaded: the former was said to have been sanctioned by St. Philip and St. John, and was generally observed by the Churches of the East, while for the commemoration on the Lord's Day appeal was made to the authority of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the Western Church adopted the custom. One pleasing incident in the controversy was the visit of the saintly Polycarp, Bishop of Smyrna, to Anicetus, Bishop of Rome, to confer with him on the vexed point. Unable to agree, each thinking himself supported by the practice of Apostles, they agreed to differ, and Polycarp was invited by Anicetus to be celebrant at the Holy Eucharist, and they parted in peace respecting each other's convictions. This was in A.D. 158. Shortly after the Quartodecimian rule (so-called because relating to the fourteenth day) became associated with Judaistic opinions and practices, and, in consequence, called forth the reprobation of Pope Victor, A.D. 180. Henceforward the dispute was carried on with intense bitterness, and after the Council of Nicea had decreed in favour of the commemoration on the Lord’s Day, the Quartodecimans were regarded as heretics and schismatics.

Queen Anne’s Bounty. — A full account of this fund will be found under Annuities, but we may add here a few more details derived from recent returns. The Royal Bounty was ratified by an Act passed in 1704, but for the first few years the Corporation was unable to devote any substantial sum out of the £13,000, which was the average amount of their gross income, to the purposes of the trust. An Act passed in the year 1708 which discharged all livings not exceeding the yearly value of £50 from the payments of Tenth, still further reduced the revenue to about £10,000; and it was not till 1713 that any scheme of augmentation was entered upon. In that year two lists were prepared, in the first of which all livings under £10 per annum were scheduled, and in the second all under £35 per annum. In 1788 the trustees were further empowered under the Sign Manual to give £200 to cures not exceeding £50, and this maximum value of benefits to be similarly augmented was in 1804 increased to £60, and in 1834 to £200 a year. The system of making grants only to meet benefactions now became general, and it was reported in 1868 that the total amounts of such free grants between 1836 and 1868 was only £10,600, while the total yearly appropriations averaged £11,600. The total value of the trusts vested in the Corporation on Dec. 31st, 1881, was £4,171,470 14s. 11d., which is the gross sum of the appropriations made by the board since its institution, and of the private and other benefactions vested in the governors as trustees of the clergy. The Royal Bounty Fund in 1881 amounted to £48,591, of which £27,800 was appropriated in grants to meet benefactions.

Que (868)

strongly recommended Quesnel’s writings his diocese; but scarcely a year later, when he was made Archbishop of Paris, he became their opponent and condemnor. Quesnel was arrested and imprisoned by order of Pope V., but made his escape and fled to Holland and died at Amsterdam at a great age. His book was condemned by the celebrated B. Uni genitus. He wrote also a Life of Arnou, Traditions of the Romish Church, The Discipline of the Church, and some dogmatical essays on Jansenism.

Quietists.—A school of mystics who sprang up in the seventeenth century. The Quietists stated that they resigned themselves absolutely to God’s will, that in so doing they renounced self entirely, and were without thought, hope, or wish; in fact, in a state of mental inactivity. The doctrines of Quietism were first given to the world in a book called The Spiritual Guide, written by Maurice [q.v.], which was published in Spain in 1641 and was translated into several languages. It represented to a great extent in Spain the teaching of the Jansenists in France, and of the chief supporters of its theories was M. De Guyon [q.v.], a Jansenist, who defended by Fénelon. They taught that the worship of the Church was not to be compared to private devotion for help comfort to the soul, and the tendency through is to promote thought of self rather than thought of God. The same notions have been held by various sects under different names, and will be found under following heads: — Ecclesite, Beighards, Hesychasts.

Quignon was the son of a Spanish who, while still very young, became a mem of the Franciscan Order of monks. He made a General of the Order in 1522, and came under the notice of the Emperor Charles V., who made him one of his Council of Science. At the time of the struggle between the Emperor and the Pope, Clement V Quignon was employed to negotiate between the two, and the manner in which settled the business pleased the Pope so m much that he sent him a cardinal’s hat as a reward. He is however chiefly famous for the Brev which he compiled, in which his main was to make the reading of the Bible most prominent feature in the services, an this respect the compilers of our Prayer Book followed his example. He denied and condemned certain superstitions and narrations which had crept into the services of Roman Church, and for this reason, although recommended by two Popes, his Breviary never in favour, and had very small circulation. Copies of it are, therefore, now scarce.

Quinquagesima. —The Sunday before Ash Wednesday. It was so named from fact that it is fifty days before Easter, two Sundays preceding Quinquagesima.
Rabanus, Maurus Magnentius [b. at Aix about 776, d. there Feb. 4th, 856], was educated at the Monastery of Fulda, m studied under Alcuin at Tours, and re- manded to the school at Fulda, of which he was made Abbot in 822. In the disputes ich arose between Louis le Débonnaire and his children, Rabanus acted the part of ice-maker, and his wisdom and precaution aided him the goodwill of both parties. At a time he wrote a treatise urging the duty children to their parents, and of subjects their sovereign. In 842 he resigned his at Fulda, and retired to a church which had built at Petersberg, in order to devote iself to religious contemplation and the study of the Scriptures; but in 847 he was cted Archbishop of Mainz, and thus drawn m his retirement. He was an able ad- ministrator, and the diocese flourished during archiepiscopate; but his chief fame rests on his literary works. He wrote commentaries on the Old Testament and on some of the Gospels and Epistles, numbers of hymns and other books of devotion, and treatises dating to the book on Transubstantiation by Paschasius Radbertus.

Rabaut, Paul, a French preacher who much to encourage the Protestants during times of persecution, was born at Bélaix, in January, 1718. He studied at Laun- ne, and in 1744 became Pastor of Nîmes. 1745 decrees were published forbidding assembling of congregations, and as Rabaut continued to preach, a price was put upon his head, but he always managed to escape. In 1755 he presented a petition, begging for the release of those who had been sent to the galleys on account of their faith, recognition of the baptism and marriage of Protestants, etc.; but the only answer was further persecution, and Rabaut wrote a pastoral letter advising his people to emigrate rather than submit to the Government. How- ever, in 1774 a reaction was caused in their favour by the repeated cruelties of the Romanists, and thirteen years later the Edict of Toleration was passed. Rabaut died at Nîmes in 1794.

Rabbinism.—A form of Judaism which prevailed among the Jews from the dispersion to the end of the last century. It may be divided into two periods, the first from the fifth century B.C. to the fifth century A.D., and the second from the fifth century A.D. to its disappearance. It was caused by the reorganiza- tion of the social, moral, and religious life of the Jews according to the Mosaic Law, which brought about a union between school and government. The Hebrew was rendered into Chaldee, and was added to by explana- tions, illustrations, etc., and a tradition was formed which became in the eyes of the people of equal importance with the written Law. Later, the Mishna was edited by Hillel and Jehuda; by it the Mosaic Law, which had formerly been treated under 613 heads, was now reduced to six. During the latter part of the fourth century a rivalry grew up between the Persian and Babylonian schools. The Babylonian Talmud was re-arranged by Rabbi Ashie, the head of the Rabbinical schools; the Rabbinical schools throughout Persia were closed.

The second epoch of Rabbinism is less interesting than the first. The Babylonian Talmud was brought to Europe and translated into Arabic. Maimonides succeeded in reconciling the liberal form of Rabbinism which had grown up in Spain and the orthodox form which had appeared in Gaul and Italy, and it flourished till the thirteenth century, when the persecutions of the Inquisition partly destroyed it. However, the Cabbala was studied till the last century, when Moses Mendelssohn rose against it. At the present time Rabbinism is superseded by Rationalism.

Radbert, Pascale. [Paschasius Rad- bertus.]

Raikes, Robert. Founder of Sunday- schools, was born at Gloucester in 1735. His father was a printer and editor of the Gloucester Journal, who, after giving his son a liberal education, brought him up to the busi- ness, to which he afterwards succeeded. He began visiting the prisons, and, finding the bad condition in which they were, drew at- tention to it in his paper, and brought about a great reformation in the county bridewell.
In 1781, being struck by seeing the ragged groups of children playing in the streets, he determined to try and improve their condition; so, finding four decent, well-disposed women who kept schools for teaching to read, he hired them to instruct as many children as he could assemble together on Sunday in reading and in the Church catechism. For this he agreed to pay them a shilling each a day. There is a letter in the Gentleman’s Magazine for 1784 [p. 410], in which he describes the wonderful success of his plan, saying that the place was quite a heaven on Sundays compared to what it used to be. The system soon spread all over England, Scotland, and America. [SUNDAY SCHOOLS.] Raikes died suddenly at Gloucester, on April 5th, 1811.

Raleigh, Alexander, an Independent minister, the author of many theological works, was born at Kirkcudbright in 1817, carried on business for a short time in Liverpool, and went to Blackburn College, and in 1844 became pastor of a chapel at Greenock, whence he moved successively to Rotherham [1850], Glasgow [1855], and London [1859]. He died in London in 1880. His chief works are, Quiet Resting-Places, The Story of Jonah the Prophet, The Little Sanctuary, and other Meditations, Thoughts for the Weary and the Sorrowful, etc.

Ralph de Diesto, old English historian, born in the twelfth century, was Dean of St. Paul’s, and flourished in the reign of King John. He was greatly eminent for his learning, and was esteemed one of the best English historians in the reign of Edward I., when the sovereignty of the kings of England over the kingdom of Scotland was claimed and set forth from records and history. His history begins with William the Conqueror, and reaches to the death of King John. It has been reprinted among the works of the old English historians.

Rammohun Roy, a Hindoo reformer, was born in Burdwan, Bengal, in 1772. He was educated in the Brahman faith, but early renounced polytheism, and formed in Calcutta the Brahmo Samaj, or “Church of God” [q.v.]. In 1830 he came to London as representative of the Sovereign of Delhi, to demand an increase of stipend, which was granted. He died at Stapleton Park, near Bristol, September 27th, 1833. He translated the Vedanta, or Resolution of all the Veds; published selections from the New Testament under the title, The Precepts of Jesus, the Guide to Peace and Happiness; and wrote Apology for the Pursuit of Final Beatitude. While in England he worshipped with the Unitarians, as, though he admired the precepts of Christ, he did not believe in His Divinity.

Ranke, Leopold von [b. Dec. 21st, 1786; died May, 1886].—A famous historian. He was of the nobility by birth, the title von being granted him in 1866 by the Emperor [the King] of Prussia. He had four brothers, all of whom have made names for themselves in one way or other. Leopold was educated at Leipzig, and while there showed a remarkable talent for historical criticism. Soon after he was appointed to a professorship at Frankfort-on-the-Oder; but it was considered desirable that he should reside in Berlin, where he was a man of great strength and industry, and published many books, all involving great research, followed by each other all through his life with extraordinary rapidity. His History of the Pope generally thought to be the most brilliant regards critical power and style. It quickly translated into the most modern languages, and certainly was the chief means of gain for Ranke the European reputation which he enjoyed to the end of his life. Macaulay speaking of this work in one of his essays in the Edinburgh Review, says it “is known esteemed wherever German literature is read.” In 1841 the late King of Prussia, Frederick William IV., asked him to write a full account of the history of Prussia, this work was published six years later, lived for the most part a very quiet and retired life, seldom leaving his house in Berlin, taking no active part in the politics of the time, though he studied every movement of the state with the greatest care, and with regard to its probable bearing on future history. He made one exception to this rule in 1848, when a Parliament at Frankfort with the idea of reconstructing the German Constitution, and above all of uniting the German nation under one head. The scheme came to nothing, and from that time Ranke devoted himself to his historical studies and to his lectures. During years that followed he published a History of France at the Time of the Reformation, His of England during the Seventeenth Century, Studies of the Character of the Chief Statesmen of Italy and Spain, and several essays and books on different periods in the history of his own people. These occupied him for about twenty years, and in that year, at the age of eighty-six, he announced his intention of writing his great Weltgeschichte. It never expected, of course, that his sch work would be in any way completed, but “Altmeister,” as his fellow-countrymen merrily called him, worked steadily every day, giving one volume a year to the press and at his death he had brought the work into the Middle Ages. To have finished book according to the plan he worked out at the beginning would have taken three more years. Although he lived so quietly, and, except by is books, made so little stir in the world, he was given all the honours which it is possible for a literary man to receive, both by his own country and foreign ones, France conferring the greatest distinction she has in her power to give, that of being a Member of the Academy. He was always ready to give advice and help to any student, either of history or politics, who chose to apply to him, and was revered by all classes from the Emperor and crown Prince downwards, the latter being one of his pupils.

Ranters.—An Anabaptist sect which first appeared in 1645. They set up the light of nature under the name of “Christ in men,” and are said to have declared themselves incapable of sinning, and in the condition of Adam in Paradise. It is no wonder that, according to Fuller, they degenerated into swindlers. The name came to be applied in popular language to the Primitive Methodists, who, in their open-air preaching, were distinguished by their violent gesticulations.

Rappists. [HARMONY SOCIETY.]

Rashi [i.e. Rabbi Shelemo Izaaki, sometimes erroneously called Yarchi], the celebrated Jewish commentator, was born in 1040 at Troyes, in France. The range of his studies was extraordinarily wide, comprising Hillelology, philosophy, medicine, astronomy, law and exegesis, and a complete mastery over the whole range of Scripture and the sources of the Talmud. He travelled for seven years in Italy, Greece, Germany, Palestine, Egypt, and Persia, studying under the greatest scholars of the time. His chief work is the commentary on the whole of the Old Testament, containing the literal sense, and also allegorical illustrations. This was the first book ever printed in Hebrew, appearing at Reggio in 1475. It was translated into Latin by Breithaupt, and partly into German by Lucas Prague. Among his other works are a commentary on twenty-three treatises of the Talmud and on Midrash Rabbah, a book of medicine, a poem on the Unity of God, etc. He died at Troyes in 1105.

Rascolniks. [RUSSIAN CHURCH.]

Rationalism.—The setting up of reason as the supreme arbiter, and causing the scriptures and the mysteries of Christianity to be interpreted and judged by it alone. Such a system was the natural outcome of the Reformation so far as this: the traditional method was abandoned, for men claimed the right of appealing to the Scriptures against it. The authority of the Church to impose fetters on opinion was denied when Luther burned the Pope’s Bull. It thus became necessary to find another basis of belief, and it was in good faith that the early German rationalists declared that the evidence for Christianity was found in its harmonising with the instincts and needs of the soul. It was later developments which, ignoring the presence of sin in the world, and of the darkness produced by sin, exalted reason above mystery, and proceeded to eliminate everything supernatural from religion, to discredit miracles, or to regard them as Oriental exaggerations of natural operations, and to question the inspiration of the Bible. [KANT, DEISM, MIRACLES, EVIDENCES, INSPIRATION, REVELATION.]

Ratisbon, Conference of, which met in 1541, was the sequel to the one held in Worms the previous year. The Emperor, Charles V., hoped by these conferences to settle the religious differences in Germany, without having to proceed to hostilities, but at the conclusion of the proceedings the members agreed that more was wanted to heal the divisions than a mere theological formula, and the Conference ended without having arrived at any real result.

Ratramnus or Bertram.—A priest and monk in the Monastery of Corbie, Picardy, in the ninth century. Nothing is known of his private life, but he was famous in his time as a writer, and was consulted by Charles the Bald in matters of ecclesiastical controversy. He was employed to reply to the encyclical letter of Photius, and wrote against the doctrine of Transubstantiation as given by Paschasius Radbertus, though he taught that there is a mystical presence under the symbols in the Eucharist. His book was written after 844, and called De Corporre et Sanguine Domini. The book was condemned two centuries later, as it was supposed to have been the work of John Scotus Eriigena; but was used by Fisher, Bishop of Rochester, in 1526, in opposition to the arguments of Ecelamadius. Ridley’s views on the Sacrament seem to have been formed by the study of this book. It continued to be regarded as spurious till the seventeenth century, when Sainte Beuve proved its authenticity. Against Photius Ratramnus wrote Contra Graecorum opposita, and in the Gottschalk controversy De Ipredes- tinatione Dei et Trina Deitas.

Ravenna.—A city of Italy which formerly stood on the shores of the Adriatic, but is now about five miles inland, owing to the deposits made by the Po at its mouth. It is famous in secular, but especially in ecclesiastical, history. Tradition says that a pupil of St. Peter named Apollinaris preached Christianity there in 79 A.D., and was martyred there. The truth of this is doubtful, but that the city contains Christian monuments of a very early date is certain, and the architecture of the churches marks distinctly the three nations which have at different times occupied the city—the Theodoxians, the Rebaptising.—A word employed, I want of a better, to denote the administration of baptism, by a lawful minister, who at some previous time have been invalidly baptised by heretics or schismatics. Baptism by laymen, if orthodox, is by nearly all, if not all, Churches recognised as valid.

Recluse.—Properly speaking the term should only apply to those who have taken monastic vows and wish to lead the most secluded lives possible. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries, those who had proved themselves able to lead a thoroughly solitary life were allowed this so-considered privilege by many of them being locked up in their cells for life. When they had once given themselves up to this life they were obliged to continue, and could not get absolution from except by order of the bishop. The term has now a wider meaning, and is often applied to people who simply live in retirement and away from the world.

Recollct.—A minor branch of the Franciscan Order of monks. The name is supposed to have been given them by Clement VII., who in 1531 granted houses to such persons as possessed “the Spirit of Recollection.” From foundation the Order of St. Francis has been divided into two parties, the Conventuals and the Observants, the former living in monasteries under a not very strict rule, at the latter following more exactly the laws of their founder, especially those relating to poverty. At the end of the sixteenth century the Observants in Italy were named by the reigning Pope “Reformed Franciscans.” They spread very rapidly in France during the seventeenth century, and were in great favour at Court. It was in this country that we find the term “Recollcts” most frequently in use. They stood their ground well all through the agitation caused by the Jansenist movement, and refused to relax their rules in the slightest degree. The Order was suppressed at the Revolution, but has lately reappeared in a few towns in France.

Rector (“governor”).—A term applied to several persons whose offices are very different:—[1] The rector of a parish is a clergyman who has the charge and care of a parish, and possesses all the tithes, whereas a vicar or has a portion, the rest going to the impositor of the great tithes. [2] The same name is given to the chief officer in some of the colleges, as at Exeter and Lincoln Colleges, Oxford, as well as at the Scotch Universities; it is also sometimes given to the head master of a large school. [3] Rector is also used several convents for the superior officer who governs the house. The Jesuits gave the name to the superior of such of their houses as were either seminaries or colleges.

Rector, Lay.—A name given to laymen who are impropriators of the great tithes of parish.

Raymond Martini.—A Dominican monk [b. at Suberts, in Catalonia, early in the thirteenth century; d. after 1284]. He entered a monastery at Barcelona, and distinguished himself by his learning, especially in Oriental languages, which in those times were very rarely studied. He afterwards became a missionary among the Spanish Jews, and went to Tunis to convert the Mahometans, against whom he wrote Pugio Fidei. He wrote also a refutation of the Koran, which no longer exists, and a Capistranum Jutinorum; this and the Pugio Fidei were made use of by a Carthusian monk in a book called Victoria contra Judaeos.

Readers.—In the early Church the readers were looked upon as an inferior order of clergy, and we often find them mentioned in the writings of St. Cyprian. We cannot trace their existence further back than the third century, but after that time they appear to have been very numerous, and to have been distinctly recognised by the Fathers of the Church. In the present day the title of Lay Reader [q.v.] is given to a man authorised by the bishop to help the priest in certain parts of public worship.

Reading Pew. [Desk.]

Real Presence. [Lord's Supper.]

Realists.—The opponents of the Nominalists [q.v.] among the Schoolmen of the Middle Ages. Their main doctrine, which is also attributed to Aristotle, was that “Universalis” [q.v.] have an independent existence; nay, that they, or Ideas, are the only real existences, inasmuch as all visible things grow, change, and perish. Wise men perish, but their wisdom is eternal. Universals exist, therefore, independently of things, and of our conceptions of them in the Divine Intellect. And the supreme reason of man is to have his thoughts in conformity with the Divine ideals. Realism, therefore, accepting the Divine origin of the Church, taught complete submission to authority, and the necessity of looking to God only for revelation and light. The founder of this school of thought was Anselm, and the work was taken up and carried on by Thomas Aquinas and William of Champeaux.
Recusant.—One who refused to attend the worship of the Church of England. Popish recusants were Roman Catholics who refused attendance, and one tried and convicted of the offence was a "Popish recusant evicted."

Redemption. [Work of Christ.]

Redemptorists.—An Order founded in 1732 by St. Alphonse Maria de Liguori (q.v.), its chief object being to provide a set of men to work amongst the poor. In this he received the assistance of Falcoia, Bishop of Castellamare, and the work was begun at Cala, where he had previously founded a community of nuns. In 1749 the Order as confirmed, and its rules approved by Benedict XIV. He gave it the title of the "Congregation of the Most Holy Avoir," but as there was an Order of the same name in another part of Italy, the Pope ordained that the title should be changed to that of the "Most Holy Redeemer," to prevent confusion. The members, who were called edemiptorists, had, in addition to the general ows of obedience, poverty, and chastity, to take an oath that they would work diligently until the Order till their death. Their great object was to be the conversion of the most poor and miserable, especially those living in great ties who would otherwise be left to a large extent destitute. Besides this, Liguori insisted on a constant study among his disciples as a means towards being of more use to the Church. The Order still exists in most countries of Europe, although at different times, through revolutions and various other causes, it has been banished. It was introduced into England in 1843, and has now six houses in the British Isles. The nuns are called Redemptoristines; they live in strict enclosure, and employ their whole time in praying for the success of the Redemptorist missions. The chief seat of government is Rome, where he is called the Head of the Order, who has the title of Major, superintends the general working of the society in all parts of the world. He is elected for life, but the heads of the different houses, who are appointed by him, sit by six councillors, can only hold office for three years.

Rees, Thomas, D.D.—A Congregational minister [b. at Llanddeilo, Cardiganshire, 1815; d. 1885]. Author of a History of Protestant Nonconformity in Wales [1861], and translator of Barnes's Notes on the New Testament into Welsh. He was a minister at Wansca for twenty-two years, and was resident of the Congregational Union the year of his death.

Reformation.—To give in detail the story of the great religious revolution of the sixteenth century would be almost to write the history of Europe. Our object in the following article will simply be to indicate the causes and the occasions which produced the mighty changes in the several countries and the most prominent results. Let it be remembered that causes and occasions are by no means synonyms. An occasion furnishes reason for present action, but the causes lie further back. Henry VIII.'s divorce was the occasion of England's breach with Rome, but the causes had been gathering for whole generations before.

As far back as the twelfth century St. Bernard, called "the last of the Fathers," had badly cried out that he longed before he died to see the Church of God as it was in the ancient days. And the cry had gathered strength in succeeding years. The great Councils of the fifteenth century—Pisa, Constance, Basle—had called for "purification of head and members." And so there is also a long list of illustrious names—Gerson, Grostête, Bradwardine, Celine, Sir Thomas More—men who would have been indignant at any suspicion thrown upon their faithfulness to the Church, who were urgent in their demands for reform. Bosset, in his Variations des Églises Protestantes, attempts to break the force of this fact by the example of those doctors never thought of changing the faith of the Church, or of correcting her worship, or of subverting the authority of her prelates, and chiefly that of the Pope. But unhappily the conscience of men came to the conviction that the practical evils of the Church had their root in doctrine. The shameful sale of indulgences and masses came out of corrupt teaching concerning the intermediate state. So, again, when it was seen that in one year nearly a thousand pounds were offered at the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket, and during the same period not one penny at the altar of Christ, it is no wonder if the suspicion arose that errors had crept into the Church concerning almost intercession and invocation.

Of the manifold causes which wrought together to produce the Reformation, three stand out the most prominent:—

[1] The Papacy.—No Roman Pontiff—not Gregory VII. nor Innocent III.—ever advanced lotter claims than did Boniface VIII., when, in 1302, he addressed to the Christian world his Bull Unam Sanctam [q.v.]. That was the culminating point of Papal power, and the two centuries that followed saw its rapid decline. The removal of the Papal Court to Avignon brought more clearly to the light its corruptions and cruelties, and exhibited the Supreme Pontiff as the puppet of the French King. The Great Schism, which followed and lasted through forty years, gave a still ruder shock to traditional reverence for the See. At this moment, too, the nations of modern Europe were consolidating and settling their national life, a state of things which "could not fail to give an impulse, hitherto unknown, in calling up the nationality of many a Western State, in satisfying it that the Papal rule was not essential to its welfare, and in thereby adding strength to local jurisdictions" [Hardwick's Reformations]. How strong this impulse was may be seen in the fact that at the Council of Constance the vote was taken, not by individuals, but by nations—viz. the English, German, French, and Italian. That method of voting was the precursor of national reformations. To this must be added the personal character of the Popes themselves. Blunt's statement is no exaggeration when he says that "for sixty years before the final breach was made, there had not been a Pope, except Clement VII., who could be called even a decent Christian" [Blunt's Reformations, p. 242]. It is a shame even to mention the deeds of vileness which make up the life of such men as Pope Alexander VI.

[2] The revival of letters and the impulse given by it to human intellect was a second cause of the demand for reformation. The revival of learning in Italy—and Italy led the way in everything in those days—was, in its temper, simply Pagan. The Decameron of Boccaccio was saturated with the Pagan spirit. An elegy of Geraldini on the Passion spoke of the Lord Jesus Christ as "Daphnis," and "Daphnis in an odoriferous garden" is the commencement of the agony in Gethsemane. At the Court of the Medici it was a characteristic of good society to dispute the fundamental principles of Christianity, and the narratives of Holy Scripture and the mysteries of the Faith became subjects of derision. Leo X., in all probability, was an infidel. "Marvellous," says Dr. J. M. Neale, "was the infatuation which could expend all its zeal in the discovery of the last books of Tacitus and Livy, in the production of the purest Ciceronian Latin, in the erection of Classical churches, and which could pay for all these Pagan amusements by the infamous mission of 'etzel, unconscious of the approaching earthquake, regarding the discontent of one German monk as something that might—it mattered not which of the two—be hushed at the stake or silenced by the sop of a fat benefice." The very greatness of the evil brought a reaction, and thoughtful men endeavoured to stay the general corruption by revived religious conviction. But the attempt failed through two causes. The one was the timidity expressed in the saying attributed to Cardinal Pole, that men "ought to content themselves with their own inward convictions, and not concern themselves, to know if errors and abuses existed in the Church." The other was the irreformable character of the Roman Court. Meanwhile, let the causes have been what they may, this Pagan tendency was remarkably kept in check in England, though signs of it appeared all through from Chaucer to Shakespeare. Signs—but only on the surface: none of the great English writers can be charged with the monstrous foulness and scornful unbelief of the Continental Paganism.

[3] The third cause of the cry for reformation lay in the tremendous sense of responsibility which rests on the reason and conscience of individuals with reference to their belief, and the necessity which they feel rests upon them of personal faith in, and personal communion with, the Lord. The other cause live in the outward world, this dwells in each man's soul. It was a mark of Western theology, as contrasted with Eastern, that whereas the latter loved to meditate upon God and upon the Christian doctrines as defined in the Creeds, the Western Church contemplated more practically the great phenomena of human nature and the relation of the soul to God. And Christian anthropology, it has been well said, "ranged itself under two heads—the objective one of the Sacraments and ordinances of the Church as such; and the subjective one of the progress of grace in the heart of each one of us" [Foulkes' Division of Christendom]. The medieval divines had mainly concerned themselves with the form of these two heads, though not exclusive so, for the "Friends of God" and the Mystics had eagerly inculcated personal earnestness in religious life. But, taken as a whole, medieval Christianity was preeminently the sense of corporate membership, and an exaggerated idea of the value of a perfidious discharge of routine and merely external duties; "the form of godliness without the power" was the result. This, probably, was no more than anything else, honeycombed the Church with corruption. And this furnished the key to the preaching of Luther and his might effect upon men. It was the passionate assertion of personal religion and individual responsibility.

The cry for reform, then, was general before the great Revolution appeared. By what method might it be looked for? That which most commended itself to the thoughtful men of those days was the convoking of a General Council. Attempts had been made, but in vain; and in 1460 Pope Pius II. forbade an attempt "to invoke the aid of Councils and put an end to the pain of damnation." This seemed to close that door. Yet men hoped even again. Constitutional reform had taken stronghold in France. When Pagan Leo X. was succeeded by Adrian VI., men hoped again especially when that Pontiff declared that "many abominations had existed for a long time, yea in the Holy See itself;" but he died after a brief pontificate, and the Roman Church was confirmed in its resolution to resist change. But Luther's preaching had by that time stirred the waters too profoundly to suffer any further stagnation. Men's hearts were moved to their very depths, and the cry for reformation was too universal to be kept down. Two methods remained. The
was a movement under individual leaders, the other the assertion of the rights of autonomous national Churches, as against Papal centralisation. The one marked the movement in Germany and Switzerland, the other was pursued in England. And this last was no afterthought. It was a recurrence to the practice of the purest ages of the faith. In all time and everywhere, national synods had discussed and dealt with the heresies, errors, and evils of national Churches, whether such vils and heresies had grown up within or been thrust in from without. The method was an old one revived, not a new one invented. Archbishop Laud thus wrote concerning these three methods of reform: "It is true a General Council, free and entire, would have been the best remedy and most able for a gangrene that had spread so far and eaten so deep into Christianity. But what! should we have suffered this gangrene to endanger life and all rather than be cured in time by a physician of weaker knowledge and a less able hand? We live to see, since, if we had stayed and expected a General Council, what manner of one we should have had, if any; for that at Trent was neither general nor free. . . . And I much doubt whether even that Council (such as it was) would have been called, if some provincial and national synods, under supreme regal power, had not first set upon this great work of reformation, which I heartily wish had been as orderly and happily pursued as the work was right Christian and good in itself. I make no doubt but that the universal Catholic Church would have re-formed herself, had she been in all parts freed of the Roman yoke, so while she was for the most in these Western parts under that yoke the Church of Rome was, if not the only, yet the chief hindrance to reformation."

These causes, it will be seen, affect the whole Church, and may be observed in the history of reformation in each nation. The special occasions which set the causes in operation will be seen as we now glance through the history of each nation.

Germany.—On Oct. 31st, 1517, Luther's conflict with the Church of Rome began, when he boldly attacked the doctrine of Indulgences. This date has been kept throughout Protestant Germany as the Festival of the Reformation. Luther soon had to defend himself against the charge of insubordination. The arguments which his opponents advanced rested upon the supreme power of the Pope; e.g. one of these arguments was that "the Pope alone has power to determine those things which are of Faith," and another was that "Christians are to be taught that the Church holds many things as Catholic verities which yet are placed neither in the Canon of the Bible, nor among the more ancient Fathers." Luther replied, quoting Augustine, that the canonical books of Scripture alone are an infallible guide. Luther was now led to inquire more fully into the authority of the Pope; consequently he was cited on Aug. 7th, 1518, to appear in Rome, to answer the charge of heresy. Eventually, however, his trial took place before the Papal Legate, Cardinal Cajetanus, at Augsburg, on Oct. 10th. Luther persisted in renouncing the doctrine of indulgences, and denied the authority of Papal edicts when unsupported by Holy Scripture, the ancient Fathers, or the decisions of General Councils. He was ordered peremptorily to recant. Luther, however, fearing violence, escaped by night from Augsburg [Oct. 16th], and returned to Wittenberg. In July, 1519, an important theological debate took place at Leipzig, between Carlstadt (who had joined the new movement, but who eventually pushed his principles to such extravagant lengths that he was silenced by Luther) on the one side, and Eck, a very learned champion of the Papacy, on the other. During the debate Luther spoke, and advanced a step further in his conflict with the Papal power. He denied [1] that the Latin Church is exclusively the Church of Christ; [2] that the ascendancy of the Pope of Rome was of Divine institution; [3] that the Councils of the Church are infallible. The result of this boldness was his excommunication by Pope Leo X. in June, 1520. The Papal Bull was publicly burnt at Wittenberg the same year. Luther at this time attracted many followers; among others, Martin Bucer—who subsequently took refuge in England and received a theological professorship at Cambridge—and Melanchthon, a brilliant and earnest student at Wittenberg. In 1521, Melanchthon drew up a text-book for Lutheran divines, entitled Locii Commons Rerum Theologicarum; it contained a calm statement of their special doctrines, supported by Scriptural proofs. Meanwhile, in 1520, Luther had appealed to the Christian potentates of the German nation to summon a Council for redressing grievances and removing abuses in the Church; and later in the same year he published The Babylonish Captivity of the Church, a violent treatise against the mediaval doctrine concerning the Sacraments: he reduces them in number from seven to two, and lays very great stress on the necessity of faith, without which the Sacraments convey no benefit. The prospect of his excommunication caused Luther to bring forward another doctrine of great importance, viz. that all Christians are the priests of God, quoting Rev. i. 6 and other texts in support. Henry VIII. replied to this by stating that for the same reason all Christians must be kings. Luther, however, used this doctrine for giving more importance to the laity, and for reducing the tyranny of the Papal priesthood. Luther's views were popular, and at length the Elector Frederic became an ardent champion of the Reformation movement. In 1521 Luther was summoned by the Emperor Charles V. to appear before the Diet at Worms. On this occasion he made his memorable stand, saying that unless he were convicted of heresy by the testimony of Scripture, he could not and would not retract anything, adding, "Here stand I, I can no farther; God help me. Amen." In spite of opposition, the Diet eventually proclaimed the Imperial bann against Luther as a heretic and outcast from the Church of God, and his writings were prohibited. On his way back to Wittenberg, he was secured by order of his friend and patron, the Elector of Saxony, and carried off to a safe shelter in the Castle of Wartburg. Here Luther worked actively with his pen, his most important work being the translation of the New Testament into the Saxon dialect. During Luther's retirement, some of the Reformers, headed by Carlstadt, had broken out into extravagances, and many sympathisers had in consequence shrunken from throwing in their lot with the Reformers. At this period, too, the fanatical and lawless sect of the Anabaptists had started into birth. Luther, in consternation, reappeared at Wittenberg on March 7th, 1552, to save his work from destruction; he silenced the ultra-Reformers, undid their work, and in his own teaching laid great stress on the necessity of Christian quietness and charity. The Peasants' War, in 1524, brought the Lutheran doctrines into fresh discredit; although Luther sternly denounced the insurgents, and preached obedience to the civil magistrate, still much of his influence was gone, owing to the revolutionary proceedings of fanatical Reformers. In this year, Erasmus, who had been an exceedingly able advocate of Reformation principles, went over to the opposite side, and violently attacked Luther and his teaching. The States of the Empire now formed themselves into religious leagues, either in opposition to or in defence of the new doctrines. The "League of Torgau" [1526] was constituted of those princes who supported reform; they agreed to stand by each other in case they were attacked "on account of the Word of God or the removal of abuses." The Diet of Spires, which opened immediately afterwards, recommended many reforms, such as allowing the clergy to marry [Luther had already married an escaped nun], restoring the chalice in the Eucharist to the laity, and that private masses should be abolished. The Emperor, however, refused his sanction to these reforms; whereupon the individual States took it upon themselves to work out their own reforms; so, in 1527, in Saxony, "visitors" were nominated by the Elector to examine into the condition of each parish; the visitors did not interfere with old institutions, provided they were not repugnant to Scripture; their motto was to reform and correct, not to destroy and abolish. The Reformation, however, received a check at the new Diet of Spires, which assembled in 1529. The reforming edict of the former Diet [1526] was repealed; the Emperor was angry and intolerant. The Reformers hereupon drew up their protest against these proceedings, and so obtained for themselves and their posterity the name of "Protestants." Their influence however, was now much weakened by internal divisions. A new set of Reformers, headed by Zwingli, and opposed to the Lutherans in their opinions as to the Sacraments and other doctrines of the Gospel, arose in parts of southern Germany and in Switzerland. The Conference of Marburg was held in 1529, in order to bring about an understanding between the two sets of Reformers, but without success. At this conference the Lutherans drew up and agreed upon fifteen dogmatic definitions; these were revised and increased to seventeen at the Conference of Schwabach [Oct., 1529], and subscription to them became a necessary condition of membership in the league of Reformers referred to previously. These seventeen articles were finally revised by Melanchthon, and were incorporated in the celebrated Confession of Augsburg—an apology for Lutheranism, presented to the Emperor Charles V. at the Diet of Augsburg [1530]. The Confession is remarkably clear and outspoken, but humble and modest in tone. In setting forth the articles of the Lutheran Reformed Faith, it was seen that the Reformers held almost everything in common with the Catholic Church; for the errors and abuses which they rejected they gave their reasons, taken from Scripture and the early Fathers of the Church. After the Lutheran views had been discussed, the Diet, with threats, ordered the Reformers to conform in all things to the established usage of the Roman Church. Owing to these threats the Reformers entered into a covenant, called the "Schmalkaldic League" [1531], by which they agreed to help each other for six years in defending their Faith. They also sought the aid of France against their own Emperor—a fatal and unpatriotic thing to do. Charles V. was now glad to pacify the Protestant Reformers, in order to concentrate his forces against the Ottoman Turks, who were attacking his dominions. Accordingly the Peace of Nuremberg was signed [July, 1532], by which it was agreed that the present state of things was to continue until a "General Free Council" could authoritatively settle the matters in dispute. Pope Paul III. attempted to call a Council at Mantua in 1537, but the Lutherans could not regard it as a free Council, so the attempt failed. The Lutherans then issued a manifesto, embodying their principles, and called the "Schmalkaldic Articles," because issued by the Protestant League of that name [1537]. At the same time the Emperor, his brother Ferdinand, and many powerful princes, formed themselves into "the Holy League," or the purpose of opposing the Reformation. In 1541 the Colloquy of Ratisbon was held between champions of the Reformed and Unreformed Faith, and although an agreement was nearly arrived at, yet in the end he matters in dispute were in the same position as before. Another fruitless Council was held at Ratisbon in the beginning of 1546, followed quickly by the death of the great Reformer, Luther, in February of the same year. He held his opinions firmly to the last. He had proved them, and found that they did not fail him in the hour of his need; but his last days were saddened by the religious animosities of the age, by the divisions among the Reformers themselves, and specially by the rise and growth of Zwinglianism. Immediately after his death a terrible religious war broke out between the Romanists and Reformers. The Lutherans struck the first blow, but the Emperor had been penniless making his preparations for bloodshed before this. The Pope granted plenary indulgence to all who fought against the Lutheran "heresy." The Protestants were utterly defeated at the battle of Mühlberg (April 24th, 1547). In May of the following year the Diet of Augsberg, under Charles V., issued an edict, called the Interim Augstamm. This was a formulary of faith and worship for the Protestants to adopt, as temporary arrangement, until a General Council settled matters. The "Interim" was opposed to the Reformed Faith, but it made two concessions, by legalising the marriages of such ecclesiastics as had already taken wives, and by tolerating communion in both kinds. It met with great opposition among the more strict Lutherans; the more moderate tried to modify its operation, and were in danger of compromising their faith, then, in 1552, Maurice, the Elector of Saxony, took the field on their behalf. The war was ended honourably for the Reformers by the "Peace of Augsburg" (1555). It was agreed that every land proprietor should be free to choose between the old religion and that embodied in the Confession of Augsburg (1530); his tenants and dependents were expected to follow his example. Meanwhile the long-promised Council met at Trent in 1545, but by its protracted and wearying debates all hope was dispelled of its effecting any speedy reformation of existing abuses. The two great religious parties, the Romanists and the Reformers or Protestants, lived in comparative quietness for the remainder of the century; but in the latter part of it, owing to the divisions among the Lutheran and Swiss Reformers, and to the ever-growing zeal of the Jesuits, founded in 1540, Protestantism in Germany greatly declined; whole districts were gradually brought back to allegiance to Rome. The Reformed church was to go through another terrible ordeal—

—the Thirty Years' War (1618-48)—before it was finally recognised and supported by the German Government, by the peace of Westphalia (1648).

The Reformation spread through the following States in the German Empire:—

The Electorate of Saxony, the starting-place of the movement, and where as early as 1527 the majority of the people embraced the Reformed Faith.

Ducal Saxony yielded in 1539, Leipzig, Dresden, and other chief towns joining the movement.

Hessen, under Philip, eagerly received Lutheran doctrines in 1526.

Bavarian Brandenburg joined in 1528, at the Diet of Anspach.

Electoral Brandenburg did not cast off the Papal yoke till 1539.

Lüneburg joined in 1527; Scriptural preaching was enforced, but ritual and worship remained much as before.

Mecklenburg, Holstein, and Pomerania also were among the first to join.

A few years later, in, 1535, Württemburg and other minor States joined the Protestant League.

Frederic, Elector Palatine, and his people, took the same side in 1546.

In the Duchy of Bavaria, the Reformation made much progress at first among the people, but owing to the opposition of the civil power, and to the efforts of the Jesuits, Lutheranism was extinguished in the duchy before the century closed.

In East Friesland and in Silesia Lutheranism had a peaceful triumph about the year 1527.

The rapid spread of the movement in Germany was almost entirely owing to the influence of Luther; in 1523 he is said to have issued as many as 183 books or pamphlets in promoting the cause; his writings were perfectly clear and practical, and adapted to influence the people. The force of his arguments, his homely illustrations, his simple boldness, and especially his deep earnestness, completely won the people, and made them ardent champions of the Reformation. Melanchthon's influence, though of a different nature, was also very great in forwarding the movement; his learned lectures at the University of Wittenberg were the means of raising up many able coadjutors in the work of Reformation; but the Lutherans were chiefly indebted to Melanchthon for the Confession of Augsburg and other symbolical writings containing systematic statements of Lutheran doctrines; by these the truth, after it had been discovered, was preserved and kept intact for themselves and their posterity. He died in 1560. The masses of the people, however, were probably most influenced by the itinerant friars who went from village to village, and town to town, preaching the doctrines of Luther.

Eastern Prussia received Lutheran preachers.
in 1523, and George Polentz, one of the Prussian Bishops, embraced the Lutheran doctrines, and promoted the Reformation. In 1525 the whole country was converted. A German Liturgy, adhering as much as possible to ancient usage, was introduced. Convents were converted into hospitals, and for the instruction of the clergy, Postils, or explanatory sermons on the Epistles and Gospels, were regularly sent from Wittenberg. In 1548 the Reformers were aided by a large influx of Bohemian Protestant refugees, and so became independent of aid from Wittenberg.

Polish Prussia became reformed about 1560, Sigismund Augustus being their sovereign.

In Denmark Lutheranism was first taught at Wiburg, in Jutland, by John Tausen, who had studied under Melancthon at Wittenberg. Lutheran preachers came in 1526. When Frederick I. was crowned King of Denmark [1523], the Danish hierarchy required him to extirpate the "heretics of Luther's school." Hence the King, though personally favourable to reform, was unable to advance the work immediately; but in 1526 he passed over to the side of the Reformers, and in 1527, at a Diet held at Odense, "liberty of conscience" was granted to both parties. In 1530 the Danish Protestants issued a manifesto at Copenhagen similar to the Augsburg Confession, holding fast to all Lutheran doctrines. Christian III., who succeeded his father on the throne in 1533, was an ardent Reformer; he had attended the Diet at Worms [1521], and had listened with admiration to Luther. The Reformation now spread throughout the whole of Denmark, bishops were deposed, and twelve Superintendents established in the ancient Sees. In the University of Copenhagen three Divinity professors were appointed to lect ure on the Old and New Testament and on the Fathers. A Danish liturgy was compiled on Lutheran models. Christian III. joined the Protestant League in 1538. The Confession of Augsburg was accepted by Denmark in 1569.

Norway and Iceland, after brief struggles, gave in their adherence to Lutheranism about 1539.

All these countries have remained Lutheran to the present day.

Sweden. — Students from Wittenberg had brought Lutheranism into Sweden in 1519. Gustavus Vasa, crowned in 1523, supported the Reformers in his kingdom. Accordingly when Brask, Bishop of Linköping, began a persecution of "the heretics," the King interfered on their behalf. In 1524 a Council was called to prepare the Church for the changes that were to be made by the Court. The King constituted himself supreme in matters ecclesiastical, appointed and deposed bishops on his own authority, seized a large part of the ecclesiastical revenues, suppressed monasteries, and organised the Church much on the same model as the Reformed Church in Denmark. He advocated the use of nearly all the ancient service books and ritual, until the people were better instructed; and the course was adopted by the clergy at the Synod of Örebro in 1529. One great characteristic of the Reformed Church of Sweden is that the government of the Church by bishops has been preserved and perpetuated to the present day. Lawrence Peterson, a moderate Lutheran, was made Archbishop of Upsala. In 1539, however, the King threatened to constitute the Swedish Church on the Presbyterian model, but the threat was not accomplished. In 1544 the Reformation changes were established throughout the kingdom. These changes, however, led to an insurrection among the poorer classes, urged on in sever cases by the Romish priests [1537–1543]. The insurrection was quelled, but another reaction occurred in 1576, when King John introduced a new liturgy, based on the missal authorised by the Council of Trent; it was adopted by the Diet in 1577, two Bishop strongly protesting against it, viz., Linköpin and Strengness; the King moreover entrusted the management of a college at Stockholm to certain Jesuits whom he had invited from Louvain. But when Lutheranism was just at its lowest ebb, the King suddenly changed his course; the Jesuits were compelled to leave the country, and Lutheranism regained the ground it had lost. At the kirk-mo held at Upsala in 1593, the Augsburg Confession was adopted by Sweden; the followe of Zwingli and Calvin were denounced the Romanising liturgy of King John was revoked, and the service book of Lawren Peterson took its place. Luther's short catechism became also the recognised manual instruction.

Poland. — Sigismund I., King of Poland from 1548 to 1572, tolerated Lutheran and during his reign it penetrated among the classes. Large numbers of Protestant refugees from Bohemia came to Poland in 1547 and aided in spreading the Lutheran doctrine. An ecclesiastical synod held at Piotrkow in 1551 advocated the most bitter persecution of the Protestants. On the other hand, the Polish Diet in 1552 was favourable to the Protestant Reformers, however, we greatly weakened by the desertion of the champion, Orichovius, formerly a student of Wittenberg, who rejoined the Roman Church in 1559. After Sigismund's death, most of the succeeding kings favoured the Romanists. Stephen Bathori came to the throne in 1577 and proclaimed himself favourable to religious toleration, saying that God had reserved Himself the government of men's conscience. He was, notwithstanding, a patron of the Jesuits, and winked at their persecution of the Protestants. He was succeeded by Sigismund III. [1587–1632], Crown Prince of Sweden whose parents had resisted Protestantism in Sweden. In this reign Protestantism Poland was completely overthrown. This result was brought about partly by the Jesuits and partly by serious divisions among the Reformers themselves. The cause of the Reformers was also greatly weakened by some of their number adopting the Anti-Trinitarian heresy.

Bohemia and Moravia. — The followers of John Huss, the great Bohemian Reformer, entered into negotiations with Luther in 1510. In Feb., 1520, Luther writes, after reading the works of John Huss, that “I, without being conscious of it, have both taught and held all the things of John Huss . . . in brief we are all Hussites without knowing it.” An alliance was soon formed between the Bohemians and Lutherans. In 1532 the Bohemians, with the sanction of Luther, presented a formal statement of their tenets to George, Margrave of Brandenburg, followed in 1535, by a regular “Confession of Faith to Ferdinand, King of Bohemia.” At the breaking out of the religious war in 1546, the country sent an army to aid the Protestants; after the disastrous battle at Mühlberg [April 24th, 1547], they were subject to severe persecution. Many were ordered to leave their country within six weeks, and a thousand of them settled in Prussia [1548]. The Jesuits began to work against them in 1552. The three divisions of Protestants, viz. Lutheran, Swiss, and Bohemian Brethren, now united and presented the Confession of their Faith to Maximilian II. in 1575, and again to Rudolph II. in 1608. In 1609 perfect religious equality was granted to them, but it was soon withdrawn. The Jesuits were successful in once more getting rid of Protestantism in 1627, when Ferdinand II., a former pupil in their school, rigorously banished all who held fast to the Reformed Faith. Many fled to Moravia and formed the nucleus of the Moravian Church, which continues to this day. Protestantism subsequently revived in Bohemia, and in 1781 Joseph II. issued in its behalf the Edict of Toleration. There are now about 100 Protestant congregations in the country, the majority of them belonging to the Swiss or Calvinistic division of Reformers.

Hungary and Transylvania.—As early as 1521 we find traces of Protestantism in these countries, for in that year George Szákmáry, Archdeacon of Grán, ordered a condemnation of Luther’s books to be read from the pulpits of the principal churches. Severe edicts against Lutheranism were issued in 1523 and 1525. But, in spite of these, the Reformation triumphed in several towns and districts; students who had been sent to Wittenberg returned and taught the Lutheran doctrines. In 1527 King Ferdinand I. complained that even Anabaptists and Zwinglians were gaining ground. Monks and nuns were driven from their cloisters. In 1533 John Hontor, on his return from Switzerland, established a printing office at Cronstadt for publishing Protestant teaching. About the same time a Magyar translation of the New Testament by Matthew Devay, a former pupil at Wittenberg, appeared. He was called the Luther of Hungary. Eventually he joined the Swiss school of Reformers [about 1544], and was followed by the great majority of Hungarian Protestants. They drew up their Confession of Csenger in 1557, and it still remains their standard of orthodoxy. In Transylvania the majority of the Reformers were Lutheran; religious liberty was granted to them in 1557. It is said that only three families of the magnates then adhered to the Pope, the nobility were nearly all reformed, and the people thirty to one in favour of the new doctrine; but owing to divisions, and the heresy of the Anti-Trinitarians, the Jesuits regained a great part of the country [1579-1588]. In the latter year, however, the Jesuits were forcibly expelled. After a further reaction under Rudolph II., full religious liberty was secured by the treaties of Nikolsburg [1622] and Linz [1645].

Spain.—Luther’s writings were circulated in Spain as early as 1520, and converts were made in great numbers, especially in Seville and Valladolid. But the cruelties of the Inquisition successfully extinguished Protestantism from the country, and in 1570 hardly a trace of it remained. The accession of Philip II. in 1559, “the Nero of Spain,” had made its destruction only a matter of time. Among the more prominent of Spanish Reformers were two brothers, Juan and Alfonso de Valdés, Rodrigo de Valero, Egidius, Domingo de Rojas, and Dryander, who published a Castilian translation of the New Testament in 1543, and in 1548 took refuge in England, and was made Professor of Greek at Cambridge.

Italy.—Lutheranism between the years 1530 and 1542 made good progress in different parts of the country, e.g. in the Duchy of Ferrara, where Calvin and other Reformers took refuge about 1535; in Naples, where Juan de Valdés was Spanish Secretary; throughout the Republic of Venice, in Modena, Milan, Lucca, and other places, and even at Bologna in the Papal States. But in 1542, Cardinal Caraffa, afterwards Pope Paul IV., brought the cruelties of the Inquisition to bear upon the Protestants, and quickly exterminated them. Two of the principal Reformers, Bernardino Ochino and Peter Martyr, an able scholar, and formerly Canon of the Augustinians, took refuge in England in 1547. Ochino was made a Prebend of Canterbury, and Peter Martyr, Professor of Divinity at Oxford. At the accession of Queen Mary, in 1553, both fled from England and took refuge at Zürich. Ochino was subsequently accused of advocating Anti-Trinitarianism and polygamy.

Switzerland. — The Reformation in Switzerland was commenced under the leadership of Huldreich Zwingli, born in 1484, seven weeks after the birth of Luther; he, too, like Luther, was educated for the priesthood, being ordained in 1506. In 1513 he began to devote himself to the study of the Bible, and especially to the New Testament, in order, as he says, that he might draw the doctrine of Christ direct from the fountain; he did not place much value on the writings of the Fathers, but looked forward to a time when "Divine Scripture alone would be precious among Christians." Unlike Luther, he had no reverence for ancient uses and traditions of the Church, and abolished as far as he could every such use not specially mentioned in the New Testament. He came into contact with, and was greatly influenced by Erasmus in 1514 and following years. His first efforts at reform began in 1517; when at Einsiedeln he exerted himself to abolish image-worship and other corruptions. In 1519 he was appointed to a preachership at Zürich, and here he soon took a commanding position, his talents and force of character being very conspicuous. It was his custom to explain the Scriptures to his people, instead of reproducing the mediaeval interpretations of them; he is said also to have done a good work in purifying the morals as well as the worship of the citizens. In 1519 we find him successfully resisting the disgraceful sale of Indulgences. The Papal authorities evidently wished to retain Zwingli on their side. For this purpose the Pope, Leo X., granted him a pension of fifty gulden, and made him one of his Chaplains in 1518. Pope Adrian also wrote him a cajoling letter. But in 1522 the Bishop of Constance formally accused the Zwinglians of disobedience, in breaking the fasts of Lent; public opinion, however, was now entirely on the side of Zwingli, and the Bishop's action was futile. Zwingli about this time married, against the law of the Church; he kept his marriage secret, however, till 1524. In 1523 a sweeping change was effected in Zürich, the authority of the Bishop was destroyed, the ancient liturgy was swept away, the Mass was reduced to a memorial, and the monasteries were converted into schools. The Bishop of Constance and several cantons, including Lucern, Freiburg, and Zug, protested in vain at these changes:—Zwingli's ascendancy was now complete. Meanwhile, the Reformation had been making headway in Basle. Its chief author was Oecolampadius, a friend of Melanchthon and Erasmus; he was made a preacher in the cathedral of Basle in 1515, where he set forth the Reformed opinions; in 1522 he allied himself to Zwingli. The Bishop and his party opposed the movement, but the Senate asserted the supremacy of the Bible and permitted disputations to be held, in which many Papal doctrines were openly attacked [1524]. The canton of Berne was disposed to follow in the footsteps of Zürich and Basle. In 1526 a general assembly of twelve Swiss cantons was held at Baden, and the Zwinglian doctrines condemned by a majority of nine out of the twelve cantons. Yet the Reformation, in spite of this severe check, still continued to make way. The hatred, however, between the opposing parties culminated on the battle-field of Cappel, where Zwingli was slain [1531] and his followers routed. Zwingli's teaching in regard to Original Sin, the Sacraments, and Predestination was at variance with all other branches of the Church. With regard to Christian Baptism, he represented it as standing on the same level with John baptism—merely a sign; yet at the Conference of Marburg, in 1529, he signed the statement of the Lutherans that baptism was not "a naked sign, but a work of God, by which we are regenerated." Hence Luther considered him guilty of dishonesty and in sincerity.

The death of Zwingli was closely followed by that of Oecolampadius; but the work of reformation was carried on by two able successors, Henry Bullinger and Oswald Myconius: the latter, a bosom friend of Zwingli, had been forcibly expelled from Lucern in 1522. Another prominent Reformer was William Farel, a refugee from France, who was very successful at Berne, Neuchâtel, Basle, and especially in Geneva, where he brought about the overthrow of the Papal power in 1533.

But a far greater leader now appeared on the scene in the person of John Calvin; in his began the second generation of Reformers. Born in 1509, at Noyon, in Picardy, he was originally destined for holy orders, but eventually devoted himself to jurisprudence a Orleans and Bourges Universities. He first began the work of reformation in Paris, but some of the more violent and indiscriminate Reformers there having posted up anti-Papal placards, he fled to Basle in October, 1534. It is remarkable that although Calvin was unusually severe in his general character, yet he was deficient in Christian heroism and describes himself as being "naturally timid, and of a soft and faint-hearted disposition."

At Basle Calvin drew up, in 1536, his Institutes of the Christian Religion, which quickly became the text-book for Calvinists generally. In it are contained all his distinctive doctrines. Calvin succeeded in getting his principles adopted in Lausanne this same year. But in Geneva the people rebelled against the severity of his discipline and both he and Farel were banished in 1538. He was invited to return, however, and he did so in 1541, thenceforth exercising despotic power. He established a consistory, consisting of twelve lay elders and six ministers. Calvin himself presiding, and exercising a controlling influence. To this body was entrusted the jurisdiction over the religion and morals of the whole community, together with the power of excommunication. The decisions of this tribunal were marked by great sternness and severity; in 1553, by its orders Sentevus was burnt for heresy. In 1549 Calvin brought about the religious reformation of the cantons of Switzerland by the Consensus Turginia, and so consolidated the Swiss Reformation. By this Consensus the Sacraments are treated as much more than mere outward signs, as Zwingli treated them. Calvin spoke of them as "organs" which God uses for conferring grace; but restricted the benefits of the Sacraments to the elect." Calvin died in 1564, and was succeeded by Beza, who continued for a time to uphold the standard of Geneva. But 1569 a powerful reaction began under Borromeo, Archbishop of Milan, a man great piety, and devoted to the Church of Rome. "The Jesuits were busy in different parts of the country, and in 1586 the Romish censors formed themselves into "The Golden Ladder," to resist the Calvinists, and at the beginning of the next century the Calvinists had still more ground, owing to the inroads of the Duke of Savoy, and the titular shop of Geneva, Francois de Sales. Peace was not finally concluded till after the battle of Villerger, 1712. France.—The earliest Reformer in France was Jacques Lefèvre, who in 1512 was exiled with Briconnet, Bishop of Meaux, in a reformation of that diocese, both men persuading that the Papal religion of that day was not a true form of Christianity. 1523 the Theological Faculty of Paris, led the Sorbonne, having previously conned Luther's writings, began the work of extirpating the French Reformers. The march, Francis I., professed to be neutral, the took no measures to pacify the perpetrators of the savage massacres of the Protestants. In 1534 Calvin and others fled the country; in 1545 the towns of Merindol et Cabrières, with twenty-eight villages, were literally destroyed, as many as 4,000 people being slain. In spite of all this, the reformers had increased in importance in 17, when Francis I. was succeeded by his son Henry II., who married Catherine Medic, niece of Pope Clement VII. During this reign the persecution went on in even greater severity; but, nothing abated, the Reformers in Paris organised themselves, in 1555, as a distinct congregation, adopting the Calvinistic discipline of Geneva, and in 1559 they issued their first Confession of Faith. France at this time was divided into two parties, one headed by the Dukes of Guise, the other by the Bourbon family. The Bourbons now allied themselves with Protestants, or Huguenots, as they were called in France, and the Guises became the champions of the Roman Catholics. The two parties were inspired with mutual hatred of each other. In 1560 a Huguenot conspiracy to rid the kingdom of the Guises was discovered; the chief mover was Geoffrey de la Barre, a friend of Calvin. On the other hand, the Cardinal of Lorraine tried to force every Frenchman, at the peril of his life, to sign a creed, drawn up by the Sorbonne, and which he called the "Huguenot's rat-trap." A conference between the two parties took place at Poissy in 1561, Theodore Beza and Peter Martyr representing the Huguenots; but no good result followed. By this time the Huguenots had greatly increased in the country, and were being continually aided by disciples of Calvin sent from Geneva; in January, 1562, they were granted religious liberty, but shortly afterwards the massacre of several of their number at Vassy rekindled the strife, and civil war broke out. The Huguenot leaders were the Prince of Condé and Admiral de Coligny. At the battle of Dreux [Dec., 1562] the Huguenots were routed; immediately afterwards the Duke of Guise was assassinated by a fanatical Huguenot. Peace was concluded at Orleans, and the Pacification of Amboise [March, 1563] secured a certain amount of religious liberty to the Huguenots. A second religious war raged from 1567-70. At the battle of Jarnac [1569] the Prince of Condé was taken prisoner, and subsequently assassinated. The Peace of St. Germain-en-Laye was concluded in 1570, by which the Huguenots were to be free to worship in their own way; but in 1572, by an act of gross treachery, under the guidance of Catherine de' Medici, a massacre of the Huguenots was planned, and carried out under circumstances of great atrocity on St. Bartholomew's Day [1572]. Over twenty thousand Protestants were murdered in different parts of France, among them Admiral Coligny. The Calvinists rose again, and the Guise family entered into an alliance with Philip II. of Spain in order to extirpate Protestantism. But in 1589 the Protestant Prince, Henry of Navarre, came to the throne as Henry IV. Four years later, in order to stop further bloodshed, Henry IV. renounced Protestantism; perfect religious liberty, however, was granted to the Huguenots by the "Edict of Nantes" [1598], solemnly declared to be perpetual and irrevocable. But the despotism of Richelieu and the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV. in 1685 overthrew the Reformation in France. Netherlands.—The country had been prepared for the Reformation [1] by the cruelties of the Spanish Inquisition, which had aroused hatred to the Papal power; [2] by the writings of Erasmus, a native of Rotterdam, exposing the vices of the age in 1500; [3] by the writings of Luther. The Emperor Charles V., born at Ghent in 1500, was lord of these provinces, and mercilessly persecuted all who held the "new opinions;" in 1521
he issued an edict against the writings of Luther, "whether in Latin, Flemish, or any other modern language." The first two martyrs suffered at Brussels in 1523, whereupon Luther wrote his Epistle to the Christians in Holland and Brabant. In 1525 converts abounded, and executions became fearfully numerous, the victims during Charles's reign being reckoned by thousands, among them being the Englishman, William Tyndall, who, in 1536, was put to death at Vilvorde, near Brussels; he had translated the New Testament into English in 1525, and had also exerted great influence in Belgium. These measures not succeeding, Charles V. introduced the terrors of the Inquisition to subdue Protestantism [in 1550]. Philip II., who succeeded his father in 1560, carried on the work of persecution. Many troubles came upon the Reformers, owing to their being confounded with the fanatical and lawless Anabaptists, who abounded in the country; so in 1562 they drew up The Belgic Confession, containing the doctrines of their Faith. This Confession is based on The Confession of the French Reformers, and so is distinctly Calvinistic. In 1566 the Belgic Confession was ratified at a Synod of Reformers, held at Antwerp. Meanwhile the continued persecution was exasperating all classes against the Government. At length, when the Duke of Alva, at the head of a Spanish army, renewed the massacres, the Protestants took the field under the Prince of Orange, Philip van Marnix, and many other nobles, in 1568. A desperate struggle ensued, ending in the independence of Holland in 1579, the seven northern provinces separating from the remaining ten. In 1581 the Roman religion was forbidden in the new kingdom, and Protestantism had triumphed in every quarter, aided materially by the Protestant University of Leyden. The neighbouring provinces, under the Spanish Duke of Parma, entered into an agreement at Arras, in 1579, to help in countering the Reformation; and this, coupled with the aid of the Jesuits, finally caused the Papacy to be re-established in a great part of the country.

England.—It has been thoughtfully said that the downfall of the Papal power in England began from the shameful day when the miserable King John laid his crown at the feet of Cardinal Pandulph, and shocked the sense of the English nation by that shameful enormity. From that time a reaction against Papal tyranny began, and the history of the Plantagenet Kings is continually marked by struggles between Papal tyranny and national independence. The growth of intelligence and piety in the English Universities, as witnessed in the lives of such men as Dean Colet, Sir Thomas More, Linacre, and others, was another factor in the great movement. Erasmus had visited Oxford in 1497, and was Professor of Greek at Cambridge in 1505–1508. The immediate occasion of the breach was the quarrel between Her VIII. and Pope Clement VII. concerning the King's divorce, which resulted, in 1534, in the overthrow of the Pope's authority in England. Henry had already assumed the title of "Supreme Head of the Church in England," and the Convocations of Canterbury and York had acknowledged the title with this limitation, "so far as may be consistent with the law of Christ." [1531]. Henceforth appeals to Rome were forbidden, an Act of Delegates appointed by the King was the ultimate Court of Appeal in ecclesiastical cases. Thus far the English bishops and clergy had accepted the change, but beyond this neither they nor the King seemed to contemplate any reformation doctrine or manners. Henry VIII. remained attached to the mediaeval system until his death. Although he suppressed monasteries it was not done to benefit the Church, but to meet his own requirements. So far from being a Reformer, he was the great obstacle to the progress of Reformation. Cranmer, who had been made Archbishop of Canterbury in 1533 for espousing the King's cause in the matter of his divorce, was still a believer in the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation. In 1536 Convocation of Canterbury issued ten Articles of Religion, retaining all the old doctrines, cutting away flagrant abuses connected with them. The sermon at the opening of Convocation was preached by Latimer, Bishop of Worcester, who afterwards was one of the most prominent of the Reformers. In an English translation of the Bible was sent by Cranmer to Henry VIII., and Bishops' Book, or The Institution of a Christian Man, was issued. But from this time Anti-Reforming party, headed by Gardi Bishop of Winchester, and Tunstall, Bishop of Durham, gained the upper hand, the rising with them. Thus, in 1539, "Six Articles" were enacted for abolishing diversity of opinion. They enforced belief [1] Transubstantiation. [2] Communio one kind. [3] Celibacy of the clergy. [4] solute obligation of vows of chastity. [5] Private masses. [6] Compulsory cor. In 1543 an Act of Parliament passed denouncing Tyndall's "false tration" of the Bible, and forbidding the use of the New Testament in English to "worship and artificial, prentices, journeymen, servants, householders, and labourers." Cran however, still managed to retain his influence with the King, and in 1541 and 1542 a rev. and purified form of the Sarum Breviary issued for use in the Canterbury diocese. 1544 a Litany in English was published, Convocation, and preparations were made for a new service book in English at the time of the King's death in 1547.

In the reign of Edward VI. [1547–1553] the Reformation made rapid strides.
protector, Somerset, supported the movement, though probably on selfish grounds. Royal injunctions were at once issued directing the clergy to provide one book of the whole Bible, the largest volume, in English, within three months, and within twelve months, the Par-phrase of Erasmus, also in English, upon the canons; both of these being set up in churches or the use of parishioners. Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, refused to obey, and was committed to the Fleet [Sept. 25th, 1547]; he was eposed from his bishopric for nonconformity in 1551. The first act in Edward's reign legalised communion in both kinds. The first book of Homilies also appeared this year, for the instruction of ignorant preachers and their flocks. Meanwhile a Committee of divines, under Archbishop Cranmer, was engaged in compiling Service Books in English. In 1548, they produced an English Book of Common Prayer, which came into canal use on Whitsunday, 1549. Bonner, ishop of London, refused to adopt its use,
and was deprived, Sept. 21, 1549. This book was compiled from the old Offices; it retained the traditions and sentiments of the past and were not considered wrong in themselves.
he compilers sought to restore the worship
the Church to the model of the early church, before the rise of mediæval errors.
In this account the book was obnoxious to any ultra-Reformers, especially to John nox, who had received a preachership at Tewkesbury-on-Tweed, and who was even offered as Bishopric of Rochester, in order to urge him on to a more violent Reformation.
The state of parties in England was now reedy affected by the arrival of a multitude of foreign Protestants in 1549. Bucer, a theman, became Professor of Divinity at Oxford, and Peter Martyr, a follower of wingli, at Oxford. John Hooper, also, had retreated to Zürich in 1539, returned England this year, an ardent and persistent advocate of Zwinglei's views concerning the cerements; he refused to wear the vestments described in the Prayer Book, and was committed to the Fleet, 1551. He soon complied, ever, and was consecrated Bishop of Hester in the same year. All these sought introduce much greater changes. Meanwhile Cranmer's views concerning the Eucharist had undergone a change; he had renounced Transubstantiation, and followed Calvin in ieving a real, virtual, but not a corporal esence. Ridley, Bishop of London, held same views; the result was that a second ayer Book was introduced in November, 62, with a few alterations in the Communion
vice to suit the modified views, but the book ll remained in accordance with the doctines of the early Church. In 1553 a regular Confession of Faith of forty-two tides was published, based upon the ession of Augsburg of 1530, differing in one important point, viz. in the doctrine of the Eucharist, which followed Calvin's tenets.
The death of Edward VI., in July, 1553,
and the accession of Queen Mary, threatened utter destruction to the Reformation. Mary had inherited from her mother, Catharine of Arragon, a thorough hatred of the Reformers' teachings. Immediately, therefore, the old Latin service-books were reintroduced; the Book of Common Prayer forbidden; the Romish doctrine of Transubstantiation reaffirmed by Convocation, five members only opposing it. This may be accounted for partly by the fact that the rapid changes during the latter part of the last reign under the fluence of the foreign Reformers, and the extreme views of Hooper, had caused a reaction, and partly by the fact that the leading Reformers were silenced and imprisoned, including Bishops Coverdale, Hooper, Latimer, Cranmer, Ridley, Holgate of York, and Farrer of St. David's. Many more, reckoned at 800, iled from the country. Bishops Bonner, Tunall, and Gardiner, who had been deprived in the last reign, were now restored to their Sees, and in 1554 England was once more brought under the supremacy of Rome, through the agency of Cardinal Pole. Meanwhile, some of the Reformers who had settled at Frankfort [1554] sought to reject the second Prayer Book on the ground of its being still superstitious. Calvin and Knox joined in condemning the book, but through the fluence of Dean Cox in March, 1555, the English residents were ordered by the Senate of Frankfort to conform to the Prayer Book, whereupon the malcontents, under John Knox, retired to Geneva, and cut themselves off from the English Reformers. Far worse troubles were occurring in England. Mary, provoked by the violent language of some of the extreme Reformers, and by the insurrection under Wyatt, and influenced by her marriage with the bigoted Philip of Spain, egan a most bitter persecution in 1555. As many as 288 persons are said to have been burnt for their religion, including Cranmer,
and four other bishops, Hooper, Farrer, Ridley, and Latimer. Cranmer, after being induced by disgraceful artifices to make a recantation, was executed at Oxford [March 21st, 1556], holding fast to the Reformed Faith. Cardinal Pole was consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury on the following morning; but both he and the Queen died in November, 1558. The mistaken policy of persecution had destroyed any chance the Papal Supremacy might have had in England.
The death of Mary was felt as a relief, and the accession of Elizabeth hailed with joy.
Elizabeth's first efforts were directed to quieting religious controversy and strife. A Royal order, dated Dec. 27th, 1558, silenced
all pulpits. In 1559, the acts of the late reign in reference to religion were all repealed, and the Royal Supremacy once more established, the Queen, however, refusing the title of "Supreme Head," preferring to be called "Supreme Governor." The Prayer Book, revised by Edmund Guest, Bishop of Rochester, was reissued on June 24th. A few of the changes in the second book of Edward VI. were omitted or modified, and the whole book was brought more into conformity with the first book of Edward VI. With one exception—Kitchen, Bishop of Llandaff—all the Marian bishops refused to take the Oath of Supremacy to Queen Elizabeth, and were deprived of their sees. Matthew Parker was duly consecrated Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth by Bishops Barlow, Scory, Coverdale, and Hodgkin; the remaining bishops were filled by Reforming prelates. When Convocation assembled in 1562 the Forty-two Articles of Edward VI. were remodelled and reissued as the Thirty-nine Articles in their present form. New troubles now began to vex the Reformed Church. The refugees, some of whom we saw quarrelling among themselves at Frankfort, 1554, now flocked back to England, many of them imbued with Genevan principles. On their arrival they immediately raised opposition to the Prayer Book, and the established customs of the Church, advocating a more radical reformation. The malcontents were nicknamed Puritans [q.v.], and some of the more advanced of them separated themselves entirely from the communion of the Church [1567]; but owing to the firmness of Archbishop Parker, the doctrines and discipline of the Church, as it had been established, were preserved intact.

A second separation began in 1570, when the Romanists, on the arrival of Pope Pius V.'s Bull of Excommunication, cut themselves off from the Church of England. Shortly afterwards Romish plots and intrigues came to light, resulting in repressive measures being taken against Catholics. Executions became frequent, especially after Babington's plot to assassinate the Queen; and all their hopes were shattered by the destruction of the Spanish Armada in 1588. As the Romanists declined, the Puritans increased in numbers and influence; but all their endeavours to model the Church after the fashion of the Reformed Churches on the Continent were frustrated by the firm rule of Archbishops Whitgift and Bancroft [1604]. Thus the Reformed Church of England has come down to us, not a new Church, but merely purged from distinctively Romish doctrine, and freed from Papal oppression. Cranmer, in all the changes that he made, continually appealed to the Word of God and the custom of the primitive Church as his authority. Unbroken ties of holy orders, the preservation of the ancient doctrines, organisation, and traditions of the Church, a Prayer Book compiled almost entirely of pre-Reformation materials, prove the present Reformed Church of England to be one and the same with the Church of Christ that had existed in this land from the earliest times.

Scotland.—Owing to the frequent alliance between Scotland and France, the work of Reformation did not begin under favourable auspices in Scotland, the French influence being employed to uphold the "old religion." Accordingly, when Patrick Hamilton, a student at the Protestant University at Marburg, in Hessen, returned to Scotland and preached against the corruptions of the Church, he was burnt at the stake [1529]. Yet after Hamilton's death the new opinions rapidly spread, so rapidly that in 1554 the Scotch Parliament passed a severe Act again all who held "the damnable opinions of that great heretic Luther." Many Reformers took refuge in England, as that country had, in 1534, thrown off its allegiance to the Pope. The Papal Church in Scotland now saw the need of reformation, and in 1541 passed an Act requiring clerics of every rank "to reform themselves in habit and manners to God a man;" and in 1543 the Parliament allowed all persons to have "a good and true translation," in English or Scotch, of the Holy Bible. In 1545 Cardinal Beaton, the "Welsy of Scotland," an able and powerful man, but guilty of the grossest irregularity, began a bitter persecution. Among his victims was George Wishart, who was put to death March 1st, 1546. This act of violence caused the celebrated John Knox, Scotch Reformer, to rebel against Rome, and to aid his sympathy with the Protestants. Cardinal Beaton was himself murdered on May 25th following, and Knox showed his approval of taking refuge with the murderers in the town of St. Andrew's [April, 1547]. The town capitulated to the French [July], and Knox was taken, with other prisoners, to Rome and detained there till February, 1549. Knox had been ordained to the priesthood in 1546 after studying the writings of St. Augustine; his fiery and fearless temper roused him to the greatest hostility to the Church of Rome, justly indignant at her many abuses, speaks of that Church as "the synagogue of Satan," and of the Pope as "the man of sin." Upon his release from Rouen, the Engl Privy Council gave him a preacher, Robert Berwick-on-Tweed, and in 1551 a royal charter. But on the accession of Queen Mary in 1553, Knox left England and settled in Geneva, where for about five years he lived in constant intercourse with Calvin. Meanwhile in Scotland the Reformers, under the Earl of Argyle, denounced "the congregation of Satan, with all the superstitions abomination and idolatry thereof," and formed themselves into what they called "the congregation of Jesus Christ" [1558], adopting their Liturgy the English Prayer Book 1552. [In 1564 the English Liturgy was replaced by the Prayer Book used by English at Geneva, and which had receiv e approval of Calvin.] Knox returned to Scotland on May 2nd, 1559, a thorough Calvinist. The violence of his preaching at once used the passions of the people to such a height that abbeys and churches were sacked, monuments destroyed, and many kindred acts of violence perpetrated. Knox lost no time in completing the work of reformation. A Protestant League was formed on May 31st, and began its work by deeming the suspension of the Queen Regent, Mary of Guise. The Queen now placed herself at the head of the army, and troops were sent from France to aid her in subduing her disaffected subjects. Knox and his party made a treaty with England, Feb. 27th, 1560. A religious war was only prevented by the death of Mary of Guise on June 10th. On Aug. 17th, the Confession of Faith of the Protestants adopted by the Scotch Parliament, and meditated afterwards Bills were passed abolishing the Mass and the jurisdiction of the Pope. The Reformers, considering themselves as exclusively the "Congregation of Rist Jesus," felt it their duty to utterly dictate all traces of the old religion, just as the Canaanites were driven out by the Jews. So not only old customs and tradi-tions in worship and ritual, but Episcopacy was abolished in 1562, and "Superinten-dents" appointed in their place. Two bishops, Alexander Gordon of Galloway and Adam Bothwell of Orkney, conformed to the reformed religion. In the midst of these changes, Mary Queen of Scots returned from France; but the Reformed Faith was so firmly rooted that she was powerless to prevent it. Knox and his followers assailed her great harshness and severity, boldly calling her to renounce her idolatrous religion, protesting against the Mass in her private chapel. Eventually she was forced to abdicate (1567), partly on the ground that she was plotting to restore the old religion. It was said that the murders of Rizzio (the queen's secretary, and also a pensioner of the Pope) and of John Black, a learned physician of medivalism, on the same night in Holyrood Palace were committed in order to frustrate the intended persecution. In January, 1572, the titles of "Archbishop" and "Bishop" were restored to the superintendents," but they were still only "clerks in name. In November of the same year, Knox died. A further change took place in 1592, when, under the influence of Andrew Napier, Presbyteriansism was established in place of the nominal Episcopacy. In 1610, Episcopacy in its English form was established in the King, but only to be again rejected by the people in 1639. The last hopes of a reaction in Scotland had been extinguished by the execution of Mary Queen of Scots in 1587. Except as regards Church government, the Reformation was entirely Calvinistic.

Reformed Dutch Church. [Dutch Reformed Church.]

Reformed Episcopal Church. In 1873 a meeting took place in America of members of various Protestant denominations, including one English Dean, to receive the Communion, which was administered by Dr. Cummins, Assistant-Bishop in the diocese of Kentucky. His brother Bishops immediately protested against what they considered a public recognition of schism and a blame-worthy laxity of opinion; whereupon he sent in his resignation, and assembled a meeting at New York, in the house of the Young Men's Christian Association. The result was the organisation of the Reformed Episcopal Church, Dec. 2nd, 1873. Bishop Cummins having severed his connection with the Episcopal Church of America, and consecrated fresh bishops of the new body, and became its first president, a statement was drawn up defining the position and doctrines of the sect. At the present time it has over a hundred clergy-men, and has several parishes in the United States and Canada, and in England. In England, however, it is losing ground, owing to a division which has taken place.

Reform of the Church.—One mark of the increased interest of the nation in religious matters is the demand which has been made during recent years for Church reform. In 1885 a Committee of the Upper House of Convocation was appointed to consider this subject, and from their report we make the following extracts:

The Committee are of opinion that the reforms which require immediate attention are five in number, viz.:

1. The removal of the varied evils and abuses connected with the sale of patronage, and, for further security against the appointment of unfit presentees, the increasing of the power of bishops to refuse institution in certain cases under specified limits and conditions.

2. Simpler and more effectual methods of removing from the cure of souls incompetent, persistently negligent, and criminal clerks. It is also most desirable that the laws affecting sequestration of benefices should be further amended, so as to prevent the diversion of the income of the benefice from its original purpose to the payment of the debts of the incumbent.

3. The correction, so far as may be found expedient and practicable, of existing anomalies in the endowments of the Church—a reform which we believe would largely help to meet the changed character of many localities, and the shifting of population to which some of the memorialists refer.

4. The enlargement of Convocation by an increase in the number of the Proctors for the clergy, and the emolument of Convocation of increased freedom in the internal regulation of matters involving the efficiency of the Church, subject always to the supremacy of the Crown and the authority of Parliament.

5. The assignment to the faithful laity of the Church of a more clearly defined share in the administration of its affairs.

In their comment on each of these heads, they anticipate in [1] the Archbishop's Bill on Patronage [PATRONAGE], and on [2] express the opinion that further steps are required beyond the Pluralties Acts recently passed [PLURALITIES], in order to the more easy removal of unworthy clergymen. As regards [3] they say:—"We note with satisfaction that no proposals have been brought before us for any equalisation of the official incomes of the clergy, but we are distinctly of opinion that steps should at once be taken to reduce existing anomalies, and to improve the incomes of benefices of small value, especially where the population is large. This, we believe, will be best effected by the formation of a large central fund raised by equitable taxation of ecclesiastical incomes. The principles for the formation of this fund already exist in the system of first fruits and tenths—a system which, it will be remembered, this House and the Lower House have proposed largely to modify, with the view of facilitating the retirement of aged and infirm incumbents, and effecting other salutary changes in the disposition of the funds of the Church." They make other suggestions as to Lay Services and Parochial Boards, which will be found under those heads.

Refugees.—A name first applied to the French Protestants who, during the Flemish persecutions in 1569, and again after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685, were forced to leave their country and to seek refuge in England and elsewhere. Since that time it has been extended to all who leave their country in times of distress.

Regalia.—In early times the kings of this country claimed the revenues of all sees long as they remained vacant, and this claim was called regula. We often read in history of the kings, when in want of money, purposely deferring the appointment of a bishop, so that the revenues might be theirs, and order to prevent this scandal in England a promise was extracted from Henry II by the Pope, that the custom should thenceforth be discontinued. In France the kings had the regalia for a much longer period, for we refer to the Edict of Louis XIV. making laws for the strict carrying out of the custom. He was ordered by the Pope, Innocent XI., to desist but at that time Louis was strong enough to refuse to obey. A compromise was made later by Innocent XII., and the question permanently settled.

Regeneration ["a new birth" or "be born again"].—The work of the Holy Spirit which man's heart is changed. The natural regeneration is declared in the New Testament to be a new birth from above [Gr. anthen] quickening of the Spirit, a partaking of Divine nature, the formation of Christ in heart. It is a passive work, and differs from conversion, which is the turning to God by his own will; it comes from God alone, and is utterly out of the power of man to perform, since before regeneration he is in a state of spiritual inability. Regeneration work of God's grace, and completely chan the whole state of man. It is an instantious act, and thus differs from sanctification which is the progression of man towards perfection: it consists in an internal act, it is nevertheless visible in its effects, and blessings of which can never be entirely removed. This view of regeneration, set forth by Apostles, was almost lost sight of in Middle Ages, and was regarded rather as the first stage of justification. Luther and Ca approaching more nearly to the orthodox but their followers did not lay enough stress on the progress of the soul after regeneration and considered that justification by faith the only thing necessary. Arndt and Sp did much to establish the right faith concerning regeneration.

The word "regeneration" only occurs in the Scriptures [Matt. xix. 28; Titus iii. In the former it has no relation to Chris doctrine. A controversy which agitated Church of England some forty years ago has almost died out, and this chiefly because it felt that the dispute was more upon terminology than upon essentials. It was the question, whether Baptism is the means of regeneration. Probably now-a-days not merely Churchmen, but Christians of all denominations are nearer in reality than they might express in words. That the Church of England teaches the doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration in her formularies is indisputable. The words are clear. As soon as the baptism has taken place, the minister says, "Seeing now, dearly beloved, that this child is regenerate and grafted into the body of Christ's Church." But the trouble arose from an interpretation being placed upon the word "regenerate" which it was not able or intended to bear. They who bring an infant to baptism do so in the belief that a blessing is to be looked for therein: that admission into visible covenant is of itself a gift from God. And all gifts of God must of necessity imply life. There is a covenanted means herein of moral and spiritual advancement, but a condition at the same time expressed of Christian duty. Thus Archbishop Sumner, the leader, in his lay, of the Evangelical party, writes: "St. Paul intimates with clearness that the Christians he addressed were thus regenerate: as saying 'put off the old man with his deeds,' and having become 'the temple of the Holy Ghost,' and 'the members of Christ;' as saying 'the spiritual circumcision, and being buried with Christ in baptism;' as having received the spirit of adoption,' and as being washed, sanctified, and justified, in his name of the Lord Jesus, and b by the Spirit of our God.' To the Galatians, 'bewitched,' he says they were, 'that they should not obey the truth,' he still writes: 'Ye are still children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptised into Christ, have put on Christ'" (Apological Preaching, page 91). Such a view is no "magical conception of the Divine activity," it involves to the full the need of personal faith, issuing in holy living. The outward act is the act of obedience to a Divine command. The grace is the gift of God alone. And the words of the Baptismal Service which allow show that the Church of England holds no doctrine of opus operatum to the exclusion of the inward faith, which is necessary to acceptance before God. A necessity of an entire change of heart and life is absolutely declared. Even in the prayer which follows the act of baptism, the doctrine of regeneration, a distinguished from regeneration, is clearly announced. There the prayer is that the person now regenerate "may crucify the old man, and utterly abolish the whole body of in," proving that the Church does not regard his as comprised in the fact of regeneration. Furthermore he is to "continually mortify all his evil and corrupt affections, and daily proceed in all virtue and godliness of living."

Registers are required, by an Act of Henry VIII's Minister, Cromwell [a.d. 1536], to be kept, in every parish church, of the baptisms, marriages, and burials which have taken place. Books were ordered to be kept for the purpose at the expense of the parish, and entries made therein to be sent once a year to the bishop of the diocese. The method of keeping varied greatly at first, according to the idiosyncrasies of the clergy. Some of them neglected the duty altogether; some entered only the names of the persons baptised and buried, while others entered in the one case the names of the parents and in the other the occupation. Successive Acts of Parliament have altered this. Registers of baptisms are now required to give the name of the person baptised, the names, occupation, and residence of the parents and the officiating minister, as well as the time and place. In marriage registers the names and residences of the persons must be given, the time and place, names of witnesses and of the clergyman; and registers of burials give the name, age, and residence of the deceased.

All marriage registers are to be kept in duplicate marriage registry books. Certified copies of all registers of births and deaths are sent quarterly to the Registrar-General. At the general office in London indexes are kept of all the certified copies of the register, and every person is entitled, on payment of a fee, to search them, and have a certified copy. There are only eight register books known to exist prior to 1538. Beginning with that year, there are 812 registers in England. In 1599 an order came out that all existing registers were to be transcribed into parchment books. In a very few cases the originals and the copies are both found in the parish chest.

Registration. — The following are the rules for the registration of chapels:—[1] It must have been used as a place of public worship by the congregation requiring it to be registered during a year at the least preceding such registration. [2] If the building be one erected and used in lieu of some other building which has been previously registered, and subsequently divided as a place of worship, the registry of the disused building must be cancelled, whereupon the new building may be immediately registered in its stead.

Regium Donum Money, given to the Presbyterian ministers in Ireland by Government. Charles II. began the practice in 1672 by giving £600 per annum as a reward for the loyalty of the Presbyterians, and though afterwards discontinued, it was revived by William III., and George I., in 1728, still further augmented it in return for services rendered by the Presbyterians to the House of Brunswick. Dissenters were excluded from lucrative employment in the Church, and as much as £40,000 was given annually to the heads of Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist congregations to be distributed among their poorer ministers. This ceased in 1669, when the Irish Church was disestablished and disendowed.

Regius Professor.—Henry VIII. endowed certain chairs at the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the lecturers who occupy those chairs are called Regius Professors. There are about seven at each University. At the Universities of Scotland
the title is given to those professors who receive their appointment from the Crown.

Regula Fidei.—An expression used in the early days of the Church to designate the fundamental doctrines of Christianity, or rule of faith. Probably at first the statement of the doctrine of the Trinity was all that was considered necessary for admission to baptism, but this was at different times added to and amplified, until at last the Church was possessed of the Apostles' Creed, which contains the whole basis of her teaching, and is the regula fidei in the Western Church. The Eastern Church requires the Nicene Creed.

Regular.—One who has taken the vows of a monastic house, and is obliged to live according to its rules of poverty, chastity, and obedience. All monks, friars, and mendicants were included under the head of regulars, they lived under special orders, and were distinguished from the seculars, who had to live in the world. Cardinals might call themselves either regulars or seculars, and had the privileges of both states; bishops and archbishops, if they had formerly been regulars, gave up their claim to the name on entering upon their office.
Regular benefices were those which could only be bestowed on members of some regular Order.

Reid, Thomas, D.D.—Founder of Scottish philosophy [b. at Strachan, Kincardineshire, of which place his father was minister, 1709; d. at Glasgow, 1796]. He studied at the Marischal College, Aberdeen, and was appointed Librarian; resigning this post in 1736, he visited London, Oxford, and Cambridge, and after a year he settled at New Machar, Aberdeen, as parish minister. Here he wrote an essay on the application of mathematics to morals, with a view to contradicting an assertion made by Dr. Cheyne that there is a close affinity between them. The essay met with such success that Reid was elected, in 1752, Professor of Moral Philosophy at King's College, Aberdeen, and in 1763 he was chosen to occupy the same post at the University of Glasgow, as the successor of Dr. Adam Smith. His Inquiry into the Human Mind, published in 1764, procured for him the degree of D.D. from the University of Aberdeen. From this time till his death he continued to write on metaphysics, natural law, and philosophy, and in order to do so uninterruptedly he resigned his professorship in 1781. Essays on the Intellectu-Powers appeared in 1785; Essays on the Acti Power of the Human Mind in 1788; a treati-on Matter and Mind, and Physiological Reflections on Muscular Motion. Reid has been called by F. D. Maurice “the philosopher consciousness.” “Common sense” is a phrase which recurs over and over in his writings.
He meaning by it the sense which is common to men, and which belongs to philosophers far as they care to take up the position men. His senses convey to him certain ideas, but that implies that he himself is the centre of these ideas—he the living recipier.
But having got so far, he was perforce carry on further. When beyond all outward phenomena and all sensations he perceived an inn-self independent of them, he came to discern that man has certain obligations of right and wrong—certain duties. The easy-going philosophy of Hume, making sensible experience the all in all of human life, seemed unsatisfy-ning to Reid, and he wrote to the popular philospher, courteously arguing against the shallowness of his conclusions. Hence, as the above-named critic remarks, arose a Scot philosophy, basing itself upon consciousness.
“So philosophy became a profession in Scotland, as it had become in France, mixed with the professions of Belles Letters, of Natural Science, of Economy, and Statistics; sometimes subordinate to these, but still delighting to assume the name of psychology or met-physics. Vast talent was, no doubt, exhibted and consumed in the theory and practice
this profession; but the most serious and pr-found Scotchmen of later days have hail the appearance of the Ayrshire ploughman post as an element of wholesome human reality, brought into the midst of an atmosphere thick and heavy with notions and bo-lore. They say that his songs brought back to them the belief in green fields and hills,
well as the fact of their belonging to a land on which their fathers had dwelt and suffered before them, and that his life showed the
there is need, in the heart of every person of a hope to raise him, and protect him himself, as well as against his rich patrons, which neither the divinity nor the philosophy of Scotland at that time afforded which was not offered by old light formal or new light experiences; which was not found necessary by the polite circles the Hume frequented, and which only glimmer faintly through the consciousness and com-sense of Reid; but of which Burns could the pledge and the promise in the domestic life of his sires, and in the testimony they bore to a Father whose righteousness the earth
father was feebly to exhibit in his own.”

Reihing, Jakob [b. at Augsburg, 157
D. at Tubingen, May 5th, 1628]. He studiin the Jesuit College at Ingolstadt, and lat sought theology and philosophy there and at Jileingen. In 1613 he was appointed Court preacher to the Count Palatine, Wolfgang William, of Neuburg, who had lately left the Protestant religion, and who employed Rein-ner to write against the Reformers. In order to meet the arguments of the Lutherans, he set himself to study the Scriptures, and became persuaded thereby of the errors of the Roman Catholics, he fled to Stuttgart in 1621, and declared himself a Protestant. In 1622 e was made Professor of Theology at Tübingen, and the remainder of his life was spent in writing against the Jesuits and in defence of Protestantism.

Reimarus, Hermann Samuel, was born at Hamburg in 1694, and was educated at Wittenberg. He first attracted public notice by his Primitia Wismariensia in 1723. Our years later he became Professor of Philosophy in Hamburg. In 1728 he married the daughter of J. A. Fabricius, and afterwards assisted his father-in-law in his philological works, and published a Latin memoir of him at his death. He was the author of works in both natural and political history, but his most important work was the Wolfenbüttel fragments, published anonymously by Lessing. These fragments were essays, written from a critical point of view, impugning the Sacred History. The first appeared in 1774, On the Toleration of the Deists, and was followed at intervals by others. In 1777 two of the fragments attacked the passage of the red Sea and the Resurrection, and the sensation produced by them was deepened by a new one On the Purpose of Jesus and His Disciples. This publication lost Lessing the privilege of free publication. The fragments were afterwards collected and published together. The authorship was never disclosed by Lessing, but after the death of Reinmar-ters were published showing that he was the writer. He died in 1768.

Reinhard, Francis Volkmann [b. 1758, at Dresden, Sept. 6th, 1812].—A celebrated German Protestant preacher, appointed in 1782 to the Chair of Theology at Wittenberg, and made, two years later, Preacher to the University and Assessor of the Consistory. In 1792 he was appointed, first, Preacher to the court of Saxony, Ecclesiastical Counsellor, and a Member of the Supreme Consistory. In thirty-nine volumes of sermons are said to furnish the best specimens of German pulpit eloquence since the days of Luther; and also published several theological works, and Memoirs and Confessions of F. V. Reinhard were published after his death. His teaching was Evangelical, while not uninfluenced by the modern development of culture which had ready begun to influence Germany.

Reland, Adrian, an eminent Orientalist, as born at Ryd, in North Holland, in 1676. He studied for three years under Surenhusius, and showed a wonderful talent for learning Oriental languages and literature. He was made Professor of Philosophy at Hardwijk in 1701, and afterwards Professor of Oriental Languages and Ecclesiastical Antiquities at Utrecht. He died of smallpox in 1718. His principal works are Palæstina ex Monumentis veteribus illustrata (still regarded as a most valuable work), Dissertations quinque de Nummis veterum Hebraorum, De Religione Mohammedica, etc.

Relics [Lat. reliquia, "remains"] originally meant the remains of saints and martyrs, which were cherished and revered by the Church; the term afterwards came to be used in a wider sense, to signify anything which had once belonged to the deceased person, or with which he had been in contact. The respect with which relics were regarded increased to adoration, and so great was the passion to possess them that the churches were filled with spurious relics, as the desire to obtain them blinded the eyes of enthusiasts, and laid them open to being defrauded. The Synod of Nicea, 787, commanded that no churches should be consecrated which were not in possession of some relic, and the penalty was excommunication. Reverence to them was enjoined as a Christian duty; wonderful powers of healing or sanctification were attached to them; and every person thought it necessary to carry about a relic to preserve him from danger, and to make his prayers of greater effect. In Roman Catholic countries the worship of relics is still maintained, but they are expressly forbidden by the Church of England, and Luther says they are but "dead things which sanctify nobody."

Religion comes from the Latin, either, according to Cicero, from religere, "to reconsider" or "read over"; or, according to Lactantius and others (which seems the more probable derivation), from religare, "to bind fast." The word is sometimes used as synonymous with "sect"; but in a practical sense it is generally considered as the same with "godli-ness," or a life devoted to the worship and fear of God. Dr. Doddridge thus defines it: "Religion consists in the resolution of the will for God, and in a constant care to avoid whatever we are persuaded He would disapprove, to dispatch the work He has assigned us in life, and to promote His glory in the happiness of mankind." The foundation of all religion rests on the belief of the existence of God. [God; Inspiration.] Religion has been divided into natural and revealed. These are discussed under Natural Theology and Revelation. The religions which exist in the world are usually classified under four heads—Pagan, Jewish, Mahometan, and Christian—to the articles dealing with which the reader is referred.

Religious Orders. [Monasticism.]

Religious Houses.—Houses set apart for the service of God; particularly those for the reception of monks, nuns, penitents, and others wishing to lead a religious life. All religious houses of this description were done away with in England at the Reformation, but the term is still in use in Roman Catholic countries.

Kellyanists; brought restitution, after the earliest accounts of the Church, which were generally attributed to the Synod of Dort, who had condemned them as heretics. A counter-remonstrance was presented by the Calvinists. The Remonstrants were headed by Episcopius and Grotius, and were for some time favour'd in England by Archbishop Laud, who afterwards altered his opinions.

Remonstrants. — A name given to the Arminians, who, in 1610, presented a remon- strance to the States of Holland, complaining of the sentence of the Synod of Dort, which had condemned them as heretics. A counter-remonstrance was presented by the Calvinists. The Remonstrants were headed by Episcopius and Grotius, and were for some time favor'd in England by Archbishop Laud, who afterwards altered his opinions.

Reinaudot, Busèse, a learned Orientalist, was born at Paris in 1616, and was educated by the Jesuits. The great facility with which he learnt and spoke many languages attracted the eyes of the Court towards him, and he was sent by the King to several important missions to England, Spain, etc. He also accompanied Cardinal Noll, to Italy in 1700, to a conclave held to elect a Pope. Reinaudot died in 1720. He was much on the subject of the divisions of Christendom. His principal works are for the Peace of the Papacy, as against J. Aymon's Authentic Monuments of the Religion of the Greeks; and History of the Greek Patriarchs, and Collection of Oriental Liturgies.

Repentance.—A term used for sorrow for sin which produces newness of life. The Greek word most frequently used in New Testament for repentance is metanoia, which signifies a change of mind and disposition. Another word which is also used is metamorphosis, which signifies anxiety or eagerness upon the consideration of what has been done. True repentance involves a real hatred of sin on the ground that it is offensive to God; sorrow on account of the wrong done to God and man; and a hearty desire and resolution to forsake everything repugnant to Divine Will. Repentance is preceded by generation, the chief difference between the two being that the latter is the work of Holy Spirit, while the former is the effect of the human will to act in accord with the Spirit. The Roman Catholics believe that repentance imposes certain excrescences upon the obligations, and burdens on those who have sinned, and these are known as Pena [q.v.]. At the Reformation, however, Lu dessin defined repentance as a "transmutation of mind and affections," and declared that it consisted in faith in God and sorrow for sins. The Pietists laid a great stress on the necessity of repentance, and held the necessity as a great spiritual struggle, which led to a controversy between them and Lutherans. Others again hold that the essence of repentance consists in change of mind and attitude towards...

Its successor was probably erected in the days of Edgar the Pacific [958–975], and was dedicated to St. Wystan, a grandson of one of the Mercian kings. The present chancel is a portion of that church. The whole church has been to a great extent restored under the care of Mr. Blomfield, and is a very beautiful structure. It was hoped to restore the pre-Norman chancel in 1887.

Requiem.—A Mass for the dead performed in the Romish Church, so called from the first words of the introit, “Requiem aeternum dona eis, Domine.” Some musical compositions performed on occasions of mourning are also called Requiems.

Reredos [Fr. arrière dos].—The screen at the back of an altar. In cathedrals or other large churches a reredos was usually necessary to separate the sacrarium from the apse or chapel behind it; in small churches, where there is no space behind the altar, a reredos is sometimes erected as an ornament, or the wall is painted or otherwise adorned instead. Beautiful examples of ancient reredoses are to be seen at Winchester, Durham, and St. Alban’s, and several cathedrals have modern ones.

Reservation, Mental [Mental Reservation].

Reservation of Benefices.—In the eleventh and twelfth centuries the Popes, in order to appoint favourites to benefices, made certain decrees which said that all livings which became vacant by death, if the last incumbent had died in Rome, should be reserved for the Pope. We read of Honorius IV. claiming the right to appoint when the living was vacant by resignation, and in course of time the practice was extended in all sorts of ways. It was put a stop to by the general rebellion in various countries against the despotic rule of the Bishop of Rome.

Reservation of the Sacrament.—The practice of reserving the consecrated elements of Holy Communion, which is the custom in the Church of Rome, was altogether abandoned by the Church of England at the Reformation. In the Roman Church the Host, after the conclusion of the Sacrament, is placed in a “tabernacle.” In olden times this tabernacle was frequently in the shape of a tower, sometimes in that of a covered cup, sometimes (especially in France) in that of a dove. The aumbry, or cupboard, which is so frequently seen in old churches, was often-times the receptacle of the Reserved Host. Its presence was indicated by a light burning before it.

That reservation was practised in the early

of the turning toward Him, irrespective of the amount of sorrow for sin consciously experienced. Appealing to Scripture, they urge that it is called repentance (or change of mind or heart) “toward God;” and that we are expressly taught by Paul [2 Cor. vii. 9, 10] that true godly sorrow worketh or produces repentance, being therefore a means to it, and distinct. It is also urged that in the case of the young man who refused to go into the iniquard, but “afterward repented and went,” the essence of his repentance consisted not in the amount of contrition he may have felt, which was only of value for the effect produced, but in the fact that he changed in his own mind or will toward his father’s command, and did what he had refused to do. It has been said further that the distinction so rawn is not a vain or meaningless one, since God “commands” men everywhere to repent, and the lack of a conscious sorrow they do not feel is made by many an excuse for inutility to obey; whereas it is urged that God never commands any man to do what his conscience does not tell him he might do, and that if the command were clearly interpreted and understood to mean the giving up or surrender of the will to God, which every man feels he might do, a great and real practical hindrance to many would be taken away. All agree that the evidences of true repentance, to be sought and found in works “meet” or it.

Reprobation.—The Greek word adokimos, “disappointment,” is translated “reprobrate” in Rom. i. 28; 2 Cor. xiii. 5, 6, 7; 2 Tim. ii. 8; Titus i. 16. It does not fall within our province to discuss the meaning of these several passages, but the word in its technical and ecclesiastical usage is used in the Protestant controversy as the antithesis to Election [q.v.]. It should, however, be observed that there is a large school of divines who do not consider that the Scriptural doctrine of Election involves the Calvinistic doctrine of reprobation. Their contention is, that when he world lay in wickedness and condemnation, Christ came from God to call it to Himself for reconciliation, and that the Election was simply His choice of men who were to become His Church for the purpose of carrying out His Ministry of Reconciliation. St. Paul was “a chosen vessel” with the object of “carrying the Name of Christ to the Gentiles.” This view, it will be seen, rests Reprobation not upon the Divine Will, but upon the per-
Church is clear from the words of Justin Martyr. In a passage which is the very earliest mention of the Eucharist after Scripture, he says, "The deacons communicate each of those present, and carry away to the absent of the blest bread and wine." A passage in Tertullian would seem to imply that the faithful received the reserved Eucharist daily, and the early Fathers are full of proof that the Sacrament was "carried about" in the early Church. But probably the dangers of persecution, preventing the free meeting together, in great part accounts for this. And the practice led to such great abuses and superstitions that it was very early forbidden, except in special cases. One of these cases was reservation for the sick. As there was no office for private celebration in the Early Church, we conclude that reservation on their behalf was the ordinary rule, and those Canons which forbade reservation especially excepted the cases of the sick from such prohibition.

The conviction of the Church of the Reformation that abuses had come in by means of the practice of reservation beyond those which had caused the limitation in early times, led to the prohibition of the practice altogether, and a special service was placed in the Liturgy for the communion of the sick. The Twenty-eighth Article declares expressly that reservation is not according to Christ's ordinance. Of late years a movement has been made for reviving the practice of reservation, on the plea that in times of sickness the minister who has a large population will be unable to go through several communions in a day. But the movement has found no favour among the rulers of the Church, who apprehend, not without reason, that there is a desire to revive a practice which is of comparatively modern growth in the Church—namely, the exposure of the Sacrament in churches—for the purpose of sacramental adoration—a practice which is not to be separated in thought from the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation. In fear lest any countenance should be given to this doctrine, the Bishops, in 1883, after a careful discussion in Convocation, published a declaration that reservation of the Sacrament is contrary to the principles of the Church of England.

Residence.—Rules for the residence of ecclesiastics at their cures were laid down by several Councils in very early times, as abuses in the matter soon began to arise. Before the Reformation the evil of non-residence had greatly increased, partly in consequence of pluralities, and partly for less important reasons. It had again become a monstrous evil in the 18th century. Thus a return issued in 1737 gives 455 livings in Cheshire alone, where the incumbents were non-resident, 105 in Middlesex, etc. Since that time this evil has been remedied. The law concerning residence at the present day is that every clergyman must reside on his cure for at least nine months in every year, except when prevented by ill-health or other efficient cause, and that during his absence he must provide a curate to discharge his duties. Pluralities are forbidden, except under certain conditions; and a licensed pluralist is required to preach at least thirteen sermons every year at the benefice from which he is most absent, and to exercise hospitality there for two months yearly. There are still a few cases of clerics living who held benefices before the Act came into operation and who are thereby exempt, and thus the scandal remains of a few livings in which grown-up inhabitants have never once had an opportunity of seeing their rector.

Residentiary.—Those members of the cathedral body who are bound to reside in the vicinity of the cathedral, to conduct the services and to regulate ordinary affairs. Canon residentiary are attached to all cathedrals of the old foundation, and it was formerly required that they should all reside at the same time; but this caused much inconvenience, so many of them held other benefices, and regulations were made requiring certain conditions of residence, and specifying three months as the very least time in each year in which a canon shall spend in residence.

Resignation.—The giving up a charge or preferment by a beneficed clergyman to a superior by whom it was originally presented to him. If the resignation is made in consequence of bodily or mental infirmity, the incumbent is entitled, under certain conditions to a pension not exceeding one-third of the income of the benefice resigned. The resignation must be made in person, and without bargaining for preferment to some better appointment, though a difference is made where there is a question of exchange.

Resolutioners.—After the battle of Dunbar it was thought necessary to repeal certain Acts which had been passed at the beginning of the Commonwealth. The so-called Acts of Classes had declared the Royalists, or, to use the term employed in the Acts, Malignants, were incapable of holding any office in the State. In 1651, however the "Resolutioners" wished to modify the decree, and brought a Bill before the Scot-Parliament which should allow any man to be a servant of the Crown unless he had been excommunicated by the Church. The lead of the party, who had great influence in England, and was in Cromwell's favour, was James Sharp, afterwards Bishop of St Andrew's. The opposing party, headed by James Guthrie, were called Protesters. The struggle lasted till after the Restoratio out finally ended in the victory of the Resolutioners.

Responds or Responderies.—A name used in the ancient Church for short verses of scripture introduced into the middle of, or at the end of, the Lessons. The former were the “Short,” and the latter the “Long Responds.” These are referred to in the Preface Concerning the Service of the Church, where, in speaking of the reading of the Bible, it says, “This godly and decent order of the ancient Fathers hath been altered, broken, and neglected by planting in uncertain stories and legends with multitude of responds, verses, etc. and afterwards: “For this cause be cut off anathems, responds, and invitatories, and such things as did break the continual course of the reading of the Scripture.”

Response.—An answer made by the congregation to the prayers of the clergyman, according to the directions in the Prayer Book. Many of the Psalms are obviously designed to be sung or said alternately by minister and people, and it was customary in the early Church that this form of worship should be used. It has been banished from the Liturgy of the Roman Church in great measure, as the prayers are said in Latin, which is unknown to most of the congregation; and the custom of depending upon ex tempore prayers among Dissenters also precludes the use of responses. The Church of England maintains them for three reasons: [1] they show the unity of mind and will which ought to exist between the minister and people, and emphasise the fact that he only leads the prayers of the whole congregation; [2] they increase the devotion of the people, making them feel that they are in close relation to God; and [3] they arrest attention. Responses are of four kinds: [1] the "Amen" after each prayer; [2] the alternare verses; [3] repetitions, as in the Lord’s Prayer, confession, etc., and [4] the "Kyrie Eleison," after the rehearsal of each commandment.

Restorationists.—A name given to a branch of the Universalists [q.v.]. They were separated from the original body in 1840 on what was regarded as the original principle of Universalism—that there is a future state of punishment for the wicked, but that it is of limited duration, and that in the end they will be restored to happiness.

Resurrection.—The historical fact of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ is the keystone of all Christian teaching, the foundation of all Christian life. Upon it the whole fabric of Christianity rests. "If Christ be not risen your faith is vain," wrote St. Paul to the Church at Corinth; and every Christian teacher and theologian in the same full and unqualified manner makes the truth of this fact the one test by which all he propounds must stand or fall. Not only does the whole of Christian doctrine depend upon it, but the entire question of miracles is bound up with it. Remove the Resurrection from the arch of miracle, and the other stones that form it fall away at once: but let this be clearly established, and it will bear the whole weight of the rest.

The first preachers of Christianity proclaimed clearly that Jesus of Nazareth, who was crucified upon Calvary and died upon the Cross, came to life again in the tomb wherein He was laid, and appeared to His disciples at various times and in different places for the space of forty days, and then ascended out of their sight into heaven, since which He has never been seen by bodily eyes, except by St. Paul, when he was stricken down on the road to Damascus, and possibly afterwards.

The risen Jesus, according to the teaching of Christianity, was no spirit or ghost, but one who could be handled [Luke xxiv. 39], who had flesh and bones, who ate before His disciples; and yet whose body was no longer subject to those limitations of matter which govern the existence of earthly bodies, for it appeared and disappeared at a moment; it came into the midst of the disciples when they were sitting with closed doors, and finally it rose from the earth until a cloud received it out of the sight of the onlookers. It is manifest, then, that while the body of the risen Jesus was in a real sense identical with that which was crucified, since it bore the marks of the wounds inflicted upon it, and was recognizable to all who had previously known it, yet some great change had passed upon it, irreconcilable with all we at present know of the laws of matter. The fact of the Resurrection, however, rests upon human testimony of the strongest kind. Let us see what it is, and then state the objections made by those who are compelled to admit the testimony, but who try to explain it away.

All that we know of the Resurrection is told us in the writings of St. Paul and the Gospels of the New Testament. The existence of St. Paul, and the genuineness of his chief writings, is now universally admitted. He is as real a personage as Cicero, Julius Cesar, or Thucydides. He was living at the time of the Resurrection as a member of the strictest sect of the Jews, and was a bitter and active opponent of those who believed in the claims of Jesus to be the Messiah. But, as he himself tells us, while on a journey to Damascus, he was struck to the ground, and then actually saw Jesus, heard Him speak and replied to Him, and ever after spent his life in proclaiming the doctrines he had bitterly opposed. Within a few years, twenty-eight at the most, he had written four letters known as the Epistle to the Romans, the two Epistles to the Corinthians, and the Epistle to the Galatians, in which he treats of the Resurrection of Jesus Christ as an admitted fact, upon which he founds a system of practical teaching affecting the whole lives of believers. Within seventy years of the Crucifixion—which it must be noticed was to the general public nothing more than the ignominious execution of a fraudulent political adventurer, a blasphemer against the God of His own race, and a traitor to the State (for it was the fact that He was supposed to be aiming at the throne of Judaea that made Him obnoxious to the Roman Government, and that He called Himself the Son of God that inspired the enmity of the Jews)—arose Churches of Christians all over the known world, whose members were prepared to die rather than deny the fact of the Resurrection. And from that day to this such Churches have continued to flourish and multiply.

Let it also be noted that one day of the week, the first, has from the very day on which our Lord rose from the grave been observed as the festival of the Resurrection, completely obliterating among Christians the observance of the seventh day of rest, the Sabbath of the Jews; and in addition to this weekly commemoration, there is the Great Feast of Easter, annually celebrated, the sole reason for which is the fact of the Resurrection of Jesus.

It being impossible, then, to deny that from the very day on which the Resurrection is said to have taken place there have been an ever-increasing number of people thoroughly believing in it as a fact, who have relied upon the word of those who were alive at the time, it becomes necessary to inquire into the nature of the objections urged against it. It has once been said that Jesus did not die, but merely fell into a deep swoon, from which He recovered; but this is never seriously advanced now, for it involves so many difficulties that the most inveterate adversaries of the Resurrection reject it with scorn. Others have declared that the disciples stole away the body of Jesus, and practised a fraud upon the world by saying that they had seen Him alive again. But, had such an imposition been attempted, is it likely that a few days afterwards its authors would have boldly proclaimed the Resurrection to a hostile crowd in the very city where the crucifixion took place, and where there would be hundreds of men eager to expose it? Would men and women have endured persecution, and even death, for the sake of a profitless fraud? Would there not have been some traitor in the camp, ready to sell his secret, as Judas was to betray Jesus? Such a theory, like the first, has been abandoned by every one, and there remains only one to be seriously examined, which is that commonly spoken of as the Theory of Visions. By those who hold it, it is asserted that the disciples, in their ardent affection and excited state of feeling, imagined that they had seen the Crucified One alive again amongst them on various occasions, and that He had sailed and done the things recorded of Him.

The strange power of imagination under certain conditions to give form and reality to mental impressions may be readily admitted but we must note carefully what those conditions are. They are that what appears in vision must accord with previous desires of what should appear, with fixed ideas, and with a earnest expectancy of what shall occur. Were those the conditions under which the supposed visions appeared? Those who followed Jesus before His crucifixion were now a scattered, frightened few. Almost all who had once believed in Him had now forsaken Him. Two or three women and one or two men were all who remained faithful enough care for His body, nor do we know of any who looked for a resurrection. Jesus had spoken to them of rising again, but, so far from expecting such a thing, only of His disciples, a woman, came to His grave on the morning of the third day, and that with no expectation of meeting Him alive but with the wish to render affectionate offices to His corpse. When at length she recognised Him she ran to tell others of the fact, but they were naturally incredulous. The same day towards evening Jesus appeared to two others on the road from Jerusalem to Emmaus, and so unprepared were they for the resurrection of their Lord that they failed to recognise Him, even while He talked to them. Upon their return to Jerusalem, they told what they had seen to ten and those who were with them, and they spoke Jesus appeared in the midst of them. To quiet their alarm, He had to assure them He was no ghost, but a body of flesh and bones. Eight days after that He again appeared, the doors being shut, and invited the unbelieving Thomas to put his finger in the print of the nails and his hand into the wound in His side. Once by the Lake Galilee, at another time to five hundred once, and last of all upon the Mount of Olives, He appeared to different groups of His disciples, and then, with the except of His appearance to Saul of Tarsus on the road to Damascus, He ceased to be seen men, nor from that time onward did any one claim to have seen Jesus.

The objection has been made—How was it if these appearances were anything more than visions, that they were granted to disciples only, when surely His enemies might have been for ever silenced, crushed, and confounded, if He had openly walked the streets of Jerusalem, or taught in the Temple? such an objection the reply is obvious. The time of Christ's contact with the world he gone by. It had deliberately rejected Him. It was and is no part of the mission of Jesus to force Himself upon the Jews, or upon any one. He always said that it was those who "were of the truth" who would hear His voi-
But further, as has been ably pointed out by Prof. Henry Wace, D.D. [The Gospel and its Witnesses], the objection springs from an entire misconception of the object with which the gospel histories of the Resurrection are recorded. "It is not, and never was, the empty grave upon which the faith of the Apostles and the life of the Church was founded. It was the existence of the Saviour a glory, and more than that, His actual energy and life-giving power, through His spirit, which gave the Church its foundation. ... The disciples did not yield to the impulse, to which mere visions would have led them, to proclaim simply our Lord's deliverance from the grave. They waited silently for ten days after His last disappearance from them, and then they appealed to the potent fact of His exercising a new and living power." This explains the simplicity of the gospel records. "The witness of the Apostles did not rest simply upon their asserrions respecting what they alone had seen; it was not simply that they, and they only, had stood the grave empty, and that our Lord had appeared to them and had subsequently ascended to heaven. Had that been all they had to say [the italics are ours], it might not have been difficult for the enemies of our Lord to have either described them as mere enthusiasts, or to have charged them with deception. The testimony of twelve unlearned and ignorant men, despoiled as the flowers of a crucified master, would scarcely, it had stood alone and unsupported, have under credence for so great a miracle. At all events, the Apostles did not proclaim this testimony so long as it stood alone. When they proclaim it, they are able to appeal to a recent fact, to a number of successive facts, which verify it. They are suddenly endowed with new spiritual powers: in the name of the Lord Jesus they work miracles on the souls of men, and convert thousands to the assurance and a holy life; and it is with the support of these facts, and in order to explain them, that they declare what they had heard from our Lord after His resurrection. They proclaim to the Jews that Christ is risen; and here, they say, is the proof of it, at the Holy Spirit is bestowed on us, that miracles are wrought in His name, that He actually gives power, both spiritually and sily, to those who believe on Him. This was, and not mere testimony to the past, which produced so great an effect at Jerusalem and so alarmed the Jewish rulers. ... The essential part of the Resurrection was the Lord's reappearance to His disciples in various form, and the fact that He was still living, as a Prince and Saviour, to them. But this great fact believers were assured, not by the Apostles' report of His appearance to them, but by the daily evidences they had His living power and grace. ... The events narrated in the Acts of the Apostles proved that the Lord was with His Church, and this fact was to them the most certain of all realities. The Evangelists did not write, therefore, to prove the Resurrection. They wrote under the living conviction of the Resurrection being true; and they were only concerned to give such details of it as might suit their particular purpose." Thus, spite of the hostile attitude of the rulers and the opposition of the Sadducees, who denied both the resurrection and the existence of spirits, the preaching of the Apostles made its way amongst men, so that where, as at Cerinthus, there lived believers who regarded their own resurrection as a merely spiritual matter, they made no question of the actual bodily resurrection of Jesus.

Again, not only was the reappearance of Jesus at variance with any ideas that could previously have been entertained by His disciples, but it was not confined to single individuals, and was given to many, amongst whom, in course of time, arose divisions and jealousies, which would, no doubt, have called forth denials or doubts of the resurrection, could there have been any. Visions are transitory; the appearances of Jesus to the disciples were prolonged. During them He was able to enter into extended teaching as to the Kingdom of God, and the nature of the commission with which He entrusted them. Then, again, these appearances came suddenly to an end with the Ascension of Jesus into heaven. Had they been merely the visions of excited and hysterical subjects, would they not have continued for an indefinite period? Is it not likely that men of ambitious or jealous temperaments would have claimed similar privileges to those which had been granted to the Apostles and others? But we do not hear of any other in the early Church who claimed to have seen the Lord, except St. Paul. Yet further, belief in Jesus as the Messiah died with His death upon the Cross. "We trusted," said the disappointed disciples on the road to Emmaus, "that it had been He which should have redeemed Israel." Affection survived in the hearts of Mary and others, but faith was dead. With the Resurrection faith revived, and so much more powerful was it in its renewed life, that in a short time belief in the crucified but risen Jesus had made its way into the heart of Asia Minor, amongst the thriving Greek colonies on the shores of the Jgean, in the centres of commerce and culture at Corinth and Athens, and in the imperial city of Rome.

One question may be asked of those who do not believe in the fact of the Resurrection, and yet cannot deny the existence of Jesus. If the story of the Resurrection be not true, what became of the body of Jesus? Two facts are now universally admitted by all serious critics: that on the first Easter morning the grave of the Lord Jesus contained no Retreats are times of retirement from the active work of life, whereby the spiritual life may be deepened by means of prayer and meditation in those already leading religious lives.

For a very long period it has been customary in the Roman Church for the members of religious communities to go into retreat for some time every year, and a series of "Exercises" for use on such occasions, consisting of meditations on the Life and Work of Christ, on Death and Eternity, were drawn up by St. Ignatius Loyola [q.v.]. They are called the Maurersa, from the place where they were written. Retreats were also held for ordinands before their ordination.

The practice of going into retreat has been largely revived in the Anglican Church of late years, and retreats are now held both for men and for women—for clergymen, for schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, for the members of sisterhoods and guilds, and for men and women in the ordinary walks of life. A retreat ordinarily lasts from one to three whole days; in the stricter ones, silence is observed during the whole time, and, in all, the transaction of everyday business is suspended. A clergymen of experience acts as conductor, and holds private interviews with and advises those who wish to see him. A retreat begins with an address by the conductor on the first evening, and he usually gives three meditations or addresses each day in church or in the chapel of the college, the subject of which is the increase of personal holiness, both for its own sake and also as the source whence a right influence over others must flow. Sometimes the address takes the form of an "Instruction" as to the best way of meeting various temptations to worldliness and other sins, and of grappling with the spiritual difficulties peculiar to the occupation or circumstances of those in retreat. It is usual in retreats for the clergy to have a daily celebration of Holy Communion, and, in other cases, at least on the first and last days.

The intervals between the addresses are occupied in services in church, in prayer and meditation and self-examination, and it is often urged that each of those in retreat should make some definite resolution in writing as to amendment of life before returning home.

Retreats are best held in a college or religious house, or in some place so arranged that distraction by the outer world may be avoided during meals and at bedtime.

Retreats are sometimes called "Qui Days," but the name is not particularly happy, as many—the country clergy, countr schoolmasters, and others—may have many peaceful days at home. The name "retreat aptly expresses the need which many feel for a period of retirement from the worldliness which is as much present in quiet as in bus days.

Retribution. — The belief that sin brings its punishment after it, has belonged to all religions from the beginning. It is true that, at first mooted, this principle turned mainly upon consequences to follow in this life. To the head found in the paths of righteousness was to be a crown of glory, while the gains and hairs of the violent and the treacherous were to be brought down to the grave with bloo. The law laid down in the Second Commandment of the sins of parents visited upon children, is recognized in our own country as biological law, and we call it hereditary. It is a generalised fact of social science. With the coming of Christ the horizon widened. The Christian idea of retribution rests upon the fundamental law that here have no continuing city, that earth is a place of probation, that God's judgment will be thorough and complete, such as the universe will acquiesce in as perfectly just, that it will require the two worlds, the pre-se and the future, to reveal that perfect justice. We believe, as Christians, that when we live in this world it is not to melt into the infinitive Past, but to live in an infinite Future. [Eschatology; Eternal Punishment, etc.]

Reuchlin, Johann, an eminent German Hebrew scholar, called also La Fume a Capnio (these being the German, French, a Greek names for "smoke"), was born in Pforzheim in 1455. When he was at the height of his sweet voice and talent for music, he was in Paris, where he lectured in Latin and Greek. He remained at Basle for 20 years, and then, meeting with opposition from certain theologians who were jealous of his popularity, he returned to Paris, and continued to study Greek under Hermann of Sparta. In 1478 he went to Oreil and thence to Poitiers, in both of which towns he studied law, and in 1481 took doctor's degree, and went to Tübingen. 1482 Reuchlin accompanied the Duke of Württemberg as secretary to Italy, where became acquainted with Politian, Marsilius Ficinus, and others, whose influence made decided change in his views. In 1496 he went to Heidelberg, where he spent the rest of his life. In 1498 he was invited to Rome, where he took Hebrew lessons.
having previously begun the language under akob Jehiel Loanz, the Emperor's Jewish physician. He then went to Stuttgart, and was resolved to devote himself to earning, but in 1501 was chosen judge of the Swabian League. In 1506 appeared his Judiments of the Hebrew Language, which rendered possible the free study of the original scripture. In 1509 a converted Jew, named Johann Pfefferkorn, of Cologne, advised Maximilian to burn all the books of the Talmud, and the Emperor named a commission, of which Reuchlin was one, to consider the question. He accordingly wrote a document containing his opinion that the act could be very disastrous to Christian learning, and also shows that he had a decided inclination to religious toleration. This was shown to Pfefferkorn, who wrote a violent buse of it in his Handsiegel, to which Reuchlin answered by Augenspiegel. The monks of Cologne were greatly incensed at his pamphlet, and declared that it contained forty-three Judaizing propositions, and in 1513 selected Hoogstraten as accuser. Reuchlin was acquitted; but the Dominicans, not content, appealed to Pope Leo X., who appointed a commission to inquire into the matter, the majority of which were again on the side of Reuchlin, and the monks were forced to pay his expenses, and to make him compensation and apology. In 1519 Reuchlin went to Ingolstadt, where he received 200 old crowns annually from the Duke William of Bavaria. He remained till the outbreak of plague there two years after, on which he returned to Stuttgart, and died there the same year [1522] of jaundice. Besides the Hebrew Grammar, Reuchlin wrote De Verbo tyrifico, De Cabbala Placitis, a manual of vil law, etc.

Reunion.—It has become of late years a matter of growing sorrow to many true and earnest Christians that the Church is divided into the numberless sects which now exist; and the desire for unity among Christians has led to the formation of three societies within late ears. These are: [1] the Association for promoting the Unity of Christendom, the object of which is to unite the Church in England, and all Protestant bodies, with the Romish and Greek Churches; [2] the Evangelical Alliance, to unite Protestants against the Church of Rome; and [3] the Home Reunion Society, whose object is to present the Church of England in an equilitative attitude towards those who regard themselves as outside her pale, so as to lead towards the corporate reunion of all Christians in the doctrines of the Ever-blessed Trinity, and the Incarnation and Atone ment of our Lord Jesus Christ." [Unity.]

Revelation.—God, says the Epistle to the Hebrews, made Himself known to the others "by divers portions and in divers manners." And, therefore, Revelation is a subject which covers much ground. The works of nature are to the devout soul a revelation—"the heavens declare the glory of God." To deny this is really Atheism, for it denies that the world has an author. But the Christian believer declares that God has made Himself known, not only by the works of nature, but by special interventions since the heavens and earth were finished, and specially by the voice of Christ. He "hath in these last days spoken to us by His Son." Nature does not speak with such power as is needful to convince the world. And, therefore, we generally understand by Revelation a more distinct, a closer, more definite utterance. Such utterance involves a miraculous interposition, the direct action of a Divine Will, clearly to be distinguished from the realm of ordinary physical law.

We assume the existence of a personal God or Creator. We assume also that He speaks to the conscience and the heart. This may be denied to be a demonstrable truth, but there is, at least, nothing improbable in such an hypothesis. If it be credible on other grounds, there are no arguments which militate against it. The facts of nature are bewildering—the many races of men, their conflicts, their troubles and sorrows, the shortness of life, the curtain hanging over futurity, the constant defeat of good. No light comes from nature to explain all these things. But there is no antecedent improbability in the supposition that the Creator, who has yet left marks upon His works of a beneficent and loving purpose, may interfere in the anarchy, and defeat the suicidal passions of men, and bid them look to Him and be at peace. There is no improbability that He who was able to make the world should be able to influence His work. It is not improbable that an intercourse should take place between God and the soul. The real question at issue, and the only one, is, What is the evidence on which this intervention is believed? The doubt is not whether God can intervene, nor whether He is likely to have done so, but whether there is proof that He has intervened. This is a question which has already been considered under the head of MIRACLES.

Mr. John Stuart Mill, while confessing that there is no sound for denying the possibility of the Creator's interference, holds that the probability is against it, because "the whole of our observation of nature proves to us by incontrovertible evidence that the rule of His government is by means of second causes; that all facts, or, at least, all physical facts, follow uniformly on given physical conditions, and never occur but when the appropriate collocation of physical conditions is realised." But, on the other hand, it is strangely improbable, on the face of it, that God, having wrought His will in creation, having done so with minute and wondrous skill, should straightway cease to work at all. Creation involves duties. The parent having given birth to a child, does not leave it on a doorstep to take its chance of existence. We believe, then, that God, while always working, and sustaining His works, has at certain periods so exerted His will as to reveal the fact of His existence, and the purpose of His workings. He declared that He ruled the nations, that He hated iniquity, and loved righteousness, and in visible proof of this He interfered in the case of Israel and overthrew Pharaoh, in manifestation of His eternal and unchanging laws. He declared from the beginning that He is the Lord of Life, and would deliver His children from death. The miracles of Christ were one and all a revelation of this truth, and His resurrection is a witness sufficient for all ages that death is not the lord of man. The following passage from a valuable work entitled The Mystery of God, by T. Vincent Tymms, puts the case fairly:—"Tennyson sings: 'God fulfils Himself in many ways, lest one good custom should corrupt the world.' Is there not a profound suggestion here? If there be such a God, as we have reason to believe, one long custom might deceive the world into thinking there is no Worker at all! In spite of all the alleged miracles of Revelation, and the inexplicable events observed by science, men do infer the non-existence, or the non-activity, of God from that measure of uniformity they perceive. Would it not tend to curb this confusion of mind if God condescended to work a miracle of self-revelation? If continued life be the law for all human beings, would not a visible resurrection remove a false inference drawn from the general uniformity with which bodies remain in their graves? Would it not be corrective of some disastrously false calculations based on the supposition that death makes an end of all, and that there is no judgment to be looked for hereafter? If kindness be the law of God's treatment of men, would not a few visible samples of His mercy assist a true faith in danger of being confounded by the prevalence of disease? If active sympathy with man be the real condition of God's mind, would not the revelation of such sympathy in a personal form be the dissipation of a false impression derived from the non-appearance of any superior Being to care for the inhabitants of a mechanical world? If, in spite of all human sin and misery and apparent failure, God is working out a plan which will bring in everlasting righteousness, would it not promote that result, and remove an intellectual confusion which is fitted to paralyse man's moral endeavours. If God were to grant a special disclosure of His purpose, and were to afford, by works no human might could perform, some illustration of His own power to usward, and thus, indirectly, also some assurance that the message was no cunningly devised fable, but a true word from Himself, and worthy of universal faith?"

Revenues of the Church.—In thirty days when persecution was rife, it may easily be imagined that the Church did not possess and did not care to possess, lands and immoveable property of any kind. The clergy we supported by voluntary offerings, mostly chiefly monthly, and distributed monthly, the funds being at the disposal of the bishop. In quieter times it became of frequent occurrence that lands and houses were assigned will or otherwise to the augmentation of the revenues of the Church, for the relief of the poor, the maintenance of the fabrics, and the support of the clergy, and the bishop was assisted by his acconoma, or steward, elected by the votes of the clergy. Besides suchquests, tithes and first-fruits came to be settled on the Church, and some of the Emperors granted allowances of corn out of the public exchequer.

Reverend [abbreviated Rev.].—The title given to the clergy generally. Are bishops called "most reverend?" Bishop "right reverend?" and deans, "very reverend?" At the time of the Reformation this title was greatly objected to by some, on the ground that it may only be said of God, "He and reverend is His name." In the seventeenth century the general title for cleric was "master." But it is now used by including most dissenting ministers.

Revised Version.—The so-called "Authorised Version" of the Holy Scriptures was published in 1611, being itself a revision of numerous predecessors. Since that revision was made new MSS. have been discovered, and carefully compared, with the result of showing many inaccuracies in the text from which the version of 1611 was made. Besides this, the science of geography, natural history, and of history have been formed and cultivated, and by the means light has been thrown upon many passages of Scripture, and the names of several plants, animals, etc., in the version of 1611 have been discovered to be wrongly translated. Again, a number of words and phrases perfectly understood in the time of James I. have been changed in meaning, and no longer express the ideas they once did. For such reasons, Biblical scholars have for a long period wished for a revision of the Bible, and several of them made advances in the way of partial translations from time to time. In the autumn of 1870, the Convocation of Canterbury formed a committee for the purpose of preparing a scheme for the revision of the Authorised Version. As the result, two comparisons of revisers were chosen from the most eminent scholars in England—twenty-four for the vision of the Old Testament and twenty-four for the revision of the New Testament, were to take counsel with two companies of American scholars. nd Bristol (Dr. Ellicott) was chairman of the New Testament company; Bishop Thirlwall St. David's), and afterwards Bishop Harold Browne (Winchester), of the Old Testament company.

The labours of the New Testament revisers extended over a period of ten years and five months, and were brought to a close on November 11th, 1880, whilst the revision of the Old Testament was not completed until July 10th, 1884. The leading rule for both companies was "to introduce as few alterations as possible into the text of the Authorised Version consistently with faithfulness."

Revised Version of the New Testament.—By systematic comparison of MSS., the New Testament company formed a revised text of the Greek Testament (afterwards published in all as the Revisers' Text of the Greek Testament), which was the basis of their revision.

few specimens of the various kinds of changes made may be given. The well-known text of the three heavenly witnesses (John v. 7) disappears, because it is found only in one or two Greek MSS., and those of the slightest authority. This was a necessary correction of the text. Amongst words and phrases which have altered in meaning ay be mentioned, "by and by" [Matt. ii. 21], which formerly meant "straightway," as it now appears in the Revised New Testament. In the same verse, the word "is fended" has given place to "stumbleth," the meaning is, not that the man is irritated and angry at persecution, but that he takes him stumble in his religious walk or faith, and so become unfruitful. To "precede" has the place of "prevent" in 1 Thess. 15; and "judgment," of "damnation" in John v. 29 and 1 Cor. xi. 29. These various emendations are very numerous, and especially liable in the epistles, the meaning of which many difficult places has been rendered more clear; thus, "I know beholding myself," is now, rightly, "I know nothing against myself" [1 Cor. iv. 4]; and Philipp. ii. "Who, being in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God," is now made sin by being rendered "... counted it not prize to be on an equality with God."

Revised Version of the Old Testament.—Where the oldest MSS. of the New Testament are from the fourth and fifth centuries, the oldest Hebrew MSS. of the Old Testament date from the tenth and eleventh centuries, and these, unlike the MSS. of the New Testament, belong to one family—i.e. have come from one source—and do not differ in sentiments from the Masoretic, or traditional Hebrew text, printed in ordinary Hebrew letters; hence the Old Testament revisers had the materials for forming a new text. Besides this, the ancient versions of the Hebrew Bible, of which the Septuagint is the least and most important, yield a text which, the opinion of scholars, is inferior to the ordinary Hebrew one, so that although very valuable emendations have been made by the help of these various materials, the number of them is much less than in the New Testament. A few specimens of the changes in the revised Old Testament may be given. Gen. xii. 6; xiii. 18, etc.: "the plain of Moreh," "the plain of Mamre," become "the oak of Moreh," "the oaks of Mamre." In Exod. xxxiv. 13, "cut down their groves," is rendered "cut down their asherim," since asherah is not a grove, but the wooden symbol of a goddess, of which the plural is asherim. This change has been made in several places. Generally speaking, the translation of the Psalms in the Authorised Version is a good one. There are, however, some valuable changes in the revision; thus the meaning of Ps. xvi. 2, 3 is now made plain. Authorised Version: "O my soul, thou hast said unto the Lord, Thou art my Lord: my goodness extendeth not to thee; But to the saints that are in the earth, and to the excellent, in whom is all my delight," reads in the Revised Version, "I have said unto the Lord, Thou art my Lord: I have no good beyond thee.

As for the saints that are in the earth, They are the excellent in whom is all my delight."

It is a great gain to the unlearned reader that he should have before him in the Revised Version of the New Testament an exact translation of what is, in the judgment of competent scholars, a close approximation to the actual text of the original Greek, instead of one made from a text confessedly imperfect; and in the Revised Version of the Old Testament a translation of the Hebrew, much more accurate than that of the Authorised Version. The gain is so great that it is to be regretted that anything should have hindered the popularity of the revised Bible; but in the New Testament (not in the Old) there are a considerable number of small verbal alterations, which, without conveying to the ordinary reader any point in the original Greek, mar the rhythm of well-known passages; the repetition of "and" in Matt. xiii. 37-39 is one instance in point.

To many it will be a consoling thought to remember that in the Revised Bible no Scripture doctrine, no Scripture precept has been changed; and that whatever can be proved from the old version can be proved from the new. The great truths of religion remain firm; indeed, the accuracy of the translation renders them far less exposed to challenge than they were before.

The interesting preface—"The Translators to the Reader"—of the revisers of 1611, and the prefaces of the Old and New Testament companies of the present time, are well worth careful perusal.

Revision of the Prayer-Book.—In the article on COMMON PRAYER we have told how the attempted revision of 1689 came to nothing. About twenty-five years ago the question was again raised, the arguments adduced being twofold. In the first place, it was maintained that there is a general tendency in all human productions to require correction and amendment, and, secondly, that there were certain specific blemishes which it was asserted might be safely and easily removed. But the proposal was strenuously resisted on the ground that though the first statement may be freely admitted, it is not well in a time of controversies, and of the need of fighting greater evils, to run the risk of injuring where improvement is sought. "The fit time for alteration," said Bishop Wilberforce, in his charge of 1860, "the fit hands for altering the model after which the change will be fashioned, the amount of good which can be gained, as set against the amount of evil which may be incurred, each and all of these must be separately and minutely weighed, before a man of understanding will be ready to apply to any proposed alteration the general proposition, which he cannot dispute, that all the works and inventions of man are capable of improvement. A valuable and intricate piece of productive machinery may be capable of great improvements; but what wise man would suffer an engineer to interfere with its imperfect completeness until he was satisfied that the would-be improver comprehended the whole design of the constructor, and could weigh all the difficulties, and grasp all the capacities, and provide for all the necessities of the instrument he sought to make more perfect? A well within a besieged fortress might unquestionably be made more valuable by a deeper sinking of its shaft, and yet a wise general would not allow the improvement to be attempted at a time when the life of the garrison depended on, and could be maintained by, the supply of water which was then to be obtained from it, and which must needs be for the time interrupted to carry out the desired improvement. Still less would he allow it, if there were the remotest risk of altogether losing the present supply, though it were but barely sufficient, or of letting in, perhaps, some unwholesome or unpalatable streams to poison its present sweetness, without the certainty of obtaining in its stead a spring at once as wholesome and more abundant."

The Bishop then goes on to apply his paragraph, and declares that the hands by which the alterations would have to be made, are not qualified as were those which settled our present Liturgy. "The problem which they had to solve was, how to maintain the old Catholic element, and yet to clear it of the accretions and corruptions by which, during centuries of superstition, it had been gradually overlaid, and its purity tarnished. This could be effected safely only by a rare combination in those who were to work the change of a loving reverence for the old truth, with a keen, clear-sighted view, and a resolute rejection of the newer corruptions. What a history is that of our present Reformation, with its great divine deeply trained in the old learning, and yet full of the new light of a recovered Gospel with its struggles, and its sorrows, and its checks—of the working out of this problem? Can we say that the present advocates of revision are men of this stamp? Do they man fest the deep knowledge of liturgical principle, the shrinking reverence for the old Catholic element, which would free their desire of eliminating evil from the certain ruin which would follow if haply men of a narrow, deceptious spirit were to obtain the maste when the work of revision were begun, as succeed in remodelling, according to the view, our great inheritance of primiti prayers?

"There is some risk in beginning alteration even when all have agreed beforehand who they shall stop, because the love of change grows by its indulgence. But this danger is definitely increased if there be no agreement to the limits of alteration, and if behind it moderate and somewhat impassive favour of changestand a sterner body, with deeper viections, ulterior ends, and a far more restless energy. And this is our condition. Behold the modern revisionist, who would change few obsolete expressions, render definite a few obscure rubrics, retrench a few redundancy and give us a better compacted, and, where is desired, a briefer office, stand men with other objects and far different claims. Alleg doctrinal purity, an accomplished reformation, such a cleansing of the Common Pray- as would cleanse out of the ministry of Church all who differ from their own view truth— these are the avowed intentions some; the desire, half hidden from themselv of more. There is no disguise or concealment to this. Both before, and since the Reform ation, the sacramental and anti-sacramen view has wrought strongly in the religious mind of England. It was a mighty anxious problem whether the tavourers these different views could be combined one Reformed Church, with articles and form laries free from dishonest ambiguity of c tion. This problem God gave to our fath the grace to solve. To a marvellous day the Church of England did combine all men of both sections of thought who pos seded any moderation of character. T struggle, indeed, was long, and often new but, upon the whole, the fusion was in happily accomplished, and a rare inherit of peace and purity was bequeathed to Eng Churchmen.

"This is exactly the character of which more ardent revisionists would deprive I. It is an easy process. It is but to take from the common document that which express the side of truth to which we are disinclined and the Catholic statement is transmuted i he confession of a sect. This is all that is asked of us. Only let us alter the language of the formularies of baptism, absolution, and ordination, and we shall remove occasions of misconception; only let us make, that is, the common document sufficiently one-sided to peak none but our own views."

Revivals of Religion.—The word "revival" in a religious sense is used to signify a movement in the Church which results in the thickening of religious feeling. Such events have undoubtedly occurred both in ancient and modern times. Thus Elijah, when "he stooped the altar of the Lord, which was broken down," symbolised thereby that he came as the great reviver of religion when it was ready to die. The work of the Prophets was of a like character. St. Peter in his first sermon on the day of Pentecost addressed the Jews in a language that implied that Christ Himself had come to revive in their hearts the religion of their fathers, to complete and not to destroy it. The history of Christianity has furnished marked epochs of a revival of religious life. Such, in spite of all doubts and errors, were the Benedictine and Cluniacen movements, and the Crusades; such the zeal of the Mendicant Friars and the Reformation. The Methodist movement of the last century, known by the name of "The Great Awakening," influenced the whole of England, Scotland, Ireland, and America. The Evangelical zeal of the last century, and of the Tract writers in the recent, must be recognised as religious revivals. Mistakes are made, and much is said and done of which religious men on this side and that disapprove; but where there is genuine zeal for the souls of men and their well-being, it is always seen, when the din of controversy has died away, that good has been wrought and the kingdom of the Redeemer advanced. The most prominent of more recent revival movements has been that promoted on several successive occasions by the visits of Mr. Daniel Moody and Mr. Ira Sankey, two American evangelists, in which the distinct singing by the latter of hymns conveying simple truths of the Gospel—or that they considered to be such—formed a nature as prominent as the homely addresses of Mr. Moody. The testimony adduced on sides to the great practical results of these services must be to any but prejudiced minds evidence of the real use and occasional need for such so-called revivals. Many doubtless lapse; but many more do not, and have testified by the consistent conduct of years to the blessing they had gained. It has, however, been felt and expressed by many of late at there is a danger in the so-called "un-renominal" character of such services as those now referred to, though these may have been excuses for it in the neglect of express angelistic effort by the various organised Churches. In some cases it has led to a development of Plymouth Brethrenism; but, apart from this, it has been felt that such movements often fail to provide subsequent responsible oversight and care for the new converts, and that it is better every way for the Churches themselves to undertake revival, or, strictly, evangelistic work. The Church of England has felt this very strongly, and has latterly introduced what are called "mission" services, with special preachers, often called "missioners," who make periodical visitations to parishes, by arrangement, with a view to stirring up religious life among the inhabitants. These are in reality revival movements and services under another name. Other denominations have, to a smaller extent, done the same thing, and this awakening of the Churches to their own duty seems gathering in force.

Reynolds, Edward, Bishop of Norwich, was born at Southampton in 1599, and educated at Merton College, Oxford, of which he became a Probation Fellow in 1620. On his ordination he became Preacher of Lincoln's Inn, and Rector of Braynton in Northamptonshire. He was a prominent member of the Presbyterian party, and one of the Westminster Assembly. On the ejection of Dr. Fell from Oxford in 1646, Dr. Reynolds became Vice-Chancellor of the University, and afterwards Dean of Christ Church. However, he opposed the zealots, and was ejected from the deanery by the Independents. He then became Vicar of St. Lawrence Jewry. At the Restoration he was appointed chaplain to King Charles, and Warden of Merton College. When the Bishopric of Norwich was offered him, it was much doubted whether he would take it; but he at last consented, and was consecrated, Jan. 6th, 1661. He ruled the diocese for sixteen years, working hard to improve the condition of the poorer clergy. He was present at the Savoy Conference in 1661, and composed the "General Thanksgiving," which was then inserted. He died in 1676.

Reynolds, John, D.D. [sometimes written Rainolds] (b. at Pinno, Devonshire, 1549; d. at Oxford, 1617], a Puritan divine. For a short time he was Dean of Lincoln, and then was chosen President of Corpus Christi, Oxford. He was one of the four Puritans who represented their party at the Hampton Court Conference [q.v.], and is said to have been the first to propose the present Authorised Version of the Bible, to which he contributed the greater part of the Prophets.

Richard of St. Victor was born in Scotland in the twelfth century, and became prior of the Augustinian abbey of St. Victor, in Paris, in 1162. He wrote several moral, theological, and mystical works, as De Status Interioris Hominis, De Eruditione Interioris Hominis, De Verbo Incarnato, De Trinitate, De Emmanuelle, and De Gratia Contemplationis.

Richelieu, Armand Jean du Plessis, Cardinal, Duke de, was born at Paris in 1555. He was educated for a military career, but his brother, the Bishop of Luçon, giving up his See and entering a convent, Armand was looked upon as his successor. He therefore applied himself to the study of divinity, took his Doctor's degree, and was consecrated Bishop in 1607. He gained the favour of Marie de' Medici, mother of King Louis XIII., and became her Almoner; but on a quarrel breaking out between Marie and her son, Richelieu was banished to his diocese. He afterwards arranged a reconciliation between them, and gained influence over both. He was made a Cardinal in 1622, and in 1624 gained a seat in the Council, and became Prime Minister of France. His three great objects throughout his Ministerial career were [1] to render the power of the Crown absolute, and to humble the feudal nobility; [2] to annihilate the Huguenots as a political party; [3] to reduce the power of the House of Austria, both in its German and Spanish branches, and to extend that of France. In order to gain the latter object he assisted the Protestant Grisons against the Roman Catholic insurgents of Valtellina, while in France he was doing his utmost against the Huguenots, thus showing that he cared much more about their politics than their religion. Richelieu's death, which took place at Paris in 1642, caused much rejoicing to the people, on account of the burdens which he had laid upon them. He was buried in a mausoleum erected by Girardon in the church of the Sorbonne.

Richmond, Legu, the author of The Annals of the Poor [b. 1772, d. 1827], having graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, became Curate in the Isle of Wight, and in 1805 Rector of Turvey in Bedfordshire. One of his Annals, namely The Dairyman's Daughter, was at one time the most popular religious work in existence. Besides the work above mentioned he wrote Domestic Portraiture, and edited The Fathers of the English Church, or a Selection from the Writings of the Reformers and Early Protestant Divines of the Church of England, with Memorials of their Lives and Writings.

Ridley, Nicholas, Bishop of London, one of the most learned fathers of the Reformation, was born of good family at Willymmondwhyke, in Northumberland, in 1500. At the expense of his uncle, Dr. Robert Ridley, he was sent to Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, having received his early education at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. His progress in learning was rapid, and raised him to high repute, not only in his own university, but in that of Oxford, where he was invited to accept an honourable and profitable appointment, which, however, he declined. With a view to his further improvement his uncle enabled him to travel abroad and study foreign universities. After three years spent in travel he returned to Cambridge, and devoted himself to the study of divinity, and to the reading of the Scriptures in their original languages. In a walk in the orchard of Pembroke Hall, which is to this day called "Ridley Walk," he learned to repeat without book almost all the epistles in Greek. Of the study Ridley himself speaks, in the affectionate farewell which he wrote to his friends just before his death: "Though in time I may forget much of them again, yet the sweet smell thereof I trust I shall carry with me into heaven, and the profit thereof I have in all my life hitherto." He was Seni Proctor when the point of the Pope's rig of universal dominion in Church and State was examined upon the authority of Scripture and he signed the resolution which declares "That the Bishop of Rome had no more authority or jurisdiction, derived to him from God, in this kingdom of England than a foreign bishop." His uncle died 1536, but his great learning and ability procured for him the patronage of Cranmer, who made him his Chaplain, and presented him to the vicarage of Hurne, in East Kent. After about two years at Herne, he was chosen Master of Pembroke Hall, and appointed Chaplain to Henry VIII. He obtained a prebendal stall in Canterbury Cathedral and was considered, next to Cranmer, the greatest support of the Reformation among the clergy. In 1547 Edward VI. made him Bishop of Rochester, and in 1550 translated him to London. It is said that his preaching on charity before Edward VI. so moved King that it induced him to found the institutions—one for the sick and another for such as were wickedly idle, mad, and a third for the education of poor children. His Majesty endowed St. Barthowmew's Hospital for the first, Bridewell for the second, and Christ's Hospital (the Blue Coat School) for the third.

Ridley assisted Cranmer in the first edition of the Common Prayer, published in 1549, and his treatises on questions then in dispute were many and valuable. On the accession of Mary, Ridley, together with Cranmer a Latimer, was sent to the Tower. Here they lay all the winter of 1553; but it being solved to hold a public disputation with Protestant divines, they were in the following spring removed to Oxford, and though they were shortly to be called upon to defend their views, they were denied the assistance of the books and even the use of pen, ink, a paper. After their first examination they were separated from each other.

In 1555 a commission was issued to seve bishops to proceed still further against Latin and Ridley, who were brought before commissioners for examination on the last day of September and again on October 1st. Notwithstanding all the persuasions and threats of their enemies, they continued steadfast in the profession of that faith which they had received as the faith of Christ; they were accordingly judged to be obstinate heretics, sentenced to be degraded from all offices in the Church, and delivered over to the magistrates to be punished. On October 5th, Dr. Brooke, Bishop of Gloucester, with the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford, and many other heads of the university, came to the house of Mr. Irish, then Mayor of Oxford, where Ridley was confined, for the purpose of degrading him from the dignity of priesthood. He was again exhorted to return to the faith of the Roman Church and submit to the authority of the Pope; but, on his refusal, they began the ceremony of taking off the cap and putting on a surplice upon him. They then brought the chalice and the host, and desired him to hold them in his hands; he said, "They shall not come into my hands; if they do, they shall fall to the ground for all me." Upon this, some one was appointed to hold them in his hand, and Dr. Brooke said in Latin, "We do take from thee the office of preaching the Gospel." At these words Ridley sighed deeply, looked up towards heaven, and said, "O Lord God, give them this their wickedness." This remonancy being ended, Ridley said, "If you have done, give me leave to talk with you a little concerning these matters," Brooke answered, "We may not talk with you, you are out of the Church." Then Ridley said, Since you will not talk with me, nor will you be safe to hear me, what remedy but silence, and I refer my cause to my heavenly Father, who will reform things that be amiss in them shall please Him." As they were going, Ridley said, "My lord, I wish that our lordship would vouchsafe to read over a little book of Bertram's concerning the Sacrament; you will find therein much good learning if you will read it with an indifferent judgment." To this Brooke made no answer, it was going away, when Ridley said, Well, as it is to no purpose, I will say no more; I will talk of worldly affairs." He then entreated Dr. Brooke to interest himself with the Queen on behalf of a great many men to whom he had granted leases while he was Bishop of London, which had been taken away from them by Bonner, who had succeeded him in the bishopric. On behalf of these Ridley wrote a supplication to the queen, wherein he prayed her Majesty that they might be restored to their possessions, if this request could not be granted, that their loss might be made up by the sale of their plate and other effects which he had in his house at the time of his imprisonment. He also further besought the Queen to take under her protection his sister and her husband, who, with three children, had been dependent upon him. For their support he had made a small provision, which Bonner had deprived them of, notwithstanding the great kindness which Ridley had shown to Bonner's mother and sister. This supplication Ridley delivered to his brother-in-law to present to the Queen, requesting Dr. Brooke to second it with his support, which he promised to do, and then formally delivered Ridley to the bailiffs, charging them to bring him to the place of execution when they were commanded. The same evening, being the night before he suffered, as he sat at supper, he bade his hostess and the rest at board to his "marriage," as he termed his death, which he believed would admit him to the marriage supper of the Lamb. At this conversation Mrs. Irish wept; but Ridley comforted her, and said, "Oh, Mrs. Irish, quiet yourself; though my breakfast be somewhat sharp and painful, yet am I sure my supper shall be more pleasant and sweet." When they arose from table, his brother offered to watch all night with him; but he said, "No, that you shall not, for I intend (God willing) to go to bed and to sleep as quietly to-night as ever I did in my life." His brother then departed, exhorting him to be of good cheer and to take his cross quietly, for the reward was great.

The place appointed for the burning of Ridley and Latimer was on the north side of Oxford, close to Balliol College. Hither, on Oct. 16th, 1555, the prisoners were brought by the Mayor and bailiffs. Ridley was dressed in a black gown, furred and faced with ermine, such as he used to wear when he was a bishop. He also had a tippet furred about his neck, a velvet night-cap upon his head, with a corner cap upon the same. He walked to the stake in slippers between the Mayor and Aldermen. The aged Latimer followed. When they were come to the stake, Ridley, earnestly holding up both his hands, looked towards heaven. Then seeing Latimer, with a cheerful look he ran to him, embraced and kissed him, saying, "Be of good heart, brother, for God will either assuage the fury of the flame or else strengthen us to abide it." He then went to the stake, kissed it, kneeled down by it and earnestly prayed; beside him kneeled Latimer, likewise earnestly calling upon God. Ridley took his gown and tippet, and gave them to his brother-in-law, who had affectionately remained at Oxford the whole time of his imprisonment, to provide him necessaries; some other of his apparel he also gave away, the rest the bailiffs took. He made presents also of some other small things to gentlemen who were standing by weeping. Then, being in his shirt, he stood upon the stone by the stake, and held up his hands and said, "O heavenly Father, I give unto Thee most hearty thanks, for that Thou hast called me to be a professor of Thee even unto

In 1485 it was ordained in the Roman Pontifical, published at Venice, that henceforth the right hand and the left should be taken from the crucifix on the altar, and not from the position of the officiating priest, which arrangement the old direction was versed.

Rigorists.—A small section of the Jansenists [q.v.] were contemptuously given the name by their opposers on account of stern rules and severe discipline practised them. It was particularly applied to the Jansenists who lived in the Spanish Netherlands.

Ring [in matrimony].—The custom placing a ring on the bride's hand after vows are taken in the Marriage Service is very ancient, though by the early Christians it appears that it was employed in the ceremony of esposual, and not at the marriage itself. In the Marriage Service the ring said to be "a token and pledge" of promises which have just been made; and has also been considered as a type of the dowment of the wife with her husband worldly goods, and of her admittance to closest confidence. The ring is made of gold to symbolise truth and constancy; and is placed upon the third finger of the left hand, for three reasons:—[1] It was formerly believed that a vein came direct from the heart to that finger; [2] this finger being little used, the ring was less likely to wear out; and [3] there was an ancient ceremony connected with the placing of it. The bridegroom puts it successively on the bride's thumb, first second fingers, saying, "In the name of Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, then he left it on her third finger, say "Amen." The extreme antiquity of custom caused it to be generally accepted among Christians, though for some time the Reformation it was regarded with some suspicion by the stricter Protestants, as being superstitious and Popish. Jeremy Tayl Sermon on the Marriage Ring is one of his most famous works of the illustrous preachers.

Ripidia were fans used in the Church to keep away flies and dust. Liturgy of St. Chrysostom directs that deacon shall use a fan to preserve the clergy upon the altar from all impurities, and, if there is no fan, the chalice-veil is to be used for the purpose.

Ripon, Bishops of.—In the year on the division of the great northern diocese Archbishop Theodore is said to have appointed one Eadred to a new bishopric at Ripon; he had no successors, and it was not till 1683 that it was reconstituted into a See, taken from the dioceses of York and Chester, comprising the important towns of Bradford, Halifax, Huddersfield, Leeds, and Wakefield. There have been three bishops—chdeacons, four canons, three minor canons, and eighteen honorary canons. The endowment of the See is £4,200 a year. The Venerable Bede is the first to mention a church at Ripon, said to have been erected by St. Wilfrid in the seventh century; but archaeologists differ in opinion as to whether the present structure occupies the same site, whether St. Wilfrid built a second church. It was originally the church of a monastery, of which the saint presided, and the crypt, known as "St. Wilfrid's Needle," is conceded without doubt to belong to his foundation. His abbey became one of the three great churches of Yorkshire, and the immunity of the site and the right of using the ordeal among the privileges granted to it by helstan. The church was rebuilt by Archbishop Roger of York [1154-81]; of this the small only remains in the choir and apse, but they form a valuable specimen of the Transition period. Archbishop Gray (15-65) added two western towers and rebuilt the façade which connects them. In 1280 the east end of the choir gave way and was rebuilt. In 1319 the Scots, during one of their incursions, set fire to it; a century later it suffered from a storm which shattered its lantern tower, but it was restored. At the close of the sixteenth century, again suffered by lightning. In 1642 it was declared to be unsafe, and portions were taken to ward off the danger; in 1681 it was put into the hands of Gilbert Scott, who carried out a complete restoration of the cathedral.

Rippon, John, D.D., Baptist minister at Tiverton, Devon, 1751; d. in London, 1816, for sixty-three years minister of a Baptist congregation in London. He is known as the editor of A Selection of Hymns, published in 1787, and afterwards enlarged; contains hymns by many authors, and is of the most important hymn-books in the English language. He edited the Hymns of Watts, and the Baptist Annual Register 1790 to 1802.

Rite [Lat. ritus] is a solemn form or prescribed office of religion. The title of the Book of Common Prayer speaks of "Rites and Ceremonies," the distinction between the being that a rite is an act of prescribed worship whether including ceremonies or not, and a ceremony is any part of religious worship which prescribes action, position, or assumption of any particular vestment.

Rituale.—The name given to the book containing the liturgy of the Roman Church, which is mainly for the use of the priests. It contains the services for baptism, penance, marriage, etc. It was drawn up during the twelfth century, to prevent any change or variation in the ritual of the services.

Ritualism.—Strictly speaking, a Ritualist is one who studies the history and character of the ancient rites of the Church, like Bingham, the author of the Ecclesiastical Antiquities. But the name of Ritualism is now given to the practical developments of the High Church views promulgated in the Tracts for the Times [Tractarianism], and in other writings of Pusey and Keble. Those views taught that the Sacraments were actual means of conveying grace, that Baptism conveys Regeneration, and that in the Eucharist Christ is verily and indeed present, though in a spiritual manner. The use of new ritual in the Church of England, which sprang up almost suddenly about the year 1859, was the assertion of these views by visible symbolism. No new doctrine was advanced, but the doctrines which had hitherto been taught to the ear were now sought to be inculcated through the eye.

There are, however, two distinct elements to be traced in the Ritualistic movement. One is the aesthetic. A great wave of antiquarian, artistic, architectural feeling has passed over Europe. Partly this was a reaction against the French Revolution; in our own country it was against the Whiggism of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. The revival of Gothic architecture, strange to say, was largely owing to a Quaker, Rickman, but it has been strong and continuous. Thousands of new churches have arisen beautiful of form, and in which music has been cultivated to a degree which would have struck our forefathers, with their trombones and Tato and Brady Psalms, with astonishment. In Presbyterian Scotland the change has been no less wonderful. Glasgow Cathedral is filled with stained glass, and many churches have organs, which once were considered the special mark of the Beast. The other element is the sacerdotal doctrine. The adoption of special vestments marks a conviction on the part of the adopters that the doctrine of the Sacraments is at one with that of the Church of Rome, so far as regards real efficacy in them, and a special presence of Christ. It is said by its advocates, "There is no evil in approximating to Rome or to any other Christian body; whatever promotes Unity is good and not bad. It is true that there have been those who held the Pope to be Antichrist, but this is not the doctrine of the Church of England or of educated men. We will, so far as we can, assert our points of union. There is in every religious ceremonial a dramatic element—the breaking of the bread and the pouring out of the wine is such; therefore we do right to attach importance to the teaching of the eye." Thus it is matter of fact that our generation has seen the introduction into public worship of practices, some of which have not been in use since the days of Elizabeth, the alleged ground for the renewal being that the Church has suffered and lost ground through their disuse. These practices, known as the "Six Points," are:—[1] the use of Coloured [or White] Vestments; [2] Lights on the Lord's Table; [3] the Mixed Chalice; [4] Unleavened Bread; [5] the Eastward Position; [6] Incense. [Each is considered in its place.] In 1867 Dean Stanley wrote an article in the Edinburgh Review advocating the toleration of the Ritualists. "Alien," he wrote, "as many of their tenets are to the general spirit of their Church and nation, they have enough in common with the composite aspect of the formularies of the Church, and the double-sided character of the nation, to give them a standing-place in the eye at once of law and of charity. It must also be added that they have virtues of their own which supply a useful counterpoise to the narrowness or perverseness of other elements in the ecclesiastical world. In the earlier days of the movement they counted amongst their ranks lofty characters and noble deeds and persuasive words, which the English Church will not willingly let die. Amongst them are still to be found some endowed with ardent, self-denying activity; some gifted with a refined or fiery eloquence, which redeem much that we condemn in their theory and their position, and which place them thus far on a level with the equally ardent and more successful leaders of the Wesleyan movement in former times, and with those numerous clergy in our own time who need no stimulant from party-spirit, or from sectarian zeal, to devote themselves to the unobtrusive performance of their Master's work. And we must remember that these High Church Dissenters are more amenable to the control of English law, to the softening effects of social and Christian intercourse, inside the National Church, than if they were cast out from it. By expelling them from it we should not divest ourselves of our responsibility in regard to them. We cannot burn them, as in the days of Mary; we cannot hang them, as in the days of Elizabeth; we cannot banish them, as in the days of Charles I. or Cromwell. By driving them to extremities we might perpetuate the evil for generations. If they became a separate sect, they would remain like other Nonconformists, with the additional extravagance which every isolated and exasperated sect is sure to take to itself. If they became Roman Catholics, they and those who are guided by them would be parted from the national interests and national sympathies by a gulf which it might take centuries to close. On the other hand, if they were allowed to retain their position within the Church, the fashion would probably pass away with the present generation, and their children and grandchildren would be the staunch Puritans or Liberals of the coming age; and even they themselves, judging by the changes which come over individuals and parties, would imperceptibly melt away into the adjacent shades of opinion, by which they are inextricably attached to the diverse, but still homogeneous body of the Established Clergy."

The counsel thus given was not followed. Before it was given, attempts had been made to put down Ritualism. An attack was made on some coloured altar cloths at Knigbridge, and the judgment in favour of the incumbent laid much stress on the OMENTS RUBRIC [q.v.], and, in consequence, around this rubric the controversies multiplied. The resumption of the vestments was evidently based upon the ground that they certainly in use "in the second year Edward VI.," and that the Rubric there sanctions them. In fact the Ritualists steadfastly affirmed that they were only reviving what Rubric sanctioned. Unhappily the troubes which arose were carried on extreme bitterness and even insolence, and when, in place of the toleration of opinion for which Stanley pleaded, prosecutions were set on foot, both parties were fierce in their animosities. The various judgments that were given were conflict: they were the Knightsbridge, in 1857; Mackonochie, in 1868; and the Purchas, in 1871. The Ritualists, acquiring boldness both the conflicting views which had been down, and also from the success which claimed to have had in drawing people to churches and in influencing large masses the population for good, refused to be bought by the judgments. Their opponents pointed out that the older fathers of the Tract movement had never adopted these practices. Dr. Pusey immediately came to their defence and declared that he and his friends always understood the Ornaments Rubric did the Ritualists, and were conscious themselves disobeying it, but that the said had to teach the faith to a generation, and therefore they left it for successors to revive. Two societies sprang up: the English Church Union, to defend the Rubric as the Ritualists under it; and the Church Association, to point out what their opponents understood as the testantism of the Church of England anxiety to bring about a uniformity of trice, Archbishop Tait brought in the Worship Regulation Act in 1874, an FOLKSTONE JUDGMENT [q.v.], in 1877, the Act was almost entirely against Ritualism. The abdication of this decision by the whole body of the High Church party led to an endeavour of the Archbishop to revise ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS [q.v.]. A Act has been made, but has never been enacted by Parliament. Meanwhile peace has great extent returned. Archbishop Tait himself, in at least a dozen cases, prevented seclusions by the exercise of the veto. the Act gives, and his example has almost universally followed by the bi.... Robertson, Frederick William, a mous English preacher, was born in London 1 Feb. 3rd, 1816. At the age of nine he was ut to the grammar school of Beverley, in yorkshire, where he remained till his parents moved to Tours. He attended a French minory while he was abroad, and returned to England with his father on the breaking of the Revolution in 1830. He attended Edinburgh Academy for a year, and then reoved to the University. In 1833 he was ti cted to a solicitor, but the work was ungenial to him, and his health broke down. He was then arranged that he should enter the minstry, but he waited in vain for a commission, and finally, in 1836, entered Brasenose College, Oxford, in order to study for the Church. He took a great interest in the debates at the University, but the chief influence on his life here was that wrought by the writings of Arnold Wordsworth. He was ordained in 1840, and was appointed curate to St. Maurice and Mary Calendar in Winchester; but his alth broke down in the course of a year, and he was obliged to go abroad. On his return, in 1842, he became curate of Christ Church, Cheltenham. In 1846, whilst in the veld, occurred a great struggle in his mind, a result of which was that his views, which had previously been strongly Evangelical, came very "Broad," as it is popularly termed; and he manifested a peculiar animosity against the Evangelical party ever since. On his return to England he signed his appointment at Cheltenham, and early in 1849 went to St. Ebb's, Oxford, where he was just beginning to attract attention of the undergraduates, when he moved to Trinity Chapel, Brighton. Here he continued to work for exactly six years, and on the anniversary of his arrival there, August 15th, 1853. He was chiefly noted for his sermons, and for the lectures he gave for the benefit of the working men. The chief charm of these lay in the delicacy and strength of thought, poetical beauty, and homely lucidity of speech. He was at one time of his life grossly misunderstood and considered as unorthodox, owing partly to his rejection of what is commonly called the prophetic view of the dispensation, and partly to his constant recog nition of the "soul of good in things evil," a favorite phrase in his sermons; but his death greatly widened his influence. He published one of his sermons, but four volumes of them were prepared from reports which he had taken after they had been preached, or in his notes, some of them being merely skeletons, which were largely amplified in actual delivery. These ran through many editions, and were followed by others, including Notes on Genesis and on The First Epistle to the Corinthians, the last being The Human Race, and other Sermons, published in 1881. His Life and Letters have also been published, written and edited by the Rev. Stopford Brooke.

Robertson, James Craigie [b. 1813, d. 1882], Canon of Canterbury, and Pro- fessor of Ecclesiastical History at King's College, London, wrote several works on that subject, as How shall we Conform to the Liturgy of the Church of England? [1843], History of the Christian Church to the Reformation [1853- 73], Sketches of Church History [1855-78], Biography of Thomas Becket [1859], and Plain Lectures on the Growth of the Papal Power [1876]. His Church History is now regarded as the standard work on the subject.

Robertson, William.—An eminent Scot tish historian and controversialist [b. 1721, d. 1793]. Little is known of his early life, but he was a volunteer in the '45; four years after, he received his licence to preach, and became minister of the Old Greyfriars in Edinburgh in 1758. Next year he published his history of Scotland, in 1769, that of Charles V., and in 1777, of America. He was made one of the King's Chaplains in 1761, and Principal of the University in 1762. In 1751 he appeared on the General Assembly, and was soon recognised as the leader of the "Moderates" in the great Patronage Contro versy which was then going on [Secessionists], a position which he held for many years. He retired into private life in 1780, living in a country house thenceforward till his death. He proved how faithful he remained to his moderate principles, by pleading in the year of his retirement for relaxation of the penal statutes against the Roman Catholics. For this he incurred great odium, and his house was attacked by the mob.

Another curious controversy in which he was engaged arose out of Home's once famous tragedy of Douglas. Home was a minister, and a great outcry was made both against him and against some of the ministers who went to see the play performed in Edinburgh. So fierce was the storm that Home resigned his pastoral charge. Carlyle, one of the Edinburgh ministers, was suspended by his Presbytery, and appealed to the Synod, which reversed the suspension; but by a majority of three carried a sentence of "admonition." From the Synod the case was carried to the Assembly, when Robertson stood forth as Carlyle's defender and the advocate of liberty, and the judgment of the Synod was confirmed by 117 to 39. During the sitting of the General Assembly, Mrs. Siddons was acting in Edinburgh, and the business had to be arranged so that unimportant matters should be taken on her days, as the younger clergy all went to see her. Robertson was much admired as a preacher in his day, but is better remembered now as the historian, the liberal theologian, and the friend of Hume. His histories have been superseded, owing to the immense stores of knowledge which have been opened since his time, but his dignity, learning, and grasp of his subject merit the highest praise.

Robinson, Edward, D.D., LL.D., Biblical scholar and explorer of the Holy Land [b. at Southington, Connecticut, April 10th, 1794; d. at New York, Jan. 27th, 1863]. He first studied law; then in 1821 entered a theological seminary. In 1826 he came to Europe, studied at Göttingen, Berlin, and Halle, and returned in 1830 to his native country; became Biblical Professor, and published several works elucidating sacred history and literature. His Dictionary of the Bible and Greek and English Lexicon are much used by students. He was obliged to resign his professorship in 1833 on account of ill-health, after which he published a new edition of Newcome's Harmony of the Gospels, and in 1837 made a voyage to the Holy Land, for the purpose of study and exploration, returning to Berlin in 1838. He spent two years in writing Biblical Researches in Palestine, Mount Sinait, and Arabia Petraea, which appeared in several editions, and permanently established his reputation as a Biblical scholar. After the publication of this work, he again took up his professorship at Andover, which he held till his death. In 1851 he made another visit to Palestine, and again to Europe in 1862. Besides the works above mentioned, Robinson assisted Professor Stuart in editing a Hebrew grammar, and wrote a Physical Geography of the Holy Land.

Robinson, John [b. 1575, d. 1625].—The minister of the Independent Church in Holland from which departed the earliest settlers of New England. He was a native of Lincolnshire, and educated at Benet’s (Corpus Christi) College, Cambridge—a college then much inclined to Puritanism. He gained a Fellowship after taking his degree, and was ordained to a charge in the diocese of Norwich; but his Puritan convictions deepening, he left the Church in 1604, and became pastor of a small Independent congregation. To enjoy the religious liberty then only to be found in the Dutch Republic, these endeavoured to leave England in 1607 for Holland, but were prevented by the authorities. Another attempt, in 1608, was, however, successful, and they reached Amsterdam and afterwards Leyden. How a little band from this settlement started, in 1620, for America, is told in the article upon the Pilgrim Fathers, Robinson remaining behind with the intention of following with the rest when the way should be cleared; but this intention was frustrated by his death in 1625. Robinson was a man of great intelligence and candour, and, though a st. Puritan and thorough Independent, was liberal and tolerant, and on various occasions after secession communicated with the Episcopalians. He published A Defence of the Brownian Justification of the Separation from the Church of England; People’s Plea for the Exercise Prophecying [1618]; Essays, Moral and Div. [1618]. One passage uttered by John Rob- son has become historical, and has been quoted times without number by men widely different schools of thought. It was his memorable address to the emigrants at close of their last solemn religious service, the eve of their departure for the New World. He said, “If God reveal anything to you any other instrument of His, be as ready to receive it as ever you were to receive a truth by my ministry; for I am verily sauced—I am very confident—that the Lord has more truth yet to break forth out of Holy Word. For my part I cannot suffer a bawl the condition of the Reformed Church who are come to a period in religion, and go at present no further than the instrument of their reformation. The Lutherans can be drawn to go beyond what Luther is whatever part of His will our good God revealed to Calvin, they will rather die to embrace it. And the Calvinists, you see, fast where they were left by that great man God, who yet saw not all things.”

Robinson, Robert, an eminent Bay minister, was born at Swaffham, in Norfolk, Jan., 1735. He attended a grammar school till 1749, when he was apprenticed to a hatter. He rose early to continue his studies and his master, noticing his gifts, caused his indentures before the time. Robinson first belonged to the Calvinistic Method, but left the society, and in 1750 he became a Baptist minister to a congregation in Cambridge. His sermons were very popular and became the fashion for undergraduates to attend his services. He died while making a visit to Dr. Priestley, at Birmingham, 1790. His chief work was History of B asin, published after his death. He also wrote Ecclesiastical Researches, translated Saun- sermons, and published some of his o... Roch, Sr., the son of a gentleman Languedoc, was born at Montpellier at the end of the thirteenth century. His mother was a lady, said to have found the mark of a red cross on her breast when a child, and arguing from that that her life to be of sanctity, she took the greatest pains that his education should be fitting to s.../
er the management of it to an uncle, and out as a pilgrim, begging his way to me. Passing through the town of Aquadente, in Tuscany, he found that the plague was raging fiercely, and immediately cried his services to the Governor of the hospital. When the town was free of the terrors he moved to another town which was afflicted in the same manner, and devoted himself to nursing and caring for the victims—"to all appearance almost miraculously saved from risk of infection. He spent three years at Rome, and then journeyed through Lombardy. At Piacenza he was himself at length stricken with the plague, and in the deathly and infectious disease from which he was suffering, nursed him most tenderly. When Roch got well he persuaded him to give up the world and dedicate himself to the religious life. He then returned to France, and died there Aug. 17th, 1327, was buried in his native town; but in 1515 his body was removed to Venice, where, consequence of the great veneration in which his name was held, a large church was built for the reception of his relics.

Rochester, Bishops of.—This See was established by King Ethelbert and St. rustine, the first Archbishop of Canterbury, the year 604, at the same time with the establishment of that of London. The sees of Rochester seem originally to have been a position somewhat similar to that of the suffragans to the Archbishops of Canterbury, and with a small fixed diocese also assigned them, somewhat irregularly distributed in west of Kent. In 1840 a great change made in consequence of the vast increase of the Metropolis, and the counties of Hertford and Essex, with some small exceptions he latter case, were formed into a new diocese of Rochester, only the district around cathedral city being retained for it in the city of Kent. By still more recent legislation, the two counties north of the Thames were formed into the Diocese of St. Albans, a new Diocese of Rochester was again formed, which embraced the district and the cathedral city, together with the Lambeth or Metropolitan portion of the county of Surrey, which was taken from the Diocese of Winchester. It has thus become a populous diocesan diocese, extending along the Thames from Woolwich to Kingston, and running southward to the border of Sussex, containing also detached portions at mouth of the Thames and the Medway from Rochester to Gravesend.

The endowment of the See of Rochester amounts to £3,000 a-year.

Bede says that a cathedral was built by King Ethelbert at the foundation of the bishopric in A.D. 604, and dedicated in the name of St. Andrew. Of this cathedral there is no further notice until the Conquest, when it is stated to have been in ruins. It was rebuilt by Bishops Gundulf, Ermulf, and John of Canterbury, between 1077 and 1130 (when it became the church of a Benedictine monastery), and was consecrated four days after the consecration of Canterbury Cathedral on Ascension Day, May 11th, 1130, in the presence of Henry I. and most of the Bishops of England.

In 1137 and 1139 great fires occurred in the cathedral, which necessitated a partial rebuiding. A new choir was constructed early in the thirteenth century, and the church was so much renewed that it was reconsecrated in 1240. In the next century much destruction occurred during the siege of Rochester by Simon de Montfort, whose troops turned the nave into a stable; but it was fully restored by Bishop Haymo de Hythe in the first half of the fourteenth century, when the central tower was erected, the upper part of which was rebuilt in 1749. Between 1871 and the present time very effective works of restoration have been going on, which have substantially secured the fabric for many generations to come.

The general aspect of the cathedral from the west end is that of a Norman church passing into Early English, with Early English transept and choir, and many Decorated and Perpendicular additions. It is rich in tombs, including that of Bishop Walter de Morton, etc., etc., and the pavement was once full of brasses, destroyed during the domination of the Puritans.

The cathedral foundation consists of a dean, four canons, three archdeacon's, twenty-four honorary canons, and three minor canons.

Rochet.—A short surplice of lawn, with sleeves, worn by bishops under the chimere. It does not appear to have been worn before the thirteenth century, but at a later time it was customary for a bishop always to wear his rochet in public. The sleeves were at first tighter than those now worn. In modern times it has become usual to have the sleeves attached to the chimere, or black satin robe, instead of to the rochet, to which they properly belong.

Rock, Daniel [b. 1799, d. 1871].—A Roman Catholic, who was educated in the English College at Rome; he returned to England, and became Chaplain to the Earl of Shrewsbury in 1829, Pastor at Buckland in 1840, and Canon of Southwark in 1852. He wrote Hieringia, or the Sacrifitce of the Mass Expounded, Did the Early Church in England Acknowledge the Pope's Supremacy? and The Church of Our Fathers.

Rogation Days [from Latin rogare, "to ask or beseech"].—The name given to the three days which precede Ascension Day, which have been set aside in the Church as days of fasting and supplication for God's special blessing on the fruits of the earth. It was formerly the custom to have public processions on these days, while litanies were sung, rogatio in Latin being equivalent to the Greek word litaneia. This seems to have originated with Mamertus, Bishop of Vienne, in 450, when the city was greatly injured by earthquakes; it became an annual observance in the diocese, and other bishops followed his example. The keeping of the Rogation Days was enjoined by the Council of Orleans in 511, and in England at that of Cloveshoo, in 747. They were received at Rome till the time of Leo I [795]. There were services for them in old missals. In the Roman Church Litany of the Saints is ordered to be recited which is called the Lesser Litany to distinguish it from that chanted on St. Mark's Day. There is no other or even collect in English Prayer Book for these days, among the homilies there is a special one the Rogation Days. Hymns Ancient Modern provides two special hymns and metrical litany for use at this season.

Rogation Sunday.—The fifth Sun after Easter, so called from the three days which follow.

Rogers, Henry [b. 1806, d. 1877].—Independent minister, who was Professor of English Language and Literature at Univer. College, London [1839] : Professor of Philosophy at the Independent College at Birmingham; and in 1853 became Principal Manchester Independent College. He was the Eclipse of Faith, Lives of John H. Jonathan Edwards, and Thomas Fuller, The Superhuman Origin of the Bible Itself, and many articles and essays, was strongly Anti-Tractarian, and also A Rationalistic, the Eclipse of Faith showing its courtesy to any of the Neologian theories. immediate cause of its being written was publication, by one who had been a clergyman of a sceptical volume called the Nemesis of E.

Rogers, John, a Protestant martyr, born at Birmingham about 1500, educated at Cambridge and Oxford, and in 1535 be pastor at Antwerp. Here he became aquainted with Tyndall and Coverdale, and joined Reformed Church. He afterwards issued a translation of the Bible known as Math Bible. [Bible.] He removed from Antwerp to Wittenberg, where he remained till accession of Edward VI., when he returned to England, and soon after received a prebend at St. Paul's. On the accession of Queen : he strongly denounced Romanism, on which he was seized, and, having suffered months' imprisonment, was burned at St. Feld, Feb. 4th, 1555.

Rolloch, Robert, the first Principal the Edinburgh University, was born Stirling in 1555. He was educated at and in 1574 joined the College of St. Salv in St. Andrews, where he became verctorate with Dr. Andrew Melville. In Lawson founded Edinburgh University Rolloch was called upon to act as Regent 1586 he was appointed Principal, and in the next year Professor of Divinity. In 1587 acted as Moderator in the General Assembly at Dundee. He died in 1598, at Edinbu Rolloch's chief theological works are Effecctual Calling, On God's Covenant and the Sacraments, On Providence, Excommunic and Justification. He also wrote commentaries on the Epistle to the Romans, on select salms, Daniel, St. John's Gospel, Ephesians, alatians, Colossians, Thessalonians, and Hebrews.

Romaine, William, a celebrated Evangelical preacher, the son of a poor Akerlan, a refugee, and one of the victims of the dict of Nantes, was born at Hartlepool, Sept. 5th, 1714. He was educated primarily at school founded by Bernard Gilpin, the great postle of the North in the days of Queen Mary. Later on he entered Christ Church, xford, and soon distinguished himself there, he was naturally slovenly in his dress, and it said that a gentleman seeing him pass him the quadrangle one day, asked, "Who is that slovenly fellow?" His friend replied, That slovenly fellow is one of the first emisses of the university, and will probably one of the brightest ornaments of literature the present age." Romaine at first associated with a party in the university who opposed Newton's generally received philosophy, and studied the writings of Moses siduously, professing to find in them a complete system of philosophical as well as evangelical truth. He entered the Church when twenty-three years of age, and his first curacy was at Hereford. After some ears spent in different parts of the coun- try, where he made no small stir by his eminent sermons, he determined to come London, where, it is said, he hoped to at- tect more notice. He was doomed to ex- pense, however, and found himself neglected, unnoticed, and without a church. At last was actually on his way to the lip, intending to leave England, when a colleague was so struck by the likeness to his father, whom he had known well some ears before, that he asked him if his name were "Romaine." This question led to the full history of his present distress, and his ther's old friend persuaded him to give up a intention of leaving England. Eventu- ly this same friend, who had come across a path in such a strangely opportune way, as the means of securing him the lectur- ep of St. George's, Botolph Lane, which he id for many years; and later on, when views had become thoroughly Evangelical, d his preaching had been marked with the vast success, he was also appointed Lec- rier at St. Dunstan's. On being dismissed the Rector of St. George's, who disliked the crowds who flocked to hear him each, Romaine was hospitably treated Lady Huntingdon, who allowed him to each to rich and poor in her own house, then prevented by the Rector of St. Dun- n's from entering the church to preach at usual hours to the immense crowds so always assembled regularly to hear him, so happened that Dr. Terrick, the Bishop of London, was one day passing by the church, and hearing the cause of such a scene in the streets, he ordered that Romaine should be allowed by the Rector to preach at the ordinary hour, and that the doors of the church should be opened also carrier, so as to avoid the crushing and crowding. This interference of the Bishop on his behalf put an end to the system of opposition which he had so meekly and patiently endured so long. His style in preaching was simple, plain, eloquent, and marked by a touching earnestness. In 1757 he obtained a preacher- ship at St. Bartholomew the Great, Smith- field, and in 1776 was chosen by the parishioners Rector of St. Andrew Wardrobe and St. Anne, Blackfriars—an office he held till his death. His habit of living was simple and regular in the extreme, which tended to give him such a long and healthy life. He died at the age of eighty-one, on July 26th, 1795.

Rome, Church of.—The very extent and influence of this vast Church, and the fact that it is the historical parent of all Western communions—as much so of those who most dissent from it as of the others—have made it necessary to treat various branches of the subject so extensively elsewhere under various headings, that less is needed in this place than has been devoted to other denominations of far less importance. The foundation of this Church is uncertain, but we know that when St. Paul wrote his Epistle to the Romans he had not yet visited Rome, though he did so afterwards. St. Peter is said to have been the first Bishop, and tradition says that he was martyred there. The mighty importance of the City of Rome naturally gave its bishop a great position, but the fact that it became for a while the arbiter and ruler of all Christendom is the most remarkable fact in the history of Christianity. The causes of the great silent change will be found under the heading PAPAL POWER, GROWTH OF; and the list of Bishops, under POPEs; and the emancipation of a large part of Christendom, under REFORMATION. The controversy between Rome and Protestantism involves two main questions. In the first place, Protestants deny the authority of the Pope over them at all; and secondly, a large portion of the doctrine of the Roman Church is rejected as being a corruption of Apostolic Christianity. The Roman Church recognises seven Sacraments, viz. Baptism, Confirmation, the Holy Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Un- tion, Holy Orders, Matrimony. One of the chief characteristics of this religion is that of invoking help of the Virgin and the Saints. In defence, Roman Catholics say that they do no more than ask the prayers of those who, from their perfected state, must be more worthy to offer them than they; but in most books of devotion the prayers addressed to the Blessed Virgin and the Saints are such as Protestants consider it sinful to offer to any but God. The public service is in the Latin tongue, which has caused their opponents to say that they wish to keep the laity in the dark as to what they are doing. [LATTN, SERVICE IN.] With regard to all matters relating to faith, Roman Catholics draw a hard-and-fast line between what is of doctrine and what of discipline. Doctrine is what was taught by Christ and His Apostles; discipline, different rules laid down by the various Councils of the Church, and liable to change at any time. Since the Vatican Council of 1870, when Pius IX. put forth the doctrine of the Infallibility of the Pope, the utterances of the Pontiff have been taken as the groundwork of the faith and practice of the Church. There are various religious Orders both for men and women, who all are obliged to take the three vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience. Their work consists in superintending charitable institutions, such as asylums, orphanages, and hospitals, and some of the Orders have large schools attached to them. The number of Roman Catholics all over the world is about 220,000,000, those in Great Britain at the last census being 6,000,000. In England there is one Archbishop (Westminster) and sixteen Bishops; in Scotland, two Archbishops (Glasgow and St. Andrews) and four Bishops; in Ireland there are four Archbishops and twenty-three Bishops. The peculiar doctrines, practices, and terms of the Roman Church will all be found under their proper headings.

Romuald, St., the son of a nobleman of Ravenna, was born in 956. He spent his youth in a vain and frivolous way; but when he was twenty years of age, his father, Sergius, had a violent quarrel with one of his neighbours, which ended in a duel and the death of Sergius's adversary. Romuald, who had been compelled to witness the duel, was filled with such horror and remorse at his unwilling share in it, that he was convinced it could only be atoned for by his retirement from the world. At the end of seven years, spent in a most severe and austere manner, Romuald decided to put himself for a time under the tuition of Marinus, a hermit who lived near Venice—Peter Urselli, famed all over Italy for his learning and piety. While with him he brought to repentance the reigning Doge of Venice, who had been guilty of several crimes in order to get the government into his own hands. Meanwhile, Sergius, Romuald's father, had also entered a monastery. He did not find the quiet, regular life agreeable to his taste, however, and the news came to his son that he intended returning to the pleasures of the world. Romuald immediately determined to go to Ravenna, in the hope of dissuading his father from what he considered such a fatal step. His father listened to all the arguments Romuald brought forward in favour of monastic life, and at length promised to stop where he was till his death. About this time the monks of Classis were without an abbot and Otho III. was petitioned to nominate Romuald. He had not been there long before he saw signs of dissatisfaction and mutiny in the community. Under these circumstances he resolved to resign, and went to Tivoli, where the Emperor was then besieging order to inform him of his design. On arrival there he found that the town had surrendered. The Governor, Crescenti, took shelter in the Castle of St. Angelo, Rome, Otho feeling it hopeless to get into his power by force. The Emperor the fore despatched a messenger, Thain, with promise, bound by an oath, that if Crescenti would leave the castle his life should be spared. In spite of the solemnity of the promise, Otho no sooner saw the man in his power than ordered him to be beheaded. Romuald declared that such a crime necessitated a penalty, and accordingly the Emperor formed barefoot a pilgrimage from Rome Mount Garganus. Romuald founded seven monasteries, but the only one that became famous was that of Camaldoli, about three miles from Florence; it adopted to a great extent the Benedictine rules, but altered them in some particulars, so that we find members spoken of in some books as separate Order. St. Romuald died June 15, 1027, at the Monastery of Val-de-Castro; Feb. 7th, the day of his translation, was ordered by Clement VIII. to be kept in honour.

Ronge, Johannes [b. at Birchoswalde Silesia, Oct. 16th, 1813] was the founder of the "German Catholic movement," and a formidable separation which took place from the Roman Church. He studied at the University of Breslau, and after spending a year as a volunteer in a rifle battalion, he was ordained a priest of the Roman Catholic Church, and in 1841 became Pastor of Grokau, in the county of Neisse, Saxony. He was suspended in consequence of an article which he published in the "Sächsische Vaterlandblätter" in 1842, called "Rome and the Chaplains of Breslau," in which he criticised severely the conduct of the extreme Romanists with regard to an ecclesiastical appointment. In 1856 Arnoldi, Bishop of Treves, published an announcement to the effect that the "H Coat" would be exhibited for the space six weeks, during which an indulgence would be granted to all who came to see it paid for its preservation. [Treves, H Coat op.] Much indignation was expressed among the Protestants and among the bigoted Romanists, and Ronge published his Letter from a Catholic Priest to Bishop Arnoldi, denouncing the exposition, etc.
challenging the authenticity of the tale which the Bishop had caused to be published concerning the relic. The article was responded to in all quarters with tokens of sympathy, and a great stir was made among all religious denominations in Germany. Ronge was excommunicated by the Chapter of Breislaus in Dec., 1844; and in January, 1845, the German Catholic Church was founded, with Ronge as its head as pastor. Another congregation, which had been formed at Schneidemühl, in Posen, a short time before, headed by Czerski, and calling itself the Christian Apostolic Catholic Church, became united to the German Catholics, and the two met at Easter, 1845, to agree upon a creed and arrange the new organisation. The Nicene Creed was retained, Scripture declared to be the standard of faith, and the celibacy of the clergy, the doctrines of Purgatory, Transubstantiation, and the Seven Sacraments of the Roman Church were rejected. There were strong hopes entertained that a German reformed National Church would be re-established holding the faith of the Creeds, but rejecting Papal domination. But the hope vanished when it was seen that the Divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ was treated as a doubtful question, though Czerski strove hard to preserve this cardinal doctrine of Christianity. The number of congregations increased rapidly; but they were opposed by conservative Protestants, who dreaded impiety more than Papal domination, and by the powers of the State, who feared that an attempt was being made to undermine existing institutions, and especially all religion. They were expelled from Baden as dangerous to the public welfare; and internal discord began to arise, through which the cause gradually declined. By 1858 the number of congregations had diminished by one-half, and in 1860 Ronge himself took refuge in England, and occupied himself with preaching to German exiles in London. The greater part of the societies have been suppressed, and the rest have become absorbed among the rationalistic sects.

Rood [Saxon, rode, "a cross"]—This name is sometimes applied to the cross on which Christ died, although when used to signify the relics of the true cross the prefix "holy" is generally added, as Holyrood in Edinburgh. It is more commonly applied to the cross which was formerly erected at the entrance of the chancel in mediæval times. It generally stood in a gallery called the Roodloft, on which was erected a large crucifix or cross, sometimes with figures also of the Virgin Mary and St. John. In England after the Reformation the rood was, as a rule, removed; but there are some still remaining, and where they have been removed many churches have the rood galleries remaining.

Rosa, Sr., was born at Lima, in the kingdom of Peru, in 1586. Her parents were of good family, and rich, until Rosa was about fifteen, when they fell into most distressing poverty. Their daughter devoted herself to them, but they were continually urging her to accept one of her many suitors. She, however, had determined to remain single, and as a sure safeguard against being shaken in her resolution, she took the habit of the Third Order of St. Dominic in 1606. She spent a life of severe fasting, and in remembrance of our Saviour's Passion wore round her head a circlet of silver studded inside with sharp pins. She was possessed of a very vivid and excitable imagination, and was haunted for years by most horrible phantoms and apparitions, all of which she regarded as assaults of the Evil One, but which were no doubt owing to want of due nourishment. After years of suffering from a complication of diseases, she died Aug. 24th, 1617, and was buried in the Dominican convent of Lima. She was canonised by Clement X., who ordered her festival to be kept on Aug. 30th.

Rosary [Lat. rosarium, "a chaplet of roses"]—A form of prayer recited on beads by the Roman Catholics. It consists of fifteen decades of Ave Marias, each preceded by a Paternoster and followed by a Gloria. The rosary is divided into three parts, each of which is called a chaplet or corona. It was instituted to commemorate the fifteen mysteries—five joyful, five sorrowful, and five glorious—of the Virgin Mary. The practice of using beads, etc., is very ancient, having been in use as early as the fifth century; but the rosary was introduced much later. Some say it was instituted by St. Dominic, who learned its use from the Virgin in a vision in 1268.

Roscellin or Roscelin, was born in the diocese of Soissons in the eleventh century, and educated at Rheims. About 1089 he became Canon of Compiègne, and put forth heretical views of the doctrine of the Trinity—namely, that the three names of the Trinity are the names of three individual substances, as distinct as three angels, and that the unity of the Trinity is a mere verbal expression, implying a unity in power, as there may be among the angels. In 1092 a Council was called at Soissons, at which Roscellin was condemned, and obliged to recant. He fled to England, where he retracted his recantation, and wrote against his principal antagonist, Anselm (who had written De Fide Trinitatis against him), accusing him of holding heretical views on the Incarnation. Anselm had lately become Archbishop of Canterbury, and this caused a quarrel between him and the King, but they were reconciled, and Roscellin was forced to return to France. He became Canon of Tours, and shortly after began a controversy with his former disciple, Abelard. The latter had in his early years been a strong partisan of Roscellin, but his views took a more modified form, and greatly resembled...
Rosenfelders.—In the middle of the last century a man who had formerly been gamekeeper, named Hans Rosenfeld, appeared in Prussia with the announcement that the Gospel was all untrue, for that he was the real Messiah. Incredibly as it may seem, I succeeded in getting a goodly following; I averred that Frederick the Great was Satan in human shape, whom he, as the Messiah, was to struggle with and subdue, after which he would cause all the nations of the earth to submit to him, and he would rule over them, assisted by the twenty-four elders mentioned in the Book of Revelation. I lived a grossly immoral life, and at last, 1782, the King ordered him to be imprisoned for life. At this total collapse of all my schemes, his followers dispersed, and no more was heard of the heresy.

Rosenmüller, Ernst Friedrich Karl, a distinguished Biblical critic and Orientalist, was born at Hessberg, in Hildburghausen 1768, studied at Leipsig, became Professor of Oriental Literature there, and died 1835. His chief work is Schola in Vet Testamentum, which, on account of the profound Oriental learning and untiring industry of its author, is one of the most valuable commentaries upon the Old Testament. I also wrote Handbuch der Biblischen Alterthümer, which he left incomplete; Institutio ad Fundamenta Lingue Arabice; Analect Arabica; and Das alte und das neue Morgenland, oder Erläuterungen der Heiligen Schrift.

Rosicrucians.—A society formed in Germany at the beginning of the seventeenth century. An anonymous pamphlet published at Cassel, in 1614, asserted that the found, Rosenkreutz, had lived 200 years before, that, according to the rules drawn up at its foundation, its existence had up to that time been kept a profound secret. The pamphlet declared the members to be possessed of fabulous scientific knowledge, and to be absolutely exempt from illness or suffering of a sort. Another derivation of their name from ros, “dew,” which they held to be the most powerful solvent of gold; and cr “cross,” which in the chemical style signifies “light,” became the figure of the cross, “X” exhibiting at the same time the three letters the word lux. They were alchemists, sought for the Philosopher’s Stone by t intervention of dew and light. In 1622 the society published the following:—“We, debted by our college, the principal of the brethren of the Rosicrucians, to make o visible and invisible abode in this city, throw the grace of the Most High, towards who are the hearts of the just; we tea without books or notes, and speak the languages of the countries wherever we are, draw men, like ourselves, from the error death.” The whole thing created a great sensation at the time both in England a Sabellianism. Roscellin accused him also of other heresies, whereupon Abelard violently attacked his former leader. No account remains of Roscellin’s latter years, but he is supposed to have died about 1106. [Nominalists.]

Rose, Hugh James [b. 1795, d. 1838], was born at Little Horsted. His father removed to Uckfield in 1800, where he took pupils, and educated his son till his entry at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1813. In 1814 he gained the first Bell’s scholarship, and in 1817 took his B.A.; the following year he gave up college residence to become private tutor in the family of the Duke of Athol; in the same year he took holy orders. In 1821 he was preferred to the vicarage of Horsham. Here his ministerial labours were greatly blessed; but the work of the parish, added to taking pupils, proved too much for his health, and in 1824 he started on travel through Prussia, Austria, and Italy. While on this journey he collected materials for one of his leading works, Discourses on the State of the Protestant Religion in Germany. In 1825, 1826, 1828, and 1830-33, he was Select Preacher at Cambridge, and in 1829 was appointed Christian Advocate under the will of Mr. Hulse. In 1830 he was appointed to the rectory of Hadleigh; but this place suited his tendency to asthma as little as Horsham, and in 1833 he was compelled to exchange that valuable preferment for the livings of Fairstaid and Weelley, in Essex, and these again for the small benefice of St. Thomas’s, Southwark, which he retained till his death. In 1831 he became the editor of a Church publication, the British Magazine. In 1833-4 he delivered some inaugural lectures at the new University of Durham, where he had temporarily accepted the Chair of Divinity—one, entitled An Apology for the Study of Divinity, and the second, The Study of Church History Recommended. He was the one great representative of Cambridge in the movement which produced the Tracts for the Times. In 1836 he succeeded Mr. Otter as Principal of King’s College, London. He prepared and delivered (partly by deputy) two courses of Divinity lectures, those in 1836-7 on the Evidence of Christianity, and for 1837-8 on Ecclesiastical History. His edition of Parkhurst’s Greek Lexicon of the New Testament turned a fanciful and somewhat unscholarly book into a very valuable one. In the autumn of 1838 he again went abroad in search of health, but died at Florence, Dec. 22nd, 1838. Dr. Newman thus dedicates to him his fourth volume of Sermons:—“To the Rev. Hugh James Rose, B.D., Principal of King’s College, London, and Domestic Chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who, when our hearts were failing, bade us stir up the gift that was in us, and betake ourselves to our true mother, this volume is inscribed by his obliged and faithful friend, the author, Nov. 19th, 1838.” on the Continent, some prominent men—as Robert Fludd and Jacob Behmen—defending it boldly, others declaring that it had some hidden purpose in view against Lutheranism, and that this talk about science, etc., was simply to put people off their guard. Gradually the name “Rosicrucian” became a generic term for every species of occult precession; in general usage the term is specially associated with that branch of the secret elements which has to do with the creations of the deities. [Theosophy.]

Rosminians or Fathers of the Institute of Charity.—A congregation founded in 1828 by Antonio Rosmini, an Italian philosopher. Their chief aim was to be the practice of the virtue of charity, and their work was to consist in preaching, visiting the sick and prisoners, relieving the poor, missionary-work and education, and praying for the dead. Their first house was at Monte Calvario, near Domon d’Ossola, and within a few years they established branch institutions at Trent, Verona, and Bath. The congregation was approved by Pope Gregory XVI. in 1838, and in the following year its members took the vows required by the rule, and Rosmini was made Superior-General of the Institute for life. Some of his philosophical works were condemned in 1830 by the Congregation of the Index, but the whole collection was subsequently examined, and pronounced undeserving of censure from a theological point of view. Some years after Rosmini’s death, a house at Stresa belonging to the Order, and occupied by the founder during the later years of his life, was consecrated by the Piedmontese Government. Nine houses belonging to the Institute are in existence in England and Wales.

Rotho, Richard [b. at Posen, 1799; d. at Heidelberg, 1867], German theologian, was educated at Breslau, and studied theology at Heidelberg, Berlin, and Wittenberg. At Berlin he became acquainted with the leaders of the Pietists, and he was an early friend of Tholuck, Müller, and Olshausen. In 1823 he was appointed Chaplain to the Prussian Embassy at Rome; and he there became intimate with the Chevalier de Bunsen, who had much influence in his later theology. In 1828 Rothe became Director of the Theological Seminary at Wittenberg, and then Professor and Seminary Director at Heidelberg, where he remained till the close of his life, with the exception of two years spent at Bonn as Lecturer, in which post he succeeded Dr. Nitzsch. Though remarkable for his modesty and retiring disposition, Rothe exercised a widespread influence among his pupils and contemporaries, and his books hold a foremost place in speculative theological literature. His chief works are: Anfänge der christlichen Kirche und ihrer Verfassung, published in 1837, and Theologische Ethik [1845–8]. The first is a comprehensive history of the growth of the Christian Church from the Apostolic age to the time of St. Augustine, in which Rothe (himself a Protestant) proves that the tendency of the early Church was towards Romanism, especially in the Nicene age, which the Oxford School represented as the type of primitive Catholicity. The Theologische Ethik is divided into three parts—the doctrine of the good, the doctrine of virtue, and the doctrine of duties. Rothe professes to be a theologian rather than a philosopher, and disclaims the following of any philosophy. He defines piety as the consciousness of God in the soul, which to a pious man overmasters, for the time, all self-consciousness—self-consciousness only grows by degrees out of the primary all-absorbing feeling. He says, “God is as immediately certain to me as myself, because I cannot feel or conceive of the consciousness or the thought of myself in any other way than as immediately connected with the feeling and the thought of God; God is to me the absolutely and immediately certain, and I become first truly certain of myself by means of my certainty of God.” He believes that the Church is destined to permeate all human life with religion, and that when this is accomplished she will become absorbed in the State. With regard to his creed, Rothe was a Protestant as far as he attached himself to any established form of orthodoxy; he regarded the Bible as the unchangeable standard of theology, but said that to him theology was a simple faith in Christ, the “sunrise in history, which alone sheds light over all the objects that fall under our observation.”

Roundheads.—A name given to the Puritans, because they wore their hair cropped close to their heads, in contradistinction to the Cavaliers, who wore long lovelocks.

Rousseau, Jean Jacques, French philosophical writer [b. at Geneva, June 28th, 1712; d. at Ermenonville, near Paris, June 3rd, 1778], was the son of a watchmaker. His father died in his infancy, and he was brought up by his aunt. In 1722 he was sent to a school at Bossey, where he remained for two years. He was then sent to a notary’s office, but dismissed for inaptness and inaccuracy. He was next apprenticed to an engraver, M. Ducommun, a rough and violent man, under whom Rousseau contracted many wicked habits. He at length escaped in 1728, and journeyed to Conflignon, near Geneva, where he was hospitably received by the priest, who was ever on the look-out for one whom he might convert. He was confided to the care of Madame de Waren, a lady living at Annecy, and placed in the monastery of the catechumens at Turin, where he abjured Protestantism simply, as he wrote afterwards in his Confessions, because he could not bear the idea of returning to Geneva, and saw no other way out of his destitute condition. As he refused to take orders, he was dismissed from the establishment, and wandered about Turin for some time, and then became foot-boy in a house, whence he was dismissed for stealing. And after six weeks he gained another situation, where he was treated with great consideration, but, on a visit from an old comrade of Geneva, grew so lazy that he was again turned upon his own resources. In 1729 he returned to Annecy, and threw himself on the charity of his former patroness, Madame de Warens. He was sent to a seminary to learn Latin enough to become a priest, but was dismissed as deficient in intellectual faculty. He next tried music, and wandered about France and Switzerland till 1732, when he returned to Madame de Warens, who was now living at Chambéry. For the next eight years he lived a desultory life, chiefly as the lover of Madame de Warens. In April, 1740, he went to Lyons as tutor, and thence to Paris, where he remained till, in 1743, he gained the post of secretary to the Count of Montaigu, French Ambassador at Venice. However, they quarrelled, and Rousseau returned to Paris towards the end of 1744, and in the beginning of the next year became acquainted with Thérèse Le Vasseur, a kitchenmaid, with whom he lived for the rest of his life. He gained his bread as secretary to M. Dupin fermier-général, and also wrote music for the stage which he did not sell. All his five children were sent at their birth to the foundling hospital. In 1749 the Academy of Dijon proposed, as a theme for a prize essay, "Has the restoration of the sciences contributed to purify or to corrupt manners?" Rousseau immediately determined to write on the negative side and gained the prize, this being his first literary work. Three years afterwards the same Academy propounded the question, "What is the origin of inequality among men, and is it authorised by the natural law?" He again competed, and though he did not gain the prize, his essay was more powerful than the former one. In 1754 he revisited Geneva, and there re-embraced the Protestant faith. Rousseau had become acquainted with Madame d'Épinay, who in 1756 invited him to reside at her country seat—the Hermitage; there he met with Diderot, d'Alembert, and Condillac, who engaged him to write in the Encyclopédie. [Encyclopédists.] Here he began his novel, La Nouvelle Héloïse. In 1757 he quarrelled with Grimm, Diderot, and, in fact, almost all his friends, and in December moved to Montmorency. Here he completed his novel, which was published in 1760. He at first greatly enjoyed his life at Montmorency, but his health broke down, and in 1761 he was several times inclined to commit suicide. The appearance of Le Contrat Social and Emile in 1762 caused a great sensation. They were condemned by Parliament, and the author had to flee for his life. He went to Yverdon, in the canton of Berne, in Switzerland; but the Senate of Berne ordered him to leave the canton, and he removed to Motiers, in Neuchâtel, then a part of the dominions of the King of Prussia. But persecution followed him here and in 1765 he moved to the island of St Peter, in the lake of Bienne, and, being again driven away, came in Jan., 1766, to England with Hume. He resided at Wootton, near Ashbourne, in the Peak. Here, during the autumn and winter of 1766, he wrote the first part of his Confessions. He quarrelled with Hume, and worked himself up into the delusion that the English nation had formed plot against him, and at last fled, arriving in France in May, 1767. He lived for a year in Trye, near Gisors, still believing that all were against him, then stayed at Bourgoin and Monquin, and finally reappeared in Paris in July, 1770. He lived by copying music, in which he gained only £80 a year. Thérèse's health and his own were declining, and in 1778 M. Girardin prevailed upon him to come and live at Ermenonville, an estate about twenty miles from Paris, where he suddenly died July 2nd, 1788. It is said that he committed suicide, but the doctors said that he died of apoplexy, and it has never been decided. He was buried on an island in the midst of a lake in the park, and sixteen years after his remains were removed to the Panthéon at Paris.

Rousseau's principal works were the Discourses, The New Héloïse, The Social Contract, Émile, and his Confessions. The discourses, which were the answers to the problems started by the Dijon Academy, made his reputation. They were the first signs of reaction against Montesquieu's historic method of inquiring into society. The first was an elaboration of the truth that virtue without science is better than science without virtue. It was wholly one-side-admitting none of the conveniences, alleviations of suffering, or increase of mental maturity which knowledge has brought. Rousseau said that his object in writing La Nouvelle Héloïse was to reconcile the two opposites—the devout and the rationalistic—but his design is not perceptible. It contains very democratic ideas, tending to bring the manners of the great into contempt by the presentation of the happiness of a simple life. Its chief defect is, that feeling is raised in the highest place instead of being put into an equal place with understanding.

The Social Contract is a denial of human perfectibility. In it Rousseau renounced his views which appeared in the Discourses. A central conception is the doctrine of the sovereignty of the people, which he had borrowed from Locke. He also held that the instant the Government usurps the sovereignty, the social treaty is broken, and the citizen re restored to their natural liberty, and are not obliged to obey. This book kindled the evolutionary fire both in France and Germany. Emotions, or Education, had a great effect on the religion of France. It is full of Rousseau's deism, and brought about a reaction from the materialism and atheism of the time. Rousseau held that the three first precepts that ought to be instilled into the mind of a child are—a respect for truth; a deep feeling or things of the spirit—a sense of awe, mystery, and sublimity—that he was not to hear the name of a God or Supreme Spirit till his reason had ripened; and a love of justice. His Confessions, which he had not intended to appear before 1800, but which were published surreptitiously in 1789, contain a full account of his whole life, with all the minutest details. He is very candid about his faults, as it seems at the same time to be almost proud of some of them.

Routh, Martin Joseph, D.D. [b. at South Elmham, in Suffolk, Sept., 1755; d. at Tylehurst, near Reading, Dec., 1854]. He matriculated in 1770 at Queen's College, Oxford, entered the College of St. Mary Magdalen in the following year, was elected a Fellow in 1776, and took the degree of M.A. He was appointed to the office of College Librarian in 1781, became Senior Proctor of the University and Junior Dean of Arts, and was elected president of Magdalen College in 1791. He became Rector of Tylehurst in 1810, and held, with his Presidency, till his death, employing his time in literary work, which he continued till within the last years of his life. In 1784 he edited Plato's Enhednus et sophias, with notes; in 1814-15 he published three volumes of Reliquiae Sacrae, and in 1832 Epistolae Ecclesiasticorum Obscula. Two more volumes of the Reliquiae Sacrae were added in 1846-8, and he published two editions of Bishop Burnet's History of His Own Times.

Rubrics. Directions in the Prayer Book to the manner in which the parts of the service are to be performed; from the Latin sub, "red," because they were formerly written in red ink to distinguish them from the service, which was printed in different type and in black ink. The first service books of the Church seem not to have had any rubrics, but the directions were contained in other books. The first to combine the two seems to have been Burchard, Master of Ceremonies under Innocent VIII., and Alexander I., whose Pontifical containing the ceremonies and words of the Mass was printed at Rome in 1455.

Rufina and Secunda, Saints. Daughters of a nobleman of the first rank in Rome. They were betrothed to two brothers, and would most likely have married them, but when, in the year 257, Valerian raised a persecution in Rome, the brothers renounced their faith in order to save their property. Rufina and Secunda, not feeling sure that they would have strength of mind to resist the persuasions of their friends, left the town secretly. Armentarius and Verinus were so angry when they found their betrothed had escaped, that they informed against them. The sisters were brought before the Governor, Junius Donatus, and by his direction were beheaded in a wood near Rome. A church was built in the fourth century on the place of their martyrdom, but it was destroyed some years later during an invasion of barbarians. The relics of the sisters were removed to the Church of St. John Lateran at Rome. The 10th of July is dedicated to their memory.

Rufinus, Tyrannius, Presbyter of Aquileia [b. at Aquileia about the middle of the fourth century; d. in Sicily, 410]. He was educated at a monastery in Aquileia, and there became acquainted with St. Jerome, who mentions him as one of the most promising students. Rufinus was baptised about 370, and went soon afterwards to Egypt to visit some of the famous hermits living in the deserts; he spent six years in Egypt, and during this time received a letter from St. Jerome full of tenderness and commendation. In 378 he went to Jerusalem, and built a cell upon the Mount of Olives, in which he lived for nearly twenty years. He is famous on account of his Latin translation of Origen and other Greek writers, his commentaries on Hosea, Joel, and Amos, and his bitter contest with St. Jerome; this was caused by the latter's disapproval of his translation of Origen's De Principiis, and, though at one time they became reconciled, the contest broke out afresh when Rufinus returned to Rome in 397. He lived for some time before his death at Aquileia; but was cited to appear before Anastasius, Bishop of Rome, and, failing to do so, his writings were condemned, and he was degraded from the rank of Presbyter. He retired to Sicily, and died there. He translated the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, and continued it to the death of Theodosius. He also translated the Orations of St. Gregory Nazianzen, and the Rules of St. Basil. His translations are paraphrases rather than literal versions.

Ruinart, Therry.—A Benedictine monk of the Congregation of St. Maur [b. at Rheims, 1657; d. at the Monastery of Hautvilliers, near that city, 1709]. He entered the Congregation of St. Maur in 1674, and went in 1682 to St. Germain-des-Prés, where he became the pupil of Mabillon, and worked with him upon the last volumes of the history of the Order of St. Benedict. His chief works were Acta Primorum Martyrum; and Historia Persecutionis Vandalarum, which some believe to have been the work of an African.
Bishop, edited by Ruinart; and he edited the works of Gregory of Tours.

Rural Deans.—Ecclesiastical officers who are supposed to superintend the clergy within their district, to see that their churches and houses are in proper repair, to discuss with them the leading church topics of the day, and to report the result to the bishop. They are of older origin in the English Church than in any other, and are mentioned in the laws of Edward the Confessor as the decanus episcopi, or bishop’s dean. They were unknown in Italy, but existed in Belgium and France, and are still to be found in Austria. Till recently the division into rural deaneries was merely geographical, as no rural deans were appointed since the Reformation until about forty years ago. The former office of the rural dean, as shown in the oath which was administered to them on taking office, was to inspect the lives and manners of the clergy and people within their district, and to report the same to the bishop; and in order that they might carry this out they were allowed to convene rural chapters which consisted of all the instituted clergy, or their curates as proxies, and the rural dean as president. These Chapters continued till Otho, the Pope’s Legate in Edward I.’s reign, required the archdeacons to be present at them, and, they being superior to the rural deans, virtually took the presidency out of their hands. From this time the power of the rural deans became less. At the Reformation it was proposed to give them certain legal powers, but nothing was done. At the Synod of Convocation held in London, April 3rd, 1571, it was ordered that “the archdeacon, when he hath finished his visitation, shall signify to the bishop what clergy he hath found in every deanery so well endowed with learning and judgment as to be worthy to instruct the people in sermons, and to rule and preside over others; out of these the bishop may choose such as he will have to be rural deans.” But the office was not much used till about forty years ago, when the deans were revived to help the archdeacons in their work. The office was of ancient date also in France and Germany, but in Italy the smallness of the dioceses rendered deans unnecessary, and they were not introduced there till the sixteenth century by St. Carlo Borromeo.

Rush Bearing.—An ancient English custom of carrying rushes to the churches on the day of each village Wake, and strewing them there. It prevailed chiefly in the north of England among the lakes, and in Cheshire.

Russian Church.—The. — The Russians claim to have been converted to Christianity by the Apostle Andrew, but it has been conclusively proved that the conversion did not take place till the ninth century. The State

Church of Russia is a branch of the Greek or Eastern Church. In the year 955 Olga, widow of the Grand Prince Igor, went to Constantinople to receive baptism at the hands of the Patriarch. An account of the progress of Christianity in Russia will be found under Olga, St., and her grandson Vladimir. Vladimir died in 1015, and his son, Yaroslav, caused the Scriptures to be translated into Slavonian, founded an archbishopric at Kiev, and by getting Greek priests to settle in his country sought to render his Church independent of the Patriarch of Constantinople; but in this he did not succeed, and for six centuries it remained attached to the Greek Church. After the seizure of Constantinople by the Turks in 1453, the Russian bishops elected their own metropolitan without the sanction of Greek patriarchs, and in 1551 a Synod held at Moscow framed a code of ecclesiastical law for the government of the Church. The laws were called Stogloe, or a hundred chapters. In the reign of the Czar Theodo the Greeks consented to the consecration, in 1588, of an independent patriarch of Moscow. The most important of these patriarchs was Nikon [1652-7]. In 1642 a catechism was composed in the Russian language by Pet Moglas to check the growing tendency of the Russo-Greeks to conform to Rome, and Nikon did much to correct the errors which still remained in the Slavonic version of the Scriptures and in the service books. The changes in the liturgy caused great commotion in the Church, and in 1666 a large number separated themselves from the rest, as were called Rasbolniki, from rasbol, “to signify schism or dissent. They, however, called themselves Stoveroertsi, or the “O Believers.” Peter the Great, in 1700, the death of the tenth Patriarch, Adria ordered that for the future the Russian Church should be governed by a synod consisting of a certain number of bishops, seven presbyters, and an imperial procurator. Accordingly, in 1723, the Most Holy Synod was established at Moscow. It has now been removed to St. Petersburg. It is usual composed of two metropolitan, two bishops, the chief secular priest of the imperial sta and the following lay members: the procurator, seven secretaries, and some clerics. It decides on all matters of faith, and superintends the administration of the dioceses. The law of the land with regard to religion is as follows: “The ruling faith in the Russian Empire is the Christian Orthodox East Catholic declaration of belief. Religious liber is not only assured to Christians of other denominations, but also to Jews, Mohammedans pagans; so that all people living in Russia may worship God according to the laws of their ancestors.” In some respects the Russian creed resembles that of the Lati but yet it differs in a few very important articulars, notably that of the doctrine of the Trinity. The Russians deny the double pro-session of the Holy Ghost. [Filioque Controversy.] The worship of the Virgin is not so common as in Italy or Spain, but the invocation of the Saints is quite as usual. The laity communicate in both kinds with the priest, but with this difference, that while he partakes of each separately, no laity receive the bread soaked in the wine. The Russians take their fundamental doctrines from the Bible and the first of the seven General Councils of the Church.

The number of Sacraments recognised by them is seven, namely, Baptism, Chrism, Holy Eucharist, Orders, Confession, Matrimony, and the Uction of the Sick. In the latter case there is again a difference from the Roman Catholic idea of the same service. In the former uction is administered only at the certain approach of death, whereas in Russia prayers are added for the recovery of the patient. There are three orders of clergy: bishops, priests, and deacons, but numerous sub-divisions exist within each. It will suffice if we mention those of the bishops, which are three in number: First, the metropolitan, of which there are only three in Russia; second, the archbishops; third, the bishops. The lower clergy are paid by the state, and although their incomes are for the most part very small, they manage, by total exemption from taxation, to live. They are forbidden to marry after their ordination, but there is no law against their keeping their wives if they should have been married while still laymen. The number of members of this Church is said to be as great as 64,000,000, of which 15,000,000 are sectarian dissenters. The ritual of the service is elaborate in the extreme; a description of a festival service has been published in Dr. Pinkerton's account of his visit to Russia. Great superstition prevails, especially amongst the lower classes, and this is fostered by the priests. Image worship, or, to speak more correctly, picture worship, is a great feature of the religion of the people, many thinking it utterly impossible to say a prayer unless they have a picture either of the Saviour or of the Virgin before them. A few years ago a book written by the late Mr. William Palmer was published, with a preface by Cardinal Newman. The author not only fully describes what he saw in Russia, but freely gives his views and impressions received while on a visit to the country. He went with the idea that it would be possible in time to unite the Russian and Anglican Churches, a union very much desired by many Russians; but returned with the conviction that with such an utter dissimilarity of opinion on many vital matters, such union was quite impracticable.

Rutherford, Samuel, a Covenanter, celebrated for his piety and learning, was born at Nisbet, in Roxburghshire, about 1600, and educated at Edinburgh University. In 1627 he was appointed minister of Anworth, where he worked unceasingly among his people. In 1636 he was banished for preaching against the Articles of Perth, and went to Aberdeen, but returned to his charge on the overthrow of Episcopacy in 1638. In the next year he became Professor of Divinity at St. Andrews, and in 1643 came to London as one of the Scotch Commissioners to the Westminster Assembly. He did so much for the cause of Presbyterianism, that Milton wrote against him in The New Forces of Conscience under the Long Parliament. At the Restoration Rutherford was in great disfavour. The Lex Rex, a book which he had published in 1644, was burnt before his windows, and he was summoned before Parliament; but he died March 20th, 1661, before the time appointed for his appearance.

Among Rutherford's works are The Due Right of Presbytery [1644], The Trial and Triumph of Faith [1645], The Divine Right of Church Government [1646], The Covenant of Life [1655], Civil Policy [1657], and Life of Grace [1659].

Sabaite. [SARAS, St.]

Sabaoth. — A Hebrew word, meaning “hosts” or “armies.” It occurs in the fifth verse of the Te Deum, “Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth.” Some doubt has been expressed as to the reference; the general opinion is that the angels or angelic hosts are meant, or the stars, which are often spoken of as the host of heaven. One critic believes that it means the hosts of Israel, and others that it is a general reference to all created things.

Sajas, St., Abbot, was born at Mutalasca, in Cappadocia, in 439. At a very early age he entered the monastery at Flavina, not far from his native town. After living here ten years, he went to Palestine, and, taking St. Euthymius as his model, began adopting this Saint’s custom of living in a cell quite alone, far away from all his fellow-men. But Euthymius, thinking this too severe a trial for a young man, advised him to take a cell near Jerusalem, which formed one of a sort of cluster of hermitages. After the death of Euthymius, the discipline of the monastery was relaxed, and Sajas went to a desert, where he remained four years without speaking to a single soul. At the end of that time, having had several applications from different men to be allowed to share his solitude, he agreed to form a small taula. He had never been admitted into priest’s orders, and as the want of a priest was severely felt in the community, he was ordained by Sallust, Bishop of Jerusalem, in 484, and made head of his monks, who were called, after him, Sabaites. His rule of discipline was so rigorous that his monks rebelled, and on the death of Sallust lodged complaints of their superior with his successor Elias. Sabas fled to the desert, but when Elias was firmly enthroned at Jerusalem he sent a message to him that he was to resume his work as before. At first the monks disputed every command he gave, threw down the buildings which he had raised, and some of them left again. But Sabas, by constant patience and sympathy, even when their conduct was at its worst, at last gained them all to perfect submission. At the end of his life he was sent by Elias on a difficult errand. The Emperor Anastasius had banished several Catholic bishops, and supported the Eutychian heresy, and Sabas, at the age of seventy, was sent to try to restore peace to the Church. The Emperor treated him with honour, and at his request promised not to molest Elias. Soon after his return he fell ill, and died Dec. 5th, 531. He founded several monasteries, amongst them one on the shores of the Dead Sea.

Sabbatarian.—This word has been used in several senses in ecclesiastical history. [1] In the sixteenth century it was applied to the "Seventh Day Baptists," who, alleging that the Church had departed from Apostolic order, insisted that the observance of the seventh day is binding upon Christians, and that the substitution of the first day was a corrupt innovation of the second century. On this opinion the Seventh Day Baptists were organised, and in the beginning of the seventeenth century there were eleven congregations of them. They still barely exist in England; in the United States there are about 9,000. [2] The word is now commonly applied by way of reproach to those who oppose any relaxation of the law as regards the opening of museums and picture-galleries on the Sunday, and who hold that it is the duty of Christians and of the State, on behalf of religion and morality, to vigorously oppose any secularisation of the Lord's Day.

Sabbath.—A Hebrew word meaning "rest." The seventh day of the week, on which it is commanded by the Law of Moses that man should rest from labour, in commemoration of God's rest on the seventh day after the creation of the world. It is also a memorial of the release of the Israelites from Egyptian bondage.

The question whether the Sabbath is to be regarded as a mere Jewish ordinance, and, therefore, no more a matter of universal obligation than the sacrifices or other requirements of the Mosaic code, is one which is very earnestly discussed in the present day. On one side it is asserted that Sabbath observance does not rest merely on the Fourth Commandment, but was pre-Mosaic and was observed by the Apostles. To support the pre-Mosaic view reference is made to Gen. ii. 3; iv. 3; xxii. 27. To this, reply has been made that none of these verses speak of command, but merely state fact. The Sabbath is not mentioned in the Book of Genesis, yet, in contrast with this fact, there are strict commands concerning the Tree of Knowledge and the institution of marriage. It is also argued that the Sabbath had been pre-Mosaic it must have been applicable universally; yet the heathen are nowhere rebuked for non-observance, while the chosen people have the most stringent commands on the subject. In fact, the Sabbath is made a distinguishing mark between the chosen people and the rest of the world [Exodus xxxi. 13 and Ezekiel xx. 12]. And this, it is maintained, was the view of the early Fathers. Justin Martyr speaks of "the patriarchs justified before God without keeping the Sabbath." "From Abraham was the circumcision, from Moses the Sabbath," Ireneus: "Abraham without circumcision and without Sabbaths, believed in God," Tertullian: "They must show that Adam and Abel were circumcised and kept the Sabbath in
Of the Sabbath during the period of the Judges we know absolutely nothing; no mention made of it in the Books of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, or Samuel. The Prophets, however, apparently seeing that it must degenerate into a mere day of idleness, seized upon it and devoted it to the religious improvement of the people [compare Psalms lxxxvi. and cxxii.]. Only ten times it is mentioned in the Historical Books. In two of these passages it is desecrated by the dethronement of Athaliah [2 Kings xi. 5; 2 Chron. xxiii. 4] a marked contrast to the continued insistence on its observance by the Prophets. From the Captivity the Jews seem never to have incurred the charge of disregarding the Sabbath; nay, in a mistaken spirit, they allowed themselves to be slaughtered to the number of one thousand, rather than resist on the Sabbath [1 Mac. ii. 34]. Hereafter they decreed it should be lawful to resist, but not to initiate an attack. This seems the first example of minute distinctions which the Rabbis afterwards put forth—such as, on man might carry a leaf, but two might not carry it between them; a man with toothache might not rinse his mouth with vinegar, but he might use it for alleviating the pain if he swallowed it. How opposed to the spirit of the Law these additions were is shown by our Lord's observance of the Sabbath; for, as He came to fulfil the whole Law, we cannot doubt that He kept the Sabbath as God intended it to be kept. Had the opponents of Christ examined their Pentateuch with a candid mind, they would have seen that, as the Sabbath, a day of rest and freedom from servile work, was their distinguishing mark, so they must, above all} ner nations, be distinguished by their kind of tender treatment of dependants. There have been some who, taking the strictest views of Sabbath observance, have held at the observance of the seventh day is still ading; such are the Seventh-day Baptists. And others who do not go this length maintain that the substitution of the first for the seventh day being made, the obligation to serve that day as the Sabbath strictly reigns as before. Some hold that the substitution, though not mentioned in the New Testament, must have been by our Lord's command; others, that the day is fixed by astrological precedent, and that its manner of servance is a matter of ecclesiastical authority.

In the New Testament there are six distinct notices which relate to "the first day of the week." On that day our Lord rose from the dead, and He appeared to His disciples on a same day five times. After eight days, it is, on the first day of the week, He appeared to the eleven when assembled together (John xx.). The Pentecostal Feast that year 1 on the first day of the week, and on that the Holy Ghost was given. In Acts xx. 7, disciples come together on the first day of the week to break bread. In 1 Cor. xvi. 2, Paul bids the Corinthians lay by for the on the first day of the week. It is matter dispute whether by the Lord's Day in Rev. i. is meant the first day of the week or Easter day, or the Jewish Sabbath. These passages seem enough to show, to any reasonable thinker, that the Apostles observed this day, if there is no mention of cessation from our, nor of any connection with the Sabbath, is the observance required of the Gentiles under the decrees of the Council of Jerusalem. The ante-Nicene Fathers are unanimous as the weekly observance of the day. Thus in the Epistle of Barnabas: "We celebrate the first day with joy, on which Jesus rose from the dead." Justin Martyr speaks of Christians resembling on "the day called the day of Sun." Ignatius writes: "No longer oberving Sabbaths, we keep the Lord's Day." Celsus is the first who speaks of cessation on labour. He says that reaping and thering into barns is forbidden on that day. Arnulph too says [A.D. 202]: "On the Lord's y of resurrection we ought to abstain from habit and labour of anxiety, putting off our business, lest we give place to the vil." But he also calls it a day "on which allow ourselves to be joyous." The edict Constantine, in 321, decreted that all business and employment, except agriculture, shall cease on "the honoured day of the n." The Emperor Leo, in 469, included riture in this prohibition. During the Middle Ages Sunday was served as a holy day, and it is curious that on the Waldenses and the Lollards camejections that this was an infringement of Christian liberty. The same line was taken by the great Reformers. Tyndall declared that no holy day was needed if the people could be taught without it. Luther repudiated the obligation so long as it rested on the Fourth Commandment: "If it be set upon a Jewish foundation, then I bid you work, ride, dance on it." Calvin used to play at bowls on the Sunday. The consequence was that a gross and open disregard of the day spread itself throughout Europe. So it was in England also. Even the itinerant preachers sent out by Archbishop Parker betook themselves, after the German fashion, to "tabling, carding, shooting, and bowling." At Kenilworth dancing took place on Sundays. Then those who could not assert the authority of the Church to make holy days, fell back on the Fourth Commandment. It was genuine reverence for religion which led the Puritans to call for greater strictness. The Book of Sports, published in 1618, it should be remembered, in behalf of James I, was not intended as a secularisation of the Lord's Day, but a check upon that. No one was allowed to join in the games but those who had previously attended the Church service. But the licence gave offence, and Archbishop Abbot refused to have it read. The whole subject was bound up with that of Puritan strictness, and the Pilgrim Fathers forbade travelling, cooking, shaving, making beds on the Sabbath. It was part of King James's legislation which fined a man for not going to church on Sunday, and there are many old statutes tending in the same direction which have fallen into disuse. The writer of an interesting article in the Guardian of Dec. 2nd, 1885, points out that the first statute of the reign of Charles I, was directed against meetings of people out of their own parishes "for any sports or pastimes, or any bear-baiting, bull-baiting, interludes," etc. In 1627 carriers were forbidden to travel on the Lord's Day under a penalty of 20s., and butchers were forbidden under a penalty of 6s. 8d. to sell meat. But the law known as the Lord's Day Act was passed in 1676, and forbade every tradesman, artificer, workman, or labourer, to exercise any work of their ordinary calling, works of necessity or charity alone excepted. The fine was, and still remains, on the Statute Book as 5s. for each offence. The interpretation of this law by the judges has produced some anomalias. "It was quickly noticed that the work to be punished was work done in the exercise of a man's ordinary calling. So a horse may be sold on a Sunday, but if it is sold by a horse-dealer the bargain cannot legally be enforced, and, strictly speaking, the horse-dealer may be fined. . . . A farmer is not liable for making hay on a Sunday, but, strange as it may seem, his labourers may be punished for the same act." The Lord's Day Act has been modified by an Act of 1871, which provides that no prosecution can be instituted except by or with the consent in writing of the chief officer of police of the police district in which the offence is committed, or with the consent in writing of two justices of the peace or a stipendiary magistrate having jurisdiction in the place. Another Sunday Act was due to Bishop Porteus. It forbids the opening of any place for entertainment, amusement, or public debating to which persons are admitted by the payment of money or by tickets sold for money. The keeper of such a place is liable to a fine of £200, the chairman of the meeting to £100, and every doorkeeper £50. Religious meetings of any sort are protected. A good deal of litigation followed the opening of the Brighton Aquarium on Sundays. This was clearly within the meaning of the Act. The company adopted several plans to get rid of their liability, but were convicted. The Home Secretary, however, remitted the penalty, on the understanding that no special attractions were to be provided which would necessitate putting on extra hands. [Lord's Day.]

In further considering the subject in relation to present-day questions, it ought to be pointed out that it is by no means an alternative, as is so often represented, between one or the other of the more extreme views; and it is the more important to urge this, because it will have been already evident that the extreme view is one exceedingly difficult to maintain from a Christian standpoint. Even the Jewish Sabbath was to be predominantly a period of rest—a welcome interlude in the toil of life. The command itself is emphatic in its merciful detail—"that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou,"—and this is further pointed by the admonition, "thou shalt remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt." But there was nothing austere in this: innocent feasting was usual amongst the Jews; and our Lord Himself attended a feast on that day. The main command was that a man should rest, himself, from his customary toil, and take care to give all his servants and dependants a rest also. Even this Jewish Sabbath was "made for man, and not man for the Sabbath," and the degree to which man had been already subordinated and enslaved to it, was due to Pharisaic glosses, and to attempts at the manufacture of a quite new and Pharisaic sort of righteousness, unknown to the original Divine law.

Now, in the first place, the securing of such an object as this is fully within the right and the province of a civil Legislature, apart from any religious question at all. Of this a singular proof was afforded during the French Revolution, when the Lord's Day was "abolished" by public edict. It was soon found that the human frame could not bear with impunity an unbroken round of daily toil. The people suffered from it. And accordingly a periodical rest on every tenth day was decreed—called for by sheer physical necessity under the stress of modern life. A vast amount of experience has shown beyond doubt, and every man's own experience confirms it, that the nightly sleep is not sufficient to repair the exhausted energies of the human frame when subjected to steady toil of any kind. Every one knows how different is the feeling on Saturday evening to that experienced on Monday morning, after the day's rest. To see such benefits was the right of even an ancient Christian Legislature; and in a professing Christian country, manifestly there is but one day to be chosen for such purposes, and perhaps to be so guarded.

Christians themselves, again, have express command to "forsake not the assembling of themselves together;" and command, much more when aided by an unbroken usage of the Church, will enjoin some kind of stated religious services. No other day is there the quiet and the solemn opportunity, apart from the cardinal evil which is by them commemorated, and is borne in mind. Now it will be obvious to the Legislator faithfully to consult the right of a people to rest and leisure, how the Church does her duty in turning such opportunities to account, the essentials for true and reasonable observance of the Lord's Day Sabbath-rest are present. The amount and kind of religious observance may obviously depend in any case upon the individual conscience; and if it is grossly neglected as a whole, it can only be because the Church herself has, for the time being, neglected her duty, or lost her power, or ceased at all events, to "draw" men to the word of her Lord.

As to how far the Legislature should regulate such matters of detail must always be left to time and circumstance; but it should not lose sight of that the true basis of law in this, as on other subjects, should always be the protection of individual rights, rather than the restriction of any purely individual liberty. The true province of the law is to preserve, as far as possible, the Sabbath—for all under its care, not to dictate either directly or by implication how each individual should employ it. The thoughtful Christian will ever seek to remember how often—and continuously in fact—his own Lord was Himself traduced as a Sabbath-breaker, and seek to temper his own judgments there. And, on the other hand, those who conscientiously seek to give to their poorer neighbours greater facilities on this, for some study and contemplation of wonderful works of God, should see to it that this may be done by such efforts as may put no further burden upon already overwork public servants, who now enjoy their day's rest, and who ought not to have it taken from them. How to secure the fulfilment of the really fundamental idea of the Sabbath idst the multifarious and complicated engagements of modern life—to servants espe-ially, and most of all to public servants—seems ly the most pressing problem connected with the Christian Sabbath at the present day.

Sabbatians.—A sect of the Novatians

Sabbatum Magnum ["the great Sab-hath"]).—A name given to Easter Eve, and forly observed as the most solemn fast in whole year, not excepting Good Friday.
vigil was kept throughout the night till krow, the supposed time of the Resurrection, and the early Christians used to assemble this time for prayer and reading the Scripetes. It was also customary to baptise schumens on this day, that they might be mitted to the Easter Communion; and so who had been excommunicated, and had been excommunication or be re-admitted to all the rights of the Church.

Sabellians. [Mendanes.]
Sabellius was the author of the Sabellian heresy. Very little is known of his
ory. He was born at Ptolemais, in Libya, third century, and afterwards an, perhaps, the bishop of that city. He and some of his heretical views to Noetus Smyrna, whose disciple he was, and began ublish his errors about A.D. 260. They ot die out till the fifth century.
Sabellius denied the doctrine of the Trinity, staining that God is Unipersonal, and the names Father, Son, and Holy Ghost describe the same person in different entities. As the Father, God created if; as the Son, He redeemed it; as the Ghost, He sanctifies the elect. These ee, he said, are no more different persons in the body, soul, and spirit of man are persons. A deduction from this view is the Father suffered on the Cross, hence the Sabellians are often included among the Para-

Sack, HANS [b. 1494, d. 1578], a Nuremberg shoemaker, who has been called "the prince and patriarch of the master-singers."
He is said to have composed upwards of six thousand poems, etc., some of which had a great influence on the Reformation. Some of the most famous are Die Wittenbergische Nachtigall, which is a transcription of Luther's translation of the Psalms: Die un-gleichen Kinder Ewe; Hecastus; etc.

Sack, BRETHREN OF THE.—A division of the Boni homines, or PERFECTI [q.v.], founded in France in 1200, so called from the word which they used as a garment. They creased rapidly for a time both in France and England, but were dissolved in 1275, probably because they had adopted heretical doctrines.
There was also an Order of nuns of the same name founded by Saint Louis in 1261, but it was dissolved within a few years. As late as 1537 hempen sacks were worn in London by an Order of nuns.
Sacrament.—This word signified in classical Latin the oath which a soldier took to be faithful to his commander, and its ecclesiastical use appears to be due to Pliny, who, in his celebrated letter to Trajan, A.D. 112, says that he found that the Christians bound themselves with an oath [sacramentum] to be faithful to Christ, and to abstain from crimes. Evidently this refers to the baptismal covenant. Tertullian uses the word regularly in its present sense.

The controversies in the Christian Church concerning the Sacraments are manifold. First with respect to the number. Protestants receive two; the Church of Rome declares there are “neither more nor less than seven,” these being Baptism, Lord’s Supper, Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction. But this is a question more about definitions than realities. Taking Augustine’s definition that a Sacrament is “a visible sign of invisible grace,” it is difficult for those holding Episcopal views to deny that the laying-on of hands in Ordination and Confirmation can be other than sacramental acts. But then, Protestants, while admitting the latitude with which ancient writers used the word, maintain that the same latitude debar us from stopping at seven, and might include at least a dozen more. “Tertullian,” remarks Bishop Jewell, “calleth the helve wherewith Elisha recovered the axe out of the water, the ‘sacrament of wood’; and the whole state of the Christian faith he calleth ‘the sacrament of the Christian religion.’ St. Augustine, in many places, hath ‘the sacrament of the cross.’” Thus he saith, ‘In this figure, or form of the cross, there is contained a sacrament.’ St. Jerome saith, ‘Out of Christ’s side the sacraments of baptism and martyrdom are poured forth both together.’ Leo calleth the promise of virginity a sacrament. St. Hilary, in sundry places, saith, ‘The sacrament of prayer—of fasting—of the Scriptures—of weeping—of thirst.’ St. Bernard calleth the washing of the Apostles’ feet a sacrament.” But yet these same writers made an evident distinction between the two divinely appointed Sacraments of the Church, and those ordinary things to which, by a figure, they extended the term. Both Protestants, however, and Roman Catholics, agree that Baptism and the Lord’s Supper stand on a different level to those of the other ordinances and rites of the Church. The one supplies grace to begin with, the other grace to go on with; they are the two great sacraments of life. These are pronounced by the Church of England in the Catechism to be “generally necessary to salvation,” i.e., necessary to all Christians alike; and another mark which Protestants add of the essential sacraments is that they were instituted by Christ Himself. The Church Catechism defines a Sacrament as— [1] An outward visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace. [2] Ordained by Christ himself. [3] A means whereby we receive grace, and a pledge assure us thereof.

But a second question touches the nature of the Sacraments themselves. The Reform view makes them “badges of Christian profession,” signs and seals of living faith. The Roman view regards them as the solutely necessary channels of Divine grace. According to the Reformed view, faith is required to make them efficacious, while Roman doctrine of the opus operatum makes the virtue absolute.

Sacramentals.—A name given in English Church to rites which have a tain resemblance to the Sacraments in that they are held to be outward means by which Divine gifts are conferred, but they have no visible sign or ceremony ordained by God. Such are Confirmation and Orders Matrimony. The Roman Sacramentals are “orans, tinctus, elens, confessus: daus, dileens;” that is, the prayers of the Church, blessings, pressed bread, confession at Mass in the Office, the blessing of bishop or abbot, and holy water.

Sacramentarians.—A name given to the Lutherans to the Zwinglians, who believe that the elements in the Eucharist are not more than symbols, and that the Body and Blood of Christ cannot be present in them nor be received in any way by the faith. The name has been given to all who what were considered to be unorthodox opinions concerning the nature of the Sacraments, and has also been applied by Roman Catholics to Lutherans, Calvinists, and other Protestants indiscriminately.

Sacramentary or Liber Sacmentorum.—A book of the rites of the other Sacraments of the Roman Catholic Church, with other sacramentals such as the dedication of churches, etc., is represented by the Missal, Pontifical, Ritual. Among the earliest sacramentaries are the Leonine, published by Muratori the Liturgia Romana Vetus, and several sacramentaries, published by Card Thomasius, one of which, the Gelasian, reprinted from a manuscript of the ninth century in the Vatican.

Sacred Heart of Jesus.—This notion, now very common in the Roman Church, originated in 1684 with the St. Margaret Mary Alacoque, of the Order of the Visitatation, a French nun, who declared that our Lord Himself had appeared to her in the flesh, and directed her to propagate worship. It was preached by a Jesuit in La Combe, and rapidly attained to popularity which it now holds, fulfilling its object of familiarising the people with the doctrine of our Lord’s humanity, the outset it encountered firm opposi especially from the Jansenists; and those who ached themselves particularly to this worp were nicknamed Cordiole or Cardiolatrae. 1765 Pope Clement XIII. sanctioned the oblation of the feast of the Sacred Heart, 1 its foundress was canonised as lately as 184. It is now kept on the Friday or Sun- day after the octave of Corpus Christi.

In 1880 an Order of nuns, Dames du Sacré-Cœur, was founded in Paris, and branches of it spread rapidly; but as they followed suit rules, they shared in the general ex- cision of the Jesuits.

Sacrifice.—The worship given to God the oblation of some victim. Sacrifices at it were offered by the fathers of families, the eldest persons in every house; but after- wards priests were ordained to that function. e e coats of skins which God clothed first parents have been held by some of greatest divines to indicate the Divine titution of sacrifice. But the first direct ation of sacrifice is in Gen. iv.: Abel brought of the firstlings of his flock, and of fat thereof, while Cain offered of "the it of the ground." The second is that of ab, who, when he came out of the ark, sacrificed to God for his deliverance. Scripture makes mention likewise of the sacrifices ed by Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. The ifes of the Mosaic dispensation were jated by the institution of the Pasover, ich was followed by a code set down Moses according to the order he had eved from God. After the appointment the priesthood, the sacrifices were only j by the priest in the Tabernacle or the ple. Before the victim or beast designed sacrifice was slain, the person for whom was offered laid his hand upon its head, made a public confession of his sins, ereon the beast was slain, flayed, and ided into parts. The priests took the blood, and sprinkled with it the four horns of altar, and poured the rest at the foot of it. As done, if the sacrifice were an holocaust whole burnt-offering, the victim was bull consumed by fire; but in other sacri- ses, the inside and fat only were burnt, the rites meantime singing hymns of praise to, and entreating Him to accept the sacri- fice. The parts that were not burnt were the use of the priests. The law as laid in Leviticus distinguishes three main sus of sacrifice, the Expiatory (the sin and pass offering), the Impetratory or Suppli- tory (the burnt offering), and the Eucharist (the meat offering and the peace offering). Same classes are observable in the Temple services. Sin Offerings were made at the feasts as well as on the day of atone- ment, and at each new moon [Num. xxviii.]; there were daily Meat Offerings of flour, and wine, besides the showbread renewed daily, the special offerings on the Sabbath and great festivals, and the first-fruits at Pentecost and harvest; and there was a daily Burnt Offering, doubled on the Sabbath, and special at the great festivals. To these must be added the morning and evening incense, and the offerings made on special occasions; as, on the presentation of the first-born, the cleansing of lepers, the fulfilment of Nazarite vows, etc.

From remotest times, the heathen nations sacrificed to their gods to propitiate them, but they also introduced the sacrifice of human beings. In the Scripture we have the burning of victims to Moloch, and the causing children to pass through the fire to Baal, and it was even so in European countries, in the worship offered to Saturn and Jupiter; Dionysius of Halicarnassus speaks of it in the first ages at Tyre, Carthage, and Italy. Plutarch, in his book of Superstition, mentions the sacrificing of children to Saturn; and Pliny tells us the custom had been observed in Rome. It was practised in our own country in Druidical times. We cannot but recognise in all such sacrifices a deep and unconquerable sense in mankind of alienation from God, and the sense of the soul that it needs forgiveness. How this need has been met to the full Christians make no question. [WORK OF CHRIST.]

Sacrilege.—The act of violating sacred things, or subjecting them to profanation; or the desecration of objects consecrated to God. The following were the chief acts of sacrilege punished by the ancient Church:—Accepting the Eucharist from any one other than a priest, the seizure of sacred property, the robbing of churches or graves, the abuse of sacred vessels and altars by employing them for unhallowed purposes, the plundering and misappropriation of alms and donations, a bishop's delivering over a monastery to spoliation, and, according to some, the abstaining from the cup in Holy Communion. There were also acts classed as sacrilege, but which have not been so called by conciliar decree, as, not consuming the Eucharist in church, giving the Eucharist to the dead, misuse of the chism for medicinal or other purposes, drawing crosses on the ground where they may be trodden upon, etc. Committers of sacrilege were often put to death, and were sometimes ranked with murderers, and sometimes with heretics, felons, thieves, and wizards. Those who had stolen church property were thrice ordered to make restitution, and if they still refused were ex- communicated and anathematised.

Sacing Bell or Sancte Bell.—A small bell rung during the celebration of Mass in the Roman Church, to draw the attention of the congregation to the more solemn parts of the service. It is also called the Saints', or Mass, Bell. In former times, a bell hung in a turret outside the church, was rung at the elevation of the Host, to give notice to the sick and others unable to attend Mass.

Sacristan.—The name in the early Church for the minister who took care of the sacred vessels, vestments, and furniture. This office is still retained in many foreign cathedrals. In most of the old English cathedrals the sacristan was the treasurer's deputy and a vicar choral, while in the new foundations he is a minor canon. At the present time, both the name and office of the sacristans of churches have been degraded, the former having changed to sexton, and the latter to an employment including not only the care of the church vestments and furniture, but also many other duties, formerly performed by inferior classes.

Sacristy.—Formerly a part of the diaconum or building attached to ancient basilicas, used by the deacons to keep the sacred vessels for the Mass, and by the priests to put their vestments on and off. It answered to our modern vestry.

Sacy, Louis Isaac de Maître-de, was born at Paris in 1613; died, 1684; educated at the College de Beauvais, under his uncle, Anthony Arnauld, Doctor of the Sorbonne. He was very clever, and applied himself to the study of divinity; was ordained in 1648, and two years afterwards became Confessor and Spiritual Director of the recluses of Port Royal [q.v.]. His first work was his translation of the Divine Service into French, with the hymns in verse, which is commonly called The Canonical Hours of Port Royal. During the persecutions of the Jansenists he withdrew into retirement in the suburb of St. Antoine; but was discovered and imprisoned in the Bastile, where he remained two years and a half. Here he wrote the history of the Old and New Testaments under the name of Royamont. After his release he went to live with his cousin, the Marquis of Pomponne, till his death. His translation of the New Testament, which appeared in 1667, was attacked by several bishops and condemned by Pope Clement IX.; Arnauld and Nicole, two of the Port Royalists, defended it, and the controversy lasted twenty years.

Sadolet, Cardinal and Bishop of Carpentras, born at Modena in 1478; died at Rome, 1547. He was educated at Ferrara and at Rome. In 1514 Pope Leo X. made him his Secretary, and three years after Bishop of Carpentras, in Avignon. On the death of Leo he retired to his bishopric; but Clement VII., the successor of Adrian VI., sent for him to return to Rome, which he did for three years. In 1536 Paul III. again called him to Rome, and made him Nuncio to France, to persuade King Francis to conclude a peace with Charles V.; and on his return Sadolet was made Cardinal. He was buried in the Church of St. Peter ad Vincula. He wrote a commentary on St. Paul's epistles to the Romans; Interpretatio Psalmorum; Philosophica Consolatione et Meditatione Adversi; De Libris Recte Instituendis; Philosophiae Laudibus, etc.

Saint [the Gallicised form of the Late Latin sanctus, which is the equivalent of the Greek hagios].—This word is of constant use both in the LXX. and Greek Testament as a simple adjective, applied both to persons and to things. It is used absolutely, in sense of "Holy One," four times of blessed Lord [Mark i. 24; Luke iv. 34; iii. 14; 1 John ii. 20]. It is applied to those who have been born into the Jewish covenant many times in Old Testament and once in the New [Matt. xxvii. 52], and to all baptised Christians Acts ix. 13, 32, 41, xxvi. 10; Romans viii. 27, xii. 13, xv. 26, 26, 31, xvi. 2, 1 Cor. ii. 2, vi. 1, xiv. 33, xvi. 1, 15; 2 Cor. i. 1, vii. 4, ix. 1, xii. 13; Eph. i. 1, 18, ii. 19, iii. 8, 18, iv. 12, v. 3, vi. 18; 1 Pet. i. 1, iv. 22; Col. i. 2, 4, 12, 26; 1 Thess. 3; 2 Thes. i. 10; Tim. v. 10; Phil. v. 1 Heb. vi. 10, xiii. 24; Jude 3, 14; Rev. v. 3, vii. 1, 10, xiv. 12, xv. 3, xvii. 6, xviii. 24, xix. 8, xx. 9.

This shows clearly that all Christians regarded as saints ["consecrated ones"] virtue of their calling. And this is the meaning, at least in part, of the words of the Catechism, the "Communion of Saints"—the union of all those who "have put on Christ" have Christ, and with each other through Him.

In the earliest days of Christianity wide meaning continued. All who professed the name of Christ were called and consecrated to be holy. Soon came a secondary and more restricted meaning—those Christians who walked according to the calling by leading holy lives, inasmuch as the Christian profession in the first days involved danger from persecution. The word soon came to be applied to those "who loved not their lives unto the death," gave evidence of their love and faithfulness, sealing their confession with their lives, consequently the observance of saints' days. Each Church commemorated its own martyrs and confessors, and the day of their martyrdom was the day of commemoration. At such occasions there was a celebration of Holy Communion in token of the doctrine of the Creed.

This was the origin of saint's day observances. The intercommunion of Churches which grew with the organic and unitary unity led to the general adoption of observances. Saints of one Church were celebrated in other Churches, and it became customary to hold special services commemorating saints who belonged to particular Churches. The growth of l urpation led to the claim of the Popes to clare who were true saints. [CANONISATION.]
the Reformation the names of the greater aber were removed from the Calendar.
ose of the Apostles and Evangelists were ained, and special provision was made for ly Communion on those days. [RED LETTER

without such provision. [BLACK LETTER

ated in the Eastern Church in the fourth

Saint Alban. [ALBAN, ST.]
Saint Simon de Rouvroy, COMTE DE HENRI DE, a French social philosopher, at Paris in 1760; died there 1825. He educated as a soldier, and in 1777 went to the Americans in their war against the
sh. He was from his earliest years pos-ised the idea that he was born to play a at part, and on his return to France gave his profession, convinced that his business
"to study the march of the human spirit, order eventually to labour for the advancement of human civilisation." In 1786 he velled in Spain, where he formed a project making a canal to join Madrid with the while in Mexico he had proposed to an isthmus through the country. He strongly in favour of the Revolution, his took no active part in it. He, partnership with the Prussian Graf von stem, bought up a large quantity of the conented estates, intending to found a scientific industrial school, but squandered his ser, and in 1797 found that he had only 00 remaining to him. It was at this time he began the studies that he thought essary to the carrying out of his plan of reelling society; but when, in 1807, his edu-ion was finished, he found himself in the bject poverty. In 1812 he published his first work, Letters from an Inhabitant of va to his Contemporaries, stating his Views Modern Society. This was followed by duction to the Scientific Labours of the eteenth Century. In 1814 he and Augustin erry wrote The Reorganisation of European ety. Saint Simon had by this time gained ad him a few ardent admirers, as Rod-es, Thierry, Comte, Bazard, and Enfantin, books were little read, and no notice
ken of him outside his narrow circle.
and his poverty so depressed him that empted to commit suicide, but was pre-led. His last work was an exposition of religion, Nouveau Christianisme [1825], ich the prominent idea is that Christian-progressive system, continually gain-new power, but retaining through all the principle, "Love one another." The stage had been Catholicism, then came Protestantism, and lastly Saint-Simonianism.
So far as the nature of this new or Saint-Simonian religion was defined, its peculiarity was to rest on two principles—the one relating to the end after which humanity was to strive, the other to the means whereby this end was to be attained. "The most rapid possible amelioration, physical and moral, of the condition of the class the most numerous and poor"—such was the first principle, defining the end prescribed by the new religion for all the efforts and labours of humanity. To the attainment of this end, however, a right organisation of society was indispensable; and the principle of this organisation or reconstruction was formuated thus—"To each man a vocation according to his capacity, and to each capacity a recompense according to its works." His last act was to found Le Producteur, a journal which was to proclaim this new religion.
The Saint-Simonians became extinct in 1822,
but there are still traces of their doctrine
among the modern French school of thought.

Saints, Invocation of. [INVOCATION
of SAINTS.]

Sales, Francis de. [FRANCIS DE SALES.]

Salisbury, Bishopric of. The seat of this diocese was originally Old Sarum, the Saxon town of Scarobury, to which place the See was removed in 1075 by Bishop Herman, who in 1058 had become bishop of the united dioceses of Sherborne [q.v.] and Ramsbury.
He commenced to build a cathedral here,
which was completed by his successor, Osmond. In 1220 Bishop Poore removed the seat of his diocese to Salisbury. In 1542 Dorsetshire was transferred to the newly-formed See of Bristol; in 1836 Berkshire was joined to the diocese of Oxford. Gloucester and Bristol were united under one bishop, and Berkshire was restored to Salisbury.

Bishop Richard le Poore, in 1220, set about building a cathedral, and continued it till he was translated to Durham in 1229. He founded also a Cistercian nunnery in his native place of Tarrant, in Dorsetshire. Amongst Enlish cathedrals it shares, along with St. Paul's, the characteristic of being built all in one period, the first half of the thirteenth century.
The lofty spire, upon which the repute of Salisbury Cathedral is rested, seems to have been no part of the original design, and was added some time after by an unknown architect, who nearly overtaxed the capability of the existing building, which was not designed to bear such a weight. Salisbury is peculiarly rich in the survival of consecration crosses, which in mediaval days were carved or painted on the walls of churches. There were no monks at Salisbury—a fact of which we are reminded by the choir-stalls being all placed east of the transept. One curiosity among the monuments is the recumbent figure of a so-called boy bishop [Boy Bishop], but some suppose that this may be a small stone erected to cover the relics of St. Osmund, the founder of the Sec.

From the time of Bishop Poore to the Reformation, the bishops of Salisbury were not men of mark, excepting Hallam [1407-17], who was made a Cardinal and was present at the Council of Constance, at which place he died. Since the Reformation there have been John Jewell, Gilbert Burnet, and others who were translated to other Sees, of whom short biographical notices will be found.

The cathedral chapter consists of a dean, four canons, three archdeacons, forty-two canons non-residential or prebendaries, and four minor canons. The income of the See is £5,000. The diocese comprises the whole of Dorsetshire and Wilts, with portions of counties adjacent, and has 487 benefices.

Salmasius, Claudius, or Claude de Saunmaise, was born at Semur, in Burgundy, in 1588; died at Spa, 1653. His mother being a Protestant, he was brought up in that religion. He studied at Paris and Heidelberg. He lived near Paris till 1632, when he was called to an honorary professorship at Leyden. He received many tempting offers from Cardinals Richelieu and Mazarin to return to France, but refused them all. He was undoubtedly a man of great learning, though too discursive to be accurate, and his historical and theological writings were considerable value. Charles II. asked him to write a defence of his father and of monarc, and accordingly, in 1649, appeared Defer Regia pro Carolo J., which was answered Milton's Defensio pro Populo Anglicano, died while writing a reply to Milton.

Salutation, Angelical.—A form of vice in the Church of Rome consisting of angels' salutation, that of Elizabeth, and other words added not long since. It thus:—"Ave Maria, gratia plena; Doni tecum; benedicta tu in mulieribus, et in horti mortalis nostris." Amen.

The latter clause Sancta Maria, mater ora pro nobis peccatoribus, et in hora mortis nostrae," Amen.

The latter clause Sancta Maria, mater ora pro nobis peccatoribus, was added, as s say, in the fifteenth century; but the last we nunc et in hora mortis nostrae, were inserted the order of Pope Pius V., 1568. Maber, in Hierozoicon, observes that Urban II. ord a bell to be tolled thrice a day, especial morning and evening, that people migh put in mind of repeating this salutation, that God might prosper the Christian arm the recovery of the Holy Land; which c having continued about 134 years, fell neglect, till Gregory IX. revived it with addition of a constant noon-bell. This called the Angelus bell. The repeating t the beginning of the sermon was first joined by St. Dominic, or, as some say Vincent Ferrars.

Salvation [the translation of the Arised Version of the Heb. yeshuah, "safe ease," and of the Greek soteria, "safe health."]—The word occurs in about passages in the Old Testament and about in the New Testament, and in the latter use generally to denote all the benefit cured to believers through the life, death resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ. To include deliverance from condemnation account of sin, from the sinful nature herited from Adam, and from death, and final attainment of a state of holiness, ness, largely increased powers, effectual so for God, and immortality.

Salvation Army, is a religious organisation which was originated in the of London in 1865, by Mr. William Booth leader and general. He was born at Not ham in 1829, and in 1843 became a mem of the Methodist New Connexion. He in 1844 set apart as an evangelist, and in 1856 he returned to the regular pasto he felt himself out of his sphere, and in requested to be allowed to again beor evangelist. The request was refused, left the Society and began an independen career. He worked in Cornwall, New and other places, and in 1865 hired a at Whitechapel. The society was deve saying the passage, many of the laity who were present, even if they had not attended the service, were moved to tears by the beauty of the words and the solemnity of the occasion.

A large crowd gathered outside, eager to catch a glimpse of the event. The air was thick with excitement, and a sense of history filled the atmosphere. People from all walks of life came to witness this momentous occasion.

The service ended with a benediction, and the congregation filed out, carrying with them the memories of a day they would never forget. The experience had been both spiritually uplifting and deeply moving.

As the sun set over the cathedral, leaving a golden hue across the sky, the thoughts of those who had been present echoed through the minds of the participants. The day would be remembered as a turning point, a moment of grace and renewal.
by the Jews as heretics, as they accept only the Pentateuch. They possess some very valuable manuscripts, among them an ancient copy of the Pentateuch, written in Phœnician characters, or, according to some, the ancient Hebrew characters in use before the Babylonish Captivity. There are some differences between this Pentateuch and that of the Jews, but they are mostly, no doubt, owing to the inaccuracy of transcribers. Their worship is like that of the Jews, but they always take off their shoes before entering the synagogue.

Samosatians. [Paul of Samosata.]

San Benito.— The garments worn by the victims of the Inquisition at the Auto da Fé. They had devils and flames pointed on them. If the victim was to be burnt alive, the flames pointed upwards; if not, downwards.

Sanchez, Thomas [b. at Cordova in 1551; d. at Granada, 1610], a Spanish Jesuit. He studied theology and law, and his book De Sacramento Matrimonii became famous, and would have been valuable had it not been for its intolerable coarseness.

Sanchuniathon.— A Phœnician philosopher and historian, who is supposed to have lived at the time of, or before, the Trojan War. Of his works nothing remains but fragments, quoted by Eusebius and Theodoret, the first of whom speaks of him as an accurate historian who wrote a valuable work on the history of the Jews. Sanchuniathon is mentioned by Porphry, Athenæus, and Suidas, and Eusebius says that one of his works was translated into Greek by Philo. Modern writers have said that the fragments were forgeries, either by Philo or by Porphry, accepted by Eusebius as genuine, and it is now doubted by many whether he ever existed. If so, it is still probable that he lived at a later period than has been generally assigned to him.

Sanctification.— The work of the Holy Spirit whereby man is renewed in the image of God, and enabled to die to sin. It is based upon the holiness of God, who is not absolutely pure in Himself, but communi­cates His purity to His people through the Spirit. Sanctification is not to be confounded with con­version, which is forgiveness of sin, but the spiritual life is the perfection of that. Sanctification is not to be confounded with call­ification, which is the promise of God's mercy. Sanctification is a gradual progress towards holiness, for­giving all sin, and changing the heart through the power of the Holy Spirit. Sanctification removes the guilt, and Sanctification is the power, of sin; Sanctification confers the gift of the avenging wrath of God. Sanctification conforms us to His image. Sanctification is not to be confounded with sanctification, which is the promise of God, and in doctrines and promises of the Gospel.

Sanction, Pragmatic. [PRAGMATIC SANCTION.]

Sanctuary.— The eastern part of the church, enclosed by a railin which the altar is placed. In ancient times churches were divided into two parts—the altar or court for the clergy, and the sanctity...
Sanctuary, Right of.—By sanctuary is meant the privilege of criminals who fled to certain sacred places to secure freedom from arrest and punishment so long as they remain therein. This custom, which is now almost everywhere done away with, was derived from the Levitical law of refuge, by which, under express appointment, six cities were made cities of refuge for the involuntary slain. From the time of Constantine onwards certain churches were set apart many countries to be asylums for fugitives from the hand of justice. The right as not granted to all churches, but was reserved on special ones by the Emperors, who so made laws to prevent the abuse of the privilege, which was intended for the weak, accASET, and misunderstood, and not for condemned criminals. Thus we read, "All churches before the time of Charlemagne were yla, and for all sorts of criminals; but he, a Capitular, A.D. 779, conformable to one of Ulfon and Pepin passed about 744, decreed at churches should not be asyla for criminals who had committed such crimes as the w punished with death;" and if he did not so far as to make it lawful to force a criminal from his asylum, yet, what came to the same thing, he prohibited people from venging them any nourishment. At first the right of sanctuary was granted only to the tar and nare of a church, but was afterwards extended also to the court, gardens, etc.

It seems that this custom was of very early date in Britain, as the Druids gave certain sacred trees as asyla. There are legends to a effect that sanctuary was granted in 180 the church at Winchester, and in 604 to Westminster. The first reliable fact is an enactment of Ina, King of Wessex, in 690, at the lives of all who had committed pitiful offences and had escaped to a church, should be saved, and that those deserving of curces should be forgiven. In several English churches there was a stone seat beside the tar for those who sought sanctuary. Two these still remain at Beverley and Hexam. The "Abjuration of the Realm" is an ancient law by which a felon who had taken sanctuary might within forty days go in sackcloth to the coroner and take an oath to leave the realm, and not return without the King's leave. If he did not fulfill his promise he was deprived of his sanctuary and afterwards became a Sandemanian, [originally called Glassite, by which name they are still known in Scotland].—A sect founded about 1728 by John Glass, a Scotchman, and originally a minister of the Presbyterian Church. He was suspended by the Synod of Angus and Mearns for holding heretical opinions, which he published in a book called The Testimony of the King of Martyrs. Among other views, he held that national establishments of religion are inconsistent with the teaching of the New Testament, and that there ought to be no connection between Church and State. His doctrines were further developed by his son-in-law, Robert Sandeman [b. at Perth, 1718; d. in America, 1771], who maintained the necessity of justification by faith, but at the same time defined faith as a simple belief in the Divine testimony, differing in no way from belief in any ordinary human testimony. Sandeman established the sect in London and America, and it exists to the present day; it never numbered many followers, and now they are probably under two thousand. The Sandemanians have revived several customs of the primitive Church, such as abstaining from blood and from things strangled, the holding of love-feasts, the kiss of charity, washing of each other's feet, community of goods, the use of the lot, and the celebration of the Eucharist weekly. They practise mutual exhortation, and believe in a plurality of elders or pastors, who are set apart from amongst themselves, engagement in trade being no obstacle. The late celebrated Professor Michael Faraday was a Sandemanian.

Sanderson, Robert, Bishop of Lincoln [b. in Yorkshire, 1587; d. at Lincoln, in January, 1663]. Educated at Lincoln College, Oxford, and was made Logic Reader of that college in 1608; afterwards became a Fellow and Proctor of the University. Having taken orders, Sanderson was appointed Prebendary of Southwell in 1615 and of Lincoln in 1629; rector of a living in Lincolnshire, and, on the recommendation of Archbishop Laud, Chaplain to Charles I. in 1631. It is said that he was the King’s favourite preacher, for Charles was a great admirer of casuistry, in which Sanderson excelled; and being with the Court at Oxford in 1636 he was made a D.D. In 1642 he obtained the Regius Professorship of Divinity at Oxford, but was prevented from entering on the appointment through the outbreak of the Civil Wars, and in 1648 was ejected by the Visitors commissioned by Parliament. He accompanied the King to Hampton Court and the Isle of Wight. In his younger days he had been somewhat of a Puritan and a Calvinist, but his opinions changed later, and in 1661 he wrote a treatise called Episcopacy, as established by Law in England, not prejudicial to Regal Power. After the Restoration he was made Bishop of Lincoln, and assisted at the Savoy Conference; and in the short time which elapsed before his death he did much towards increasing the value of the poorer benefices in his diocese. Sanderson was noted as an antiquary, but was chiefly famed for his casuistry. He wrote De Juramentis Obligatione [1661], Nine Cases of Conscience [1678], Logicae Artis Compendium, De Obligatione Conscientiae, and other works. Bishop Sanderson lives permanently in the Anglican Church, through the Preface prefixed to the Book of Common Prayer: “It hath been the wisdom,” etc. This Preface is his work, and is deeply interesting as expressing the position taken by the Church of England at its restoration after the Revolution. It glances at the history of the past, and reviews each of the revisions, asserting that, all through, the essentials have continued the same. One phrase used in this Preface has become celebrated, “the middle way between two extremes.” A countless number of preachers and essayists have adduced this as expressing the position of the Church of England between Romanism and Calvinism; but an examination of the context will show that the Bishop is merely expressing the moderation and calmness of the revisions; the retention of fundamental principles, the stiffness which refuses any reform. And the objects of revision which he declares are sought are, the preservation of peace and unity, the procuring of reverence and exciting of piety and devotion, and the cutting off of occasion of evil. It will probably be considered by those who study the document most carefully, that it places Sanderson in a highly favourable light.

Sandys, Edwin, Archbishop of York, the son of a gentleman of Lancashire, was born in 1528 and died in 1588. He was educated at Cambridge, and while there was converted to Protestantism. In course of time he w made Master of Catherine Hall. He was Vice-Chancellor of the University when Duke of Northumberland marched through with his troops, with the intention of setting Lady Jane Grey on the throne. Happen to be at Cambridge on Sunday, the Duke ordered Sandys to preach before him, who did, taking for his text Joshua i. 16. The Duke was much pleased, and promised promotion, but within a very few days they were both in the Tower. By the interest of some influential friends he was liberated at the of four months, crossed to Germany, stayed there till the accession of Queen Elizabeth. She made him Bishop of Worcester in 1559. He was translated to Bishop of Worcester in 1570, and thence to York in 1577. His literary work was a volume of sermons.

Sanhedrim.—The supreme national tribunal of the Jews, instituted in the time the Maccabees. According to the Talmud, Moses founded it when he chose seven elders to assist him in the wilderness judging the children of Israel; but of there is no satisfactory evidence. There seven members of the Sanhedrim, hes the president, who was usually the priest. They had power over secular as well as spiritual matters, and were elected by among the priests, elders, or heads of famii and scribes or doctors of the law. In cou they sat in a semicircle, with the presiden the centre; they assembled in the Hall Squares, or some other building in immediate vicinity of the Temple; at the trial of our Lord they sat in the high priest palace. This council became extinct in 4.

Sardica, Council of.—According to of Sozomen, this Council was held 347, but it probably took place in 344 to the end of 343. It was called together the purpose of deciding the disputed quest of the Arian controversy, and of healing breach they had caused between the East and Western Churches. There were pro only seventy-six of the Eastern and than three hundred of the Western bishop It was impossible to effect a union, and meeting served rather to widen than to the breach. The bishops of the West ha demanded that Athanasius and his frieshould be allowed to attend the assembly regular bishops, and those of the East ha refused to grant this, a total rupture place between the parties. The Wes bishops continued to hold their session Sardica; the Eastern withdrew to Philopolis, in Thrace, so that the only issue of Council was to completely sever the bishop fellowship between the two Churches. It unwilling to add anything to the Coun Nicæa, or to form a new Confession of F they made twenty or twenty-one canons fo general discipline of the Church, the fourth which, according to the Roman Catholics, as the principal step to the sovereignty of the Pope in the Church, by ruling that an oposd might be made to the Bishop of Rome quality of supreme judge. It is doubtful, however, whether the Council intended to do more than confer on Julius, who was then pope, a personal privilege, as an expedient for time of trouble and division. The Trullan council adopted the canons of the Council of Nicaea for the Eastern as well as the Western church, though the division prevents it from being considered an ecumenical council.

Sarpi, Paolo, generally called Fra Paolo, as born in Venice in 1552, died in 1629. He rily showed great talents, and the scope of learning must have been wonderful. He came one of the Order of the Servites, and the age of twenty-seven was made Provincial. The quarrel between the Commonwealth of Venice and Pope Paul V., was the cause much anxiety to him. He denied the right the Pope to interfere in secular matters, and asserted that Papal excommunication was by valid so long as it was perfectly just. He was summoned to appear at Rome; and his refusal the Pope excommunicated him. But this did not affect him much, for he conduced, with his tongue and pen, to assert the rights of the Commonwealth. The Pope's tried gained him many enemies, and once was set upon in the street by five men, so wounded him severely, though not mortally. Although not a Protestant, he strongly urged the reform of the church, and he was in correspondence with several leaders of the Reformation. In 1607 was concluded between the Commonwealth of Venice and Rome, and the ban of communication was removed from Fra olo. He was always in disfavour notwithstanding, and after his death Urban VIII., hearing that the people looked upon him as a saint and were in the habit of praying at his nb, sent to forbid it. His writings are many, but the most celebrated is his History the Council of Trent, which first appeared Geneva in 1619. It is written from a ong anti-Roman point of view, and might, need, be the work of a Protestant. It has is translated into English, French, and Satan is a Hebrew word signifying "latter" or "accuser," and the name is found in I. and II. Zech. iii., Ps. cxvi. The doctrine of his personality seems undoubtedly more clearly taught in the later than in the earlier books of the Bible, and the gloss which is put upon the New Testament teaching, implying that his personality is merely a Hebrew form of expressing an "impersonation," is one which certainly does considerable violence to the letter of Scripture. The history of the origin of evil and of the fall of Satan from heaven is but dimly revealed to us. More of our popular theology than we are commonly aware of is derived from Milton's magnificent poem. But though we are left greatly in the dark as to the Fall of the Devil, we are in none as to his works.

Let it be granted, in the words of Archbishop Trench, that "he is only known to us through his temptations, through the evil suggestions which he causes to rise up out of the deep of our hearts, through the fiery darts with which he seeks to set on fire in us the whole course of nature . . . so that for all practical purposes the words of St. James, 'Resist the devil and he will flee from you,' might be translated into such language as this: Strive manfully against temptations and you have God's promise and pledge that these, instead of overcoming you, shall be overcome by you." But the temptations, are real and certain enough. The doctrine of the personality of the Tempter is nowhere asserted in the Church Creeds, and some English divines have declined to affirm it dogmatically. But the language of Scripture and of Christ throws a very serious responsibility upon those who deny it. Kingsley in one of his vigorous sentences roundly declares that the denial is one of the most dangerous of modern heresies, and that the devil's latest device is "shamming dead."

Other names for Satan are Devil [Gr. diabolos, "slanderer" or "accuser"]; BEELZEBUB ["master of the house"], a heathen deity who was thus made a synonym for the prince of evil, a later form of BAAL-ZEBUL ["lord of flies," probably in allusion to the fact that he was regarded as the sun-god]; APOLLYON and ASADDON, two names meaning in Greek and Hebrew respectively "destroyer."

The two great poetic creations by Milton and Goethe of Satan and Mephistopheles have had a great effect upon religious thought, yet hardly more so than the horned and cloven hoofed figure of popular notion. This latter figure was the prescriptive mode of representing the devil in the medieval miracle plays, and in consequence has come to be a part of the vulgar notion and language. "To detect the cloven foot" is a phrase which is so common as almost to lead the unthinking to conclude that there must be Scriptural authority for the idea that the devil is so marked.

Meanwhile it should be seriously considered by those who reject the doctrine of the personality of Satan, that such rejection may be but a step to the denial of a great deal more.
The New Testament is, from beginning to end, an earnest testimony of a real battle between the kingdoms of light and darkness; and to cast doubt on the reality of that fight is to paralyse effort, to put off the armour of God,
and to set aside watchfulness and prayer.

Saturnians.—A sect of Gnostics, the followers of Saturninus, a native of Antioch, who lived in the second century. They held doctrines very similar to those of the Basililians [q.v.], but very little is known either of them or of their leader.

Saturninus, Sr.—A priest of Abitana, near Carthage, at the time of the Diocletian persecution [304], who, whilst celebrating the Holy Communion, was seized, with four of his children and forty-four other persons, and carried before the magistrate, and then marched in chains to Carthage. Amongst them was Dativus, a senator, and he, being the most considerable personage, was the first to be questioned by Anulus the Pro-consul. He testified boldly to Christianity, and he and the rest of the congregation were one after another put on the rack, and at last it came to Saturninus's turn. The magistrate tried to confuse him and make him contradict himself; but, finding this impossible, he was sent to be tortured like the others, some of whom had died in their agonies. One of the victims at this time was a lady of good birth named Victoria, who for a time was treated with more leniency in the hopes of persuading her to recant. When at her trial
she announced that she was a Christian,
her brother tried to persuade the magistrates that she was not in possession of her senses. She assured the Governor that she was, and desired nothing better than to lay down her life for her religion, and she gained her desire some days after. Saturninus and his four sons suffered death at different times;
some of the rest died in prison from starvation or want of air. The Roman martyrlogy commemorates them all on Feb. 11th.

Saumaise, Claude de. [Salmasius, Claudius.]

Saunders, Lawrence.—A Protestant martyr in the reign of Queen Mary. He was educated at Eton, and then passed three years at King's College, Cambridge. On leaving the University he was bound apprentice to Sir
W. Chester, a wealthy London merchant; but his master, seeing his mind bent to study rather than the life of a merchant, released him before he had served his full time. He was licensed to preach just at the beginning of Edward's reign, and became Reader, first at Potheringay, and then at the Minster of Lichfield; he was then appointed to the living of Church Langton, in Leicestershire, and afterwards to Allhallows, Bread Street.
On the accession of Mary, his friends urged him to fly the country, but he remained firmly at his post. On October 15th, 1553, preached against the Mass, and by order Bonner was arrested and committed to Marshalsea on May 8th, 1554. He, together with Coverdale, Bradford, and others, signed a declaration stating the conditions on which they were prepared to dispute before University of Cambridge. On Jan. 30, 1555, after having been kept in pri son for fifteen months, he was brought before a magistrate, and then taken to a pricel in the Comptier, in his own parish Bread Street; whence he was conveyed to Marshalsea, and there burnt, Feb. 8th.
He wrote many interesting letters to his friends, and to these, encouraging them to constance their faith. These will be found at length in Foxe's Book of Martyrs.

Saurin, Elie, was born at Usseau, in valley of Fragelas, 1639, but lived most of his life in Utrecht, where he was appointed priest of the Walloon Church in 1671. W the French took the town in 1672, many of them, though Roman Catholics, used to go there to hear him preach. He had throughout his life a great opponent, M. Jurien. A De-synod thinking that a book the latter had published was not orthodox, asked Saurin to write an essay, entitled An Examination of M. Jurie-V Divinity. Besides the books on this qua
he wrote very little, a tract on the love of God and love of our neighbour being the only worthy of notice. He died on Es-Sun., 1703.

Savonarola was born at Ferrara on Sept. 21st, 1452. He seems to have been a quiet, reserved child, but at the same time to have shown signs at an early age of great intellectual powers. His grandfather had been a celebrated physician, and it was decided that Girolamo should follow his same profession. But a distaste for this, combined with a disappointment in love, determined him to devote himself to the religious life of a monastery. He left home secretly in April, 1475, and took monastic vows at the convent of St. Domenico at Bologna. He went to Ferrara in 1485, and reached there several times, but created no stir. He asked at first to be allowed to undertake merely the most humble offices in the monastery, but the superiors very soon recognised his intellectual powers, and employed him to instruct the novices. Suddenly at Bologna he burst out, entrancing all hearts and filling the church with excited crowds, who were spellbound under his magnificent oratory. Thence he was sent to Florence, and it was in this city that he made his fame most famous in history. Lorenzo de Medici was then at the height of his power and magnificence, and under his influence the whole town was given up to worldly and sensual pleasures. Savonarola set about awakening the citizens to a sense of their danger. He preached his first sermon in Florence in 1483: but, accustomed to the warned, subtle discourses of the Schoolmen, the people at first treated with contempt one who in simple, unpolished words urged them to repent of their sins. Savonarola was not discouraged by this failure. He preached for a year or two in small towns outside the walls of Florence. In 1490 he returned, and for a very few weeks had taken the whole city by storm. He became so powerful, and was supported by so many influential citizens, that Lorenzo became uneasy, and Savonarola was privately urged to be a little less bitter against those in authority; but he refused to yield. In 1491 he was made Prior of the convent of St. Mark's, but utterly refused to conform to the usage of paying homage to Lorenzo for it. In 1492 the duke was on his death-bed, and although he had been ranted absoluto by one of the attendant priests, his mind was not at rest. Suddenly he thought of Savonarola, who had ever been afraid to speak the truth to him, and caused him to be sent for. Writers differ as to the result of this interview—obliant, a courtier, asserting that Savonarola ranted absoluto; Burlamacchi, a friend of Savonarola, asserting equally decidedly that it was denied. As the latter account was written at a time when Savonarola was in very bad favour, and there were plenty of people who would have been only too glad to deny it had it been false, it appears the most probable. During the rule of Lorenzo's successor, Piero, Florence lost some of its prestige; but it still had great power, and Savonarola was without question the most influential man in the city. The moral improvement which he effected in Florence was most remarkable; the whole aspect of the city changed for the better; but his work now began to cause uneasiness at Rome. It is said that Pope Alexander VI. offered him a Cardinal's hat, hoping thereby to silence him. Savonarola declined the offer. The Pope then ordered him to appear in Rome; but he refused to obey. In 1497 he was excommunicated. A powerful hostile party was formed against him in Florence, which at the beginning of 1498 handed him over to the Inquisition, and on May 23rd of the same year he was publicly burned. As an author his fame rests on his Treatise on the 51st Psalm, his Compendium Revelationum, and his Trionfo della Croce.

Savoy Conference, held at the Savoy, London, in 1661, between the Church of England Catholic divines and the Puritans. Their object was to endeavour to settle differences, and so arrange the Prayer Book as to make it acceptable to both parties. The conference consisted of twelve bishops, amongst whom were Sanderson, Pearson, and Sparrow; and twelve Puritan divines, amongst whom were Baxter, Calamy, Reynolds, and Lightfoot. The Presbyterian divines desired the restriction of responses to the "Amen," the abolition of saints' days and of commemoration of the dead; a change with regard to the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels, with the introduction of extemporaneous prayers; and the optional use of the ring in matrimony, the sign of the cross in baptism, the surplice, and kneeling at the Holy Communion. After sitting from April 15th to July 24th, they could come to no conclusion, not a single point being yielded to the Puritans or by them, and the Conference finally reported that "The Church's welfare, unity, and peace, and His Majesty's satisfaction, were ends upon which they were all agreed; but as to means they could not come to any harmony." The few alterations made in the Prayer Book immediately afterwards by a committee of bishops, such as the addition to the Lessons of the Story of Bel and the Dragon, made it if anything still more objectionable to the Puritans; and the consequence of the failure of this attempt at compromise, followed as it was by the Act of Uniformity in the following year, was the virtual exclusion of some 2,000 Puritan ministers from the Church, and the loss of many thousands of their adherents.

Sawtre, William (the name was originally Chatry), the first of the Lollard martyrs.
Monkish writers have blackened him as a licentious man and a profligate; but there is no hint of this in the many and minute charges brought against him in Convocation, and we may safely assume that the charge is the commonplace of clerical vituperation against all who were suspected of heresy. By his own confession, we know that he sometimes omitted to say his matins and his hours, in order to hear confessions, and to celebrate the Mass, or to give the time to study and prayer; and that he had often sanctioned the abandonment of vows of pilgrimage, if committed into sums of money to be distributed amongst the poor. He was parish priest of St. Margaret's, King's Lynn, and was charged before Bishop Spenser, of Norwich, with heresy and "diverse felonies and treasons." He was convicted and condemned to death; but publicly recanted at Lynn, and received a full pardon from the King [Feb. 6th, 1400]. After this he removed to London, where he became chaplain of the parish of St. Sythe, or St. Osyth, Walbrook. Here his conscience would not let him rest; but he taught and preached, openly and secretly, the same or similar opinions to those which he had previously denounced as heresy. He was now called to answer before the Convocation, and on Saturday, February 12th, 1401, was charged with having taught the following eight dangerous propositions:

1. That he would not adore the Cross on which Christ suffered, but only Christ, who suffered on it.
2. That he would rather bow to a temporal king than a wooden Cross.
3. That he would rather honour the bodies of saints than the true Cross, supposing it were before him.
4. That he would rather worship a man confessing and repentant than the Cross of Christ.
5. That he was more bound to worship a man whom he knew to be predestined than an angel of God.
6. That if any one has made a vow to visit the holy places at Rome or Canterbury, or anywhere else, to obtain some temporary benefit [e.g. to be cured of some disease or to secure some property], he is not bound to fulfil his vow literally, but may spend his money on the poor.
7. That any priest or deacon is more bound to preach the Word of God than to say the Hours.
8. That after the words of consecration in the Eucharist the bread remains bread, and nothing more.

He acknowledged that he had so taught, and accordingly sentence of degradation was passed on him, and forthwith carried out. He was then handed over to the secular powers, and by them condemned to be burnt at Smithfield.

Scala Santa

A flight of steps in the Church of St. John Lateran at Rome, said to be those which Christ ascended when taken before Pilate. The Roman Catholics believe that they were miraculously carried from Jerusalem after the crucifixion. A certain number of indulgences are promised to those who ascend the steps and pray at the top, and thousands of pilgrims flock to them every year. It was while Martin Luther was crawling up these steps on his knees that he received that strong impression concerning justification by faith alone, which thenceward shaped his whole work and life.

Scaliger

Joseph Justus [b. at Agen, France, 1540; d. at Leyden, 1609].—Studied at Bordeaux and Paris, and became Honor Professor at the University of Leyden 1592. He joined himself to the Reform and was noted as a remarkable linguist, philosopher, mathematician, and poet. His principal works are philological, but also published the first system of chronology, the Thesaurus Temporum in 1608, and Expos Numismatis Constantini in 1604.

Scapular

[Lat. scapulæ, "shoulders"]

Originally a garment worn by monks to protect the dress; it practically consisted of a long piece of cloth with a hole in the center through which the head was placed, the coming down in front and behind. Devotional scapulars in the Roman Church are miñiatae of this, consisting of a small square piece for the chest and another for the back, connected by two strings, which cross the shoulder. There are five modern scapulars, but that known is a badge of veneration for the Virgin Mary. The legend concerning it is that it was given by the Virgin Mary to Simon St. General of the Carmelite Order at Cambriac with the words, "This will be the privilege you and all Carmelites; no one dying this scapular will suffer eternal burning."

Other four scapulars are:—[1] That given the Trinitarians; [2] the Servite scapular the Seven Dolours; [3] that of the Immaculate Conception, propagated by Ursula Beninc and given by the Treatises; and [4] the scapular of the Passion, originated by a Sista Charity at Paris, and given by the Vincent Fathers.

Scarf

An ecclesiastical ornament, so times worn instead of the stole, which closely resembles; the difference is that a scarf is folded, and very much broader, coming nearly the entire front of the surplice [See Stole.] It is of great antiquity, seems to have been originally worn only members of a cathedral chapter, and by tors of Divinity of the universities. Its name has been used for prelates of nobility, and on parochial clergy places where the stole is not in use. It generally of black silk, or of crepe on casings of mourning, and at weddings is occasionally of white silk.

Sceptic

[From the Gr. skeptōnai, "to doubt"]—One who professes to weigh evidence and to refuse belief in any given statement until he is satisfied of its truth. The name is derived from the old Pyrrhonians who denied the real existence of phenomena and it is now applied to Deists and to those who doubt the Creeds of the Church or the truth of the Scriptures.

Scheffer, Jean, German philologist and antiquary [b. at Strassburg of a noble family, 1621; d. at Upsala, March, 1679]. He was a good linguist and historian, and in 1643 published De Varietate Nationum apud Veteres. In 1648, anxious to get free from the civil wars raging in Alsace, he went to Sweden, being encouraged to do so by the good opinion given to men of learning at the court of Queen Christina. He had already come known there by the works he had published, and was appointed by the Queen professor of Rhetoric at the University of Upsala, where he continued to work with great diligence till his death. He was made king's Law Professor and Librarian of the university, and published several books under royal direction. The greater number of these were editions of Aelian, Arian, Hædrus, Justin, and others, and he also wrote Upsalia Antiqua, a History of Lapland, and numerous treatises.

Schelling, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph (b. 1675; d. 1854), an illustrious German philosopher, born at Leoben, near Stuttgart, educated at Tübingen and Leipzig, and in 1798 began to lecture at Jena, then the head-quarters of German speculative activity. The bent of his mind was determined at this time by his colleague, Fichte, but he gradually developed his own views of Intuitionism, and true knowledge is that which unites the real and ideal, nature and spirit. Christ, God become for the first time objective, and in His person sacrificed the finite, and thus opened the knowledge of the Divine eternal world to man. Later Schelling came a Professor at Würzburg, and here teaching became more distinctly Christian. He declared that Christianity had three phases pass through—the Petrine, or Catholic; Pauline, or Protestant; and the Johannine, the philosophical Church of the future—this teaching has been again and again attacked in modern writers.

Schism [from the Greek schizō, "I cleave, rend"].—The word is generally held to note the act of separating from the Church, 1 so dividing the body which Christ dyed might be one. The Church was originally one, and is so described in the New Testament. [See 1 Cor. i. 9, 10; xii. Eph. iv. 1—6; Rom. xvi. 17, 18.] The Church of Corinth is described as tending towards parties and divisions, and for this reason Paul rebukes it sharply. From time to time some great schism has rent the Church, such as the Novatian and the Manichaean, where the seceders separated on questions of discipline; and a quarrel between two rival Popes divided the Western Church for many years. [PAPAL SCHISM.] The Roman Church brings it as a charge against the Reformed Churches that they are in schism; to which these reply that the departure of that Church from Apostolic doctrine is so marked and patent that no choice is left to the lovers of truth but to hold it fast, and to leave the responsibility to the Church which usurps authority at the expense of truth. Except on such grounds all division and separation is held to be a sin; since division, whether necessary or not, is a loss of power, and therefore an evil. Many Nonconformists make virtually the same reply to those in the Anglican Church who bring a similar charge against them, holding as they do that Episcopal methods are a very wide departure from primitive and original Christianity, and that the Church became thus corrupted at a very early age, even in the time of the earlier Fathers.

Others, again, take a totally different view of schism itself, insisting that the primitive use of the word describes party spirit or disunion in the body, and that actual separation and formation into a distinct body is not schism; this view was maintained by Dr. Campbell. And others again have maintained that while diverse opinion is likely to lead to separate bodies in practice, there is and can be no schism whilst common Christianity is willingly acknowledged, and common Christian action undertaken on all possible various occasions; but that schism does exist on the part of any who refuse such acknowledgment or common action to others who are willing to give it on their part. There are various modifications of different views concerning this vexed question, but the above are the chief.

Schleiermacher, Friedrich Ernst Daniel (b. 1678; d. 1834), a great German theologian, was the son of a Lutheran minister at Breslau, and was educated first by his father, then in a Moravian school. Under the influence of the elementary teaching he received he was a pious child and deeply reverential in spirit; but, nevertheless, scepticism took such possession of him that he declares that he doubted the historical truth of any of the ancient Scriptures. But he had no desire to doubt, and he eagerly read the philosophical writings of his countrymen, especially Kant and Spinoza, in the hopes of having his doubts removed, and in his twenty-sixth year was ordained to the ministry. In 1799 he published his Discourses on Religion—a deeply earnest work intended to conciliate unbelievers, and to convince them that faith in an unseen world was compatible not only with reason but with the deepest human instincts. Neander declared that to this work he owed his spiritual life. Meanwhile, Schleiermacher threw himself heartily into politics and social questions, urging Germany, e.g., to resist the insolence of Napoleon.

He was appointed Court Preacher in 1802, and Professor of Theology at the University of Halle in 1804. In 1810 the University of Berlin was founded. Schleiermacher was one of its active promoters, and was the first to occupy the Theological Chair. His translation of Plato [1804–10] placed him among the most famous Greek scholars of his time, and though English scholars regard its criticisms as too subjective, the book holds a very high position. Meanwhile he was indefatigable as a preacher, and his sermons, published in seven volumes, are masterpieces of earnest and penetrating power. He was certainly not what his countrymen would regard as an orthodox divine, for he had declared dogma to be an incrustation on the essential divinity of Christianity; but he was earnest, devout, reverent, of massive understanding and surpassing eloquence. Being seized with a fatal illness he called his friends and disciples together, and solemnly professed his faith in Christ as the Saviour and in the propitiation made by His death. He then himself celebrated and distributed the Holy Communion. His works are many and voluminous; the most important is his Christian Dogmatics, a masterpiece of theology. He regarded Christ as not only perfect and sinless, but as having the fulness of Divinity dwelling within Him, and as dwelling in succession in the hearts of the faithful. His Essay on St. Luke's Gospel, a characteristic specimen of his free historical criticism, was translated and published by the late Bishop Thirlwall, who pronounced it "a specimen of exegetical criticism which has seldom been equalled, and which cannot fail to excite the admiration even of those who do not admit all its conclusions." His conception of divinity was pantheistic, but his heart went deeper than his intellectual conceptions. He was a man of prayer, and a believer even where he found the historical evidence unsatisfying. His speculations are mostly left behind in the progress of thought, but his earnest piety, and the real soundness of his inner theology, his personal faith in God and in Christ, have endeared him to the hearts of his countrymen. They read his sermons, and love them, and reverence his memory. Among his disciples are the great names of Ncander, Ullmann, Olshausen, Lücke, and Bleek.

Schmalkald, League of, for the defence of Protestantism, was formed Feb. 27th, 1531, under the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse, and was joined by fourteen German princes and twenty-one imperial cities, comprising nearly all the principal cities of North Germany, and others in the centre and south. The peace of Nürnberg [1532] followed immediately on the formation of the League, and this success was followed up by the raising of a large standing army and the drawing up of the Articles of Schmalkald in 1537. These were drawn up Luther as a protest against the authority of the Pope, and were signed by all the members of the League. They were principally signed to show how far the Lutherans would be disposed to go in order to avoid a final rupture, and in what sense they were willing to adopt the doctrine of Christ's presence in the Eucharist. In a few years' time jealousy began to arise among the various princes, strength of the League gave way, and its arms was routed at Mühlberg, in April, 1547.

Scholastici. — Ecclesiastics connected with a cathedral or collegiate chapter, whom the duty devolved of superintend the management of its schools. The scholastici, called also capiscoli, capita scholaris, magistri scholarum, appear to have origins in the time of Charlemagne, and often taught personally in the schools, in addition to the work of superintending other teachers. The Council of Trent it was decreed that scholasteria should be held only by a doc master, or licentiate in theology or can lay, and that otherwise the appoint should not hold good.

Schoolmen.—The famous teachers called were the revivers in the West Church of Theology as a science. In Greek Church it had become a tradition, in the West the Schoolmen set themselves the task of reducing the traditional dogmas of Church to a complete system. This prided to use the words of Hallam, was "an all- in-between faith and reason, an endeavour to range the orthodox system of the Church, as authority had made it [all through the tens of this movement we find them turn to the laws of government, etc., laid down by the various Church Councils, and not to the Bible], according to the rules of the Aristian dialectics. The natural result of constant study of the works of Aristotle, the foundation of a new school of philosophy and we find the logical system of the ancient Greek philosopher and theology treated by side in the works of the School. At first they contended themselves with arguments on natural and revealed religion, removing by clever reasoning all they considered liable to objection, truthing the whole thing from a purely physical point of view. They were, at same time, wonderfully united in thought and mode of philosophising; but before long different parties were formed. Leading man had his own followers, who imparted him and his theories and refused to see reason in the argument of any one. These at last settled down into two sects, the Realists and the Nominalists [REALISTS; NOMINALISTS].

The first period of the Scholastic philosophy reaches from Anselm to Alexander II [1073–1200]. The principal figures in period are Abelard (Rationalistic); Anselm and Peter the Lombard (Realistic); St. Bernard and Walter of St. Victor (Mystical); res minas non disputatio competendit, sed sancti-i.

Each great theologian dogmatised from his own standpoint on the doctrines of the Trinity, on Sin, the Work of Christ, the Priesthood and the Sacraments. Thus, Anselm in his Cas Dei Homo made the first scientific attempt to construct the doctrine of Redemption on the basis of law, holding that by sin the honour due to God witheld and punishment is deserved, and that this punishment can only be remitted by infiction, Abelard denied any necessary connection between the death of Christ and the remission of sins. Scholasticism was at its best, and exercised its influence during the thirteenth century, which may be called the second stage of its existence. The cause may, to a great extent, be traced to the establishment of the mendicant Friars. A great many men joined their order, and the result was an increased number of students of theological philosophy. The two most famous of all the Schoolmen were at this time, Thomas Aquinas [q.v.], a Dominican, Duns Scotus [q.v.], a Franciscan, each the founder of a rival sect, and respectively Thomists [q.v.] and Scotists [q.v.]. These and the Nominalists—the sect started by Roscelin [q.v.] in the twelfth, and revived by William Ockham [q.v.] in the thirteenth—were the keenest and bitterest rivals for nearly two hundred years, and the books written on all topics advocating their views are innumerable. The leading idea still in their teaching was that of theology treated as a science, and not as a religion. The decline of this theory began in the fourteenth century, soon after the appearance of Wyclif with his religious doctrines. He and his followers tried to teach a more spiritual Christianity, and the main facts of religion before the people in a more mystical, as opposed to the sacramentary way. From this time the Schoolmen steadily declined, but for different reasons their decline was very slow. It might be thought that the new and enlightened spirit which was started by the revival of learning would have exploded the long and laborious theories of the old Schoolmen in a very short space of time; but habit, and the tenacity with which chief universities at first adhered to the old lines of thought, made their defeat and extinction very slow. The task of stating fairly good or bad influence exercised by the Schoolmen is a difficult one. On the one hand, clear, subtle style of argument was studied; it brought to a fair state of perfection; but on the other hand, the minute attention to the smallest detail, the raising of objections for the sake of answering (as it almost always did), make their books frivolous and tedious; and the influence they had, which produced far worse consequences, was that of discouraging by their methods the expansion of the mind. They were content to argue and discuss the rules of philosophy laid down by Aristotle or the old Christian Fathers, but the study of the Scriptures was neglected, and they looked with horror on any one making experiments, or seeking after fresh sources of truth. It was the revival of learning in the fifteenth century which showed to the Church and the world "a more excellent way."

Schultens, Albert, a famous Hebrew grammarius and Orientalist [b. at Gröningen, 1686; d. at Leyden, 1750]. He studied at Leyden and Utrecht, made himself master of Greek and Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldee, Syriac, and Rabbinic, and obtained a post as Professor of Oriental Languages at Franeker. He had previously been made Doctor of Theology and minister of Wassenaer in 1711, but had resigned the latter for his professorship. From 1729 until his death he was at the theological seminary at Leyden. His chief works relate to the study of Hebrew, and he was the first to show that Hebrew is only a branch of the Semitic languages, and consequently could not be the original language given by God to man, as was commonly believed. He also held that the study of Arabic is necessary to a correct understanding of Hebrew. He wrote some books on the Old Testament, and various addresses and criticisms.

Schwartz, Christian Friedrich, an eminent missionary [b. at Sonnenburg, in the Electorate of Brandenburg, 1726; d. at Tanjore, 1798]. He studied at Halle, where he attended the lectures of Michaelis on theology, and assisted Schultz in editing the Tamil Bible which the latter had translated. Schwartz was thus induced to become a missionary, and was sent by the Danish Missionary Society in Copenhagen to Trincomalee in 1750. He had previously obtained the patronage of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, and was removed by this society to Tanjore in 1779. He was employed by the Government of Madras to undertake an embassy to Hyder Ali, which was successful, and the terms of peace were settled. It did not, however, last long, and between 1781 and 1783, while Tanjore was besieged by Hyder, the sufferings of the inhabitants from famine were terrible; but by the intervention of Schwartz with the cultivators, promising to pay them not only for provisions supplied, but for any bullock stolen by the enemy, food was at length procured and the town saved. In 1785 he founded schools at Tanjore for teaching the natives the English language. He was one of the most successful English missionaries in India, and did much to establish confidence among the natives towards the English. His name is revered not only by Christian converts, but by Mohammedans and Hindoos.
Schwenfelders, the followers of Caspar Schwenkfeld von Ossing, a nobleman of Silesia. At first he adopted the doctrines taught by Luther, and being in a position of importance at the court of the Duke of Lignitz, was able to exercise great influence in spreading the Reformation. He separated from the Lutherans, however, and adopted certain opinions of his own, especially on the efficacy of the Divine Word and on the doctrine of the Eucharist. Instead of the words "This is my body," he suggested "My body is this," meaning, that which nourishes the soul, as the ordinary bread does the body. He maintained that the Sacraments were merely signs and not means of grace. He always declared that he had no desire to make converts, or to start a new sect; but after his death, in 1562, it was found that he had a numerous following in Silesia. The Lutheran clergy persecuted them frequently, but in spite of this they increased in numbers, and some Jesuit missionary priests were sent to convert them if possible to Romanism, the Emperor at the same time issuing an edict that all their children should be brought up in that faith. At last, in 1725, finding no peace at home, the whole party moved from Silesia to Saxony, and eight years later emigrated to Pennsylvania, and settled in Montgomery, where they still flourish. They hold to their own language, and the pastors, who are chosen by lot, are all Germans. They do not observe the Sacrament of Baptism, but as soon as a child is born, a minister is called in to pray for its prosperity, and a similar service takes place in the church when the mother is able to attend with the infant. When Silesia was joined to Prussia some years ago, a few of them returned from Saxony, but the sect is by far the stronger in America. In some respects of doctrine and government they resemble the Friends.

Scot, John. [Duns Scotus.]

Scotists, a sect of religious philosophers, followers of Duns Scotus [q.v.], which arose at the end of the thirteenth and beginning of the fourteenth century. They were in direct opposition to the Thomists, though both started from the same standpoint, professing to be guided by the philosophy of Aristotle. The Scotists held that all knowledge is derived from Divine illumination, and that science is therefore the province of all theologians. They maintained the moral efficacy of the Sacraments in contradistinction to the Thomists, who believed that the grace bestowed on them is physical. The Thomists affirmed and the Scotists denied the loss of power to goodness by the Fall. The Jesuits adopted the views of the Scotists with regard to the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin, while the Dominicans followed the doctrines of the Thomists in denying that dogma.

Scotland, Church of. — 1. The Church. — Christianity is supposed to have made its way into Scotland during the Roman occupation of Britain, but nothing certain is known of its history. The first Christian teacher whose name has been preserved is St. Ninian, and of him little is known that he laid the foundation of a church at Whithern (known as Candida Casa, the White House), on the north coast of Solway Firth, about A.D. 397. He settled there with intention of converting the Picts of Gallo and won over most of the inhabitants of southern Scotland to Christianity. A bishopric was established at Candida Casa by the Roman bishop Fortunian, who died in 431, and was succeeded by Bishop Ninian, who died in 482.

2. The Roman Catholic Church. — Church of St. Columba. — The Church of St. Columba began to develop about the eleventh century; its property was lost by degrees, and abuses grew up in customs and services of the Church. The reform which was needed was first attempted by a movement among the clergy of St. Margaret, wife of King Malcolm Can. With all the wonderful tact and energy which she possessed, she threw herself into the assembling councils, and at one time engaged in theological discussions with the chin, in which she proved her arguments.
deavoured to bring about conformity with a Roman standard. The chief points in which effectual change were, the time of keeping Lent, the observance of Sunday, and the manner of receiving the Communion. She died in 1093, and for a few years there was a reaction against the changes she had made. Her three sons reigned in succession, Edgar, Alexander I., and David. During the reign of Malcolm Canmore and his successors, a circumstance took place which greatly changed the aspect of the Scottish Church—namely, the immigration into the south and east of Scotland of settlers whom the oppression of William the Conqueror had driven out of England. These settlers received grants of land, intermarried with the Scottish nobility, and introduced English customs. Parishes were formed, two new dioceses were created by Alexander I., and, as in England, the Church at that time the beginning of the fifteenth century, the Church of Rome reigned in possession of Scotland. The Scottish Church differed from the English in having no archbishop, though the kings of England had from time to time pressed the pope to make St. Andrews an archbishopric. The latter preferred to keep the superintendence of the Church in his own hands, and A papal legate as his representative to end the Diocesan Councils, much to the like of the Scottish bishops. In 1225 Pope Honorius III. authorised the holding of these uncles without the Legate, and in 1472 Andrews (held at that time by Bishop Patrick Graham) was at length erected into archbishopric: but this having been done without the knowledge of the King or the latter bishop, the new Archbishop passed the t of his life as a prisoner in Lochleven. His successor, Schevez, was made Primate in 17, and in 1492 the Bishop of Glasgow was promoted to be an Archbishop, whereon a strife began between the two dignitaries, and never ceased till the Reformation. course of time most of the wealth of Scot made into the possession of the Church, for this reason the monasteries relaxed in discipline and lost the esteem of the people. The Mendicant Orders were instituted to remedy this evil, and soon became popular; their popularity only tended in time to reduce the same effect as with the monas ries, for they became proud and overbearing; towards the other clergy, disunited and unreasonably among themselves, and finally objects of scorn and ridicule on account of the immorality of their lives. The spark of religion which the rise of the Mendicants had kindled, declined with them, and from that time the Church of Scotland sank lower than ever. Bishops and clergy were appointed not on account of their piety or learning, but to gain some private ends of the Sovereign, in many cases for the sake of the wealth which rich clergy brought to the Crown in exchange. The state of the Church grew worse as time went on; preaching was almost entirely discontinued except by the friars; and the only bright spots in this dark period were the lives of a few good men who, from time to time, did their utmost to stir up the minds of the people to a sense of their danger. No permanent effect was felt till the beginning of the fifteenth century, when some of Wycliffe's disciples made their way across the border, and began preaching in the south of Scotland, some of them travelling as far north as Perth. They denounced boldly the corrupt customs which prevailed in the Scottish Church, the Roman errors which had crept in at the same time that all the life of religion seemed to have died out. They aimed at reforming the lives and conduct of the clergy; and in spite of the hatred which was everywhere felt towards them, they succeeded in at least preparing the minds of the people for the Reformation which was to follow.

3. The Reformation.—It is not certain whether Patrick Hamilton [q.v.], who came to Scotland in 1525 from Paris, was the first to preach the doctrines of the Reformers in Scotland. He was certainly one to whom Scotland owes much for his courage in preaching the Reformed religion. After the death of Archbishop Beaton, who had condemned Hamilton, the persecution of the Reformers was entrusted to his nephew, David Beaton, Abbot of Arbroath, who had been educated in France, and was a staunch Roman Catholic. He extended his imitation of French customs even to the manner of dealing with heretics, and induced the King to take part with him in stamping out the Reformed religion. For some years a continual inquisition went on; numbers were tortured and put to death, and many more were imprisoned or forfeited their possessions.

The name of George Wishart [q.v.] stands out, in the early part of the sixteenth century, as one of the most learned Reformers that Scotland had yet seen; he was seized and burnt to death in 1545. His place was filled immediately by one who had hitherto been simply one of his disciples, but who was destined to become far more famous than his master—John Knox [q.v.]. During the Regency of Mary of Guise for her daughter, a constant struggle was going on between the two religions, and led eventually to a civil war, which ended in a victory for the Protestants in 1560, just after the Regent's death. The result was that the Confession of Faith was established by the Scottish Parliament. This Confession was the recognised standard of the Church of Scotland from 1560 to 1647, when it was superseded by the Westminster Confession. After the accession of Mary Queen of Scots, it seemed as though the tide were to turn in favour of the old religion; but the Queen's influence was not sufficiently great to effect this, and after her defeats and humiliations there was no more hope from that quarter.

Amid all the turmoil, John Knox was the man among all others who had most influence with his countrymen, and took the best advantage of it by impressing his doctrines on all sides. It was he who prevailed with the Parliament to accept the Confession of Faith, and he introduced the Genevan Prayer Book into Scotland. He drew up the First Book of Discipline, which treats mainly of the organisation of the Church, and of the disposal of Church revenues. Knox cleared the way for the introduction of Protestantism, but as yet this was only the beginning of the struggle, which lasted throughout the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. After Knox's death its character was altered, and, instead of being a contest between Romanism and Protestantism, it gradually became one between Prelacy and Presbyterianism. To all appearance Papacy had died out, but no doubt many still clung to it secretly, and would have been glad of any opportunity to have the old forms and ceremonies restored. A great difficulty stood in the way also with regard to the disposal of Church revenues, and in order to remove this the Concordat of Leith was drawn up in 1572, by which it was ordained that all bishops, abbots, and priors were to continue to be parts of the spiritual estate, but their power was to be limited, and they were to be under the control of the General Assembly. [Tulchan Bishops.]

4. Presbyterianism Established.—The new attack against Episcopacy began with Andrew Melville [q.v.], who returned from Geneva in 1575, and who used his learning and power of rhetoric to such purpose that, in 1580, the Assembly passed a decision that Episcopacy was "unlawful, and without warrant in the Word of God." With the view of superseding Episcopacy by Presbyterianism, Melville and his party compiled a second Book of Discipline, which received the sanction of the Church. It seemed at first that their efforts were to be unsuccessful, through the conduct of the young King, who insisted on having some of the bishops maintained in their dioceses, and chose for his companions young Roman Catholic noblemen. A panic was raised, which was only half allayed by the recantation of d'Aubigny, Duke of Lennox; and so great was the alarm that the King was seized and imprisoned at Huntingtower, near Perth, where he was kept for a year. He eventually made escape, and his captors were declared guilty of high treason. Melville barely succeeded in making his escape to Berwick, and most of the ministers only remained in place their lives. The result of the King's imprisonment was the passing of the "Black Act" in 1584, by which the Sovereign was debarred from being supreme in all matters, and ecclesiastical authority was placed in the hands of the bishops. But this violence raised such outcry that three years later another Act passed, which put an end to the Scot Episcopate; all Church revenues became property of the Crown, and were soon squandered by the King and his associates. In this time till 1602, when the Presbytery constitution (commonly called the M. Charta of the Church of Scotland) was established by law, he put no further obstacle to the way of Presbytery.

5. Re-introduction of Episcopacy — Liturgy — National Covenant.—The King's feelings altered when he found that ministers would allow him no freedom dealing with some nobles in the North, who were still inclined to Romanism, and whom the Presbyterians had no mercy, sought his revenge by an attempt in to re-introduce Episcopacy, under the plausible pretext of admitting some of wisest ministers into Parliament. Prob he would not have been able to carry his design as he wished if it had not for his succession to the English throne 1603, when, finding himself supported English bishops, he hoped to bring about uniformity of religion, and set himself so by dissolving assemblies, imprisoning ministers, and otherwise exercising arbitral power, hoping to prevail on the people to long to accept the bishops whom he should appoint. He endeavoured to bribe Mel with the offer of a bishopric, but, finding him still obdurate, the King sent him to the Tower for three years, and finally banished him to France. Some bishops were erected in England, and the Episcopal Church seemed again to be established in Scotland though the absence of ritual was very noticeable beside that of the Church. Change was hardly felt among the people, but a deep feeling was excited among the 1618 by the Five Articles of Perth, where were submitted to the Assembly for its action, and which enjoined kneeling at Communion and the observance of Christ Good Friday, Easter, Ascension, and Whitsunday, allowed Confirmation of children eight years old, and permitted Communion of the Sick in private houses. The people were staggered at the idea of such a parture from ancient customs, and in churches refused to comply. Nothing great importance took place till the 1633, when Charles I. came to Scotland.
owned, and took the opportunity of planning some reforms in Church matters. He made some changes in the revenues; formed Edinburgh into a bishopric, with the Colgate Church of St. Giles as its cathedral; and, a far more important matter, he ordered the introduction of a Liturgy, to be modelled on that of the English Church. This Service-book was the work of Archbishop Laud; it was completed in 1637, and on July 23rd was to be used for the first time at St. Giles's; but the Dean was not allowed to proceed beyond the first few words before an uproar was raised which obliged him and the Bishop of Edinburgh, who was present with the Archbishop of St. Andrews, to escape for their lives. The innovation resulted in the formation of a National Covenant, signed in the Greyfriars Churchyard at Edinburgh, Feb. 1638, the members of which bound themselves to defend their Church from the encroachments of Popery. In November, the National Assembly met; the Five Articles, the Book of Canons, and the new Prayer Book were condemned, the bishops were tried and deposed from their bishoprics, and Presbyterianism was once more restored in its original form. His proceeding on the part of the Assembly could not but have serious consequences; a situation was presented to the King, but he refused to take any notice of it, and the Scotch army was speedily prepared for war. Peace was made before actual hostilities had begun, and the King began to realise how much in most his opponents were. He undertook to call a General Assembly to settle the disputes, and it met the following year: its work consisted in doing again what had been done by its predecessor, and the Assemblies which had established Episcopacy were declared to have been illegal.

It was soon known that Charles was again raising his army ready for an invasion, and the Scotch resolved to be beforehand with him. In August, 1640, an army, headed by the Marquis of Montrose, marched southward and took possession of Newcastle. Frightened by this decisive measure, the King hastened to make concessions, and gave up all the points on which he had before insisted most strongly.

6. Solemn League and Covenant.—With the English rebellion came new hopes to the Presbyterians, who trusted that Presbytery could now extend over the whole kingdom. In anticipation of such an event they ceded to bind themselves, with their English brethren, by a religious covenant, to protect the rights of their Church. The Solemn League and Covenant was drawn up towards the close of 1643, and sanctioned by the tates, and the oaths were taken by the English Parliament. [COVENANT; CAMERONS.] The Scotch army immediately marched again into England to unite their forces to those of the English Parliament.

In 1645 the Directory for the Public Worship of God was accepted by the Assembly, and in 1647 they also accepted the Westminster Confession of Faith, taking exception only to one or two points. On the execution of Charles I., the Scots proclaimed Charles II. king, and induced him to sign the Covenant, for they were resolute in refusing to acknowledge Oliver Cromwell. On the Restoration, King Charles, who hated the Covenant, dismissed the Assembly, and took the government of the Church under his own control. He again introduced Episcopacy, and now began a terrible time of persecution to the Covenanters. The leader in this raid against Presbyterianism was Archbishop Sharp. [SHARP, JAMES.] In 1670 was passed the Convicticle Act, forbidding the meetings of the Covenanters and enforcing compulsory attendance at church, and the next few years exhibit fierce persecution, and a constant struggle between the two parties.

7. Presbyterian Church established by Act of Parliament.—The fall of James II. in 1688 brought down the Episcopal Church also. Scotland had for many years been becoming more Puritanical in its tendencies, and was now most rigorous in the stress laid upon the duty of prayer and fasting, and the sins of frivolity and dissipation. Episcopacy was at an end in many parts of the country, though it was not definitely abolished till 1683, when the Convention of the Estates met and denounced it, and in 1690 an Act of the Parliament of William and Mary confirmed the Presbyterian Confession of Faith, and ordered the use of the Catechism and Directory for Public Worship. The patronage of the Church was conferred on the Elders and Town Councils in the boroughs, and on the landowners in the country.

The General Assembly, which met in 1690, appointed two commissions to visit the clergy in different parts of the country to enforce discipline. In the north the arrangement was a failure, for the commissioners were incapable of acting with the moderation which the Assembly wished, and numbers of the clergy were turned out of their livings, while the people refused to allow the Presbytery to appoint successors. In many places Episcopalians were put in the vacant livings by the parishioners, and in these parishes the Presbyteries lost all control, if indeed they were not left destitute of members. King William became dissatisfied as the confusion increased, delayed the meeting of the Assembly, and finally refused to admit any member who would not take the "Oath of Assurance" that he was King de facto and de jure. Lord Cares, the King's confidential adviser, prevailed upon him to countermand the order, and his consent restored in a great measure the confidence of the Scottish clergy, who had begun to regard him with distrust. Liberty was granted to the Episcopalians to remain in possession of their benefices, though they were not allowed to become members of assemblies, synods, and presbyteries; and the consequence was that they gradually diminished in number, though they consider themselves to be the old Church of Scotland. From the time that King William released the Assembly from the Oath of Assurance in 1694, it has continued to meet year by year, and the Established Church has been Presbyterian.

Although the Scottish people had no wish for the union of the English Church with their own, they were generally anxious for the union of the Parliaments, which took place in 1707. The General Assembly lost most of its power by the Act of Union, but men realised that it was for the Church's good that the interests of the two countries should be united. Lord Carnarvon was elected president of the Assembly which met after the Act was passed, and an attempt was made to enforce uniformity, but with so little success that the Tory Parliament of Queen Anne passed an Act of Toleration, giving freedom to the Episcopalians to continue their own form of worship. In the same year they revived the old system of patronage, which had been in abeyance for more than sixty years, and to that breach of the Treaty of Union are to be directly ascribed all the schisms that have since rent the Church of Scotland.

8. Moderatism.—From this time till 1720 much work was done in setting up the churches which had long been vacant, and settling the borders of the Church; but in that year a new feeling began to show itself, which developed later into the so-called Moderatism. It was at this time also that the "Marrow movement," began, which took its name from a book by Edward Fisher, entitled the Marrow of Modern Divinity, in which certain doctrines relative to justification by faith were put forward. The book was condemned in 1720 by the General Assembly, whereupon the "Marrow men" raised a protestation, and petitioned against the decision of the Assembly, and a contest began which lasted for many years, and was aggravated in 1732 by an Act which was then passed concerning the right of patronage. Many causes combined to increase the discontent among the clergy, and they were beginning now to wish to shake themselves free from the old groove, and to escape from the strictness of discipline which had been imposed upon them. To this movement was owing the first secession which took place in 1733, and of which Ebenezer Erskine was the leading spirit. [Erskine; Secessionists; United Presbyterians.] It was the beginning of party spirit in the Church, and from this time the two parties of "popular" and "moderate" Presbyterians continued to develop. Many of the followers of Moderatism laid themselves open to a charge of heresy [Wishart], but the persecutions which they suffered were the means of promoting their cause, which grewed flourished throughout the eighteenth century. With the development in theolog ideas there was development in other directions and in the latter half of the eighteenth century the literature of Scotland, principally of clergy, was the richest of the age. The secession was heled to a great extent the policy of William Robertson [q. who by his influence on the General Assembly succeeded in reducing the Church order and restoring unity to the Presbyteries, though his policy had the effect of driving many from the Established Church. A second secession took place in 1751 and its consequences were more lasting those of the first, numbers of people leaving the Church and forming a larger dissenting body. In those who still remained faithful to the old connection, Evangelicals no doubt were strengthened by the schools, but the departure of such numbers from the Church awakened a feeling of alarm in its members. No events worthy of note happened during the closing years of the eighteenth century, but the beginning of the nineteenth saw many very important changes, not so much in the doctrines of the Church, as in the manner in which she cared for her work. Hitherto the schools had been utterly inefficient for the number and requirements of the population, but by now made at this period, they were subje to the supervision of the Presbyteries, better homes and salaries were provided for the teachers. Sunday-schools were established and livings were better endowed. At the same time the Church began to take part in the work of foreign missions, which hitherto had been left in the hands of men connected with any religious body in particular. But the most important change of all at this time was that of Church extension idea of which originated with Dr. Chalmers [q.v.], of the Tron Church, Glasgow, who much distressed at the want of accomodation for the people in his own church, set to work to influence the Scottish people to help him in his scheme of subdividing parishes so as to bring them more directly under minister's control, and of connecting poorer rich through the Church's influence.

9. The Great Disruption. — The which resulted from this movement accompanied by one evil to the Church for the Dissenters thought it was aimed at them, and the "Voluntary Con- versy" was raised as to the advisal of disestablishing the Church. Scece-Dissenters united in an attack upon the Established Church, and the struggle became more political than religious, for the Church claimed that her new chapels should be bowed by the State, and the Dissenters tested and eventually overruled that of Another controversy was raised after the passing of the Reform Bill in 1832, concern
he right of the people to a share in Church government, and the Veto Act was passed in 1834, to enable the laity to reject the nomination of any minister appointed by the patron, provided that the veto was agreed to by the majority of the congregation. The ministers were forced into accepting the decree against their will, and later many of them had to give way to another change—namely, the admission of the ministers of unwelcomed sects into the General Assembly. An opening once made, fresh innovations followed, and in 1839 members of the Associate Synod of seceders were admitted. Many ministers appealed against vetoes brought against them, and trials decided on the judgment of the presbyteries were brought before the Assembly. The Court of Session hastened to attempt to repair the evils by impolitic measures, till the confusion reached its height, and the Non-Intrusion party called loudly for separation from the Scottish Church. The separation came in 1843, and caused much surprise to many who did not understand the spirit of the Scottish people, and believed that only a few of the most violent Non-Intrusionists would go so far as to cut themselves off from communion with the Church. In the midst of the general confusion which prevailed about 1842, the Moderates were unfortunate in saving no one capable of taking the lead, or deciding on what course it would be well to adopt, while on the other side were Chalmers and Dr. Candlish, who was in reality the leader of the party. In November, 1842, the General Assembly met, and after ten days’ discussion they bound themselves to stand by one another, and to unite themselves into a separate body. The Free Church was formed on May 18th, 1843, when of the 1,200 ministers who had hitherto belonged to the Established Church, 31 seceded. After the first shock which the parent Church felt from the Secession, its work went on with no less earnestness and success than before; and it proceeded to redress me by one the grievances which had been the cause of its troubles. The work of the Mainliners was hard, for the Seceders put in their way all the difficulties they could devise, and public feeling was all against them. But the Church overcame the opposition, and the work of Church extension prospered, mainly under the guidance of Professor James Robertson, who set on foot the endowment scheme, or the carrying on of the Church’s work in the chapels already built. Mission work also made great advances in the years which followed the Secession, and in this also Dr. Robertson and Dr. Norman Macleod were the moving spirits. The grievance of patronage was again considered, and the catch Beneffices Act was brought in; but, rough hailed with delight by the people, was rejected by the Parliament, as giving too much power to the Church. Many efforts were made to bring the question fairly before the Assembly, and finally in 1868 a Committee of Inquiry was instituted, whose report to the Assembly resulted in a victory to the supporters of Anti-Patronage. The Established Church of Scotland has 1,283 parishes, and 1,479 ministers.

Scotland, Episcopal Church op.—As our previous article will have partly shown, the National Church of Scotland had been made, at least nominally, Episcopalian upon the accession of James I. to the throne of England, Presbyterianism regaining the ascendency on the accession of Charles I., and Episcopacy being once more restored at the Restoration of Charles II. Thus it remained until the accession of William III. in 1688. Presbyterianism was then finally established, not so much as the Church of the majority, as because the Episcopalian Bishops refused to take the oath—were, in other words, Nonjurors. No doubt the same course would have been taken in England if the Church had not yielded to circumstances, and taken the oath of allegiance. The Rebellion of ‘45 was disastrous to the Episcopal Church in Scotland. The Bishops were, almost without exception, Jacobites, and the Government treated them most rigorously as political offenders and rebels. In 1746 an Act was passed forbidding the Episcopalian form of worship, except in the presence of the clergyman’s family, and that only twice a year. The punishment for the first offence was imprisonment for six months; for the second, transportation for life. The grandfather of the late Bishop of Aberdeen, the author of “Tullichgeanum,” which Burns pronounced the noblest of all Scotch songs, was imprisoned for six months in 1753, for the crime of “reading the Liturgy to more than four persons beyond his own family.” Many clergy did duty no less than sixteen times on a Sunday in order to keep within the law. The Episcopal Church was reduced to the last extremity, but a few faithful men were left, who worked hard to prevent her entire extinction. It was not until 1792 that these penal laws were rescinded. Meanwhile a serious difficulty had been created among the Episcopalian, which even yet has hardly died out. There were some who preferred the Liturgy to the Presbyterian services, but had no taste for civil disabilities, and these professed Episcopalian views, but without placing themselves under the Scottish bishops. These places of worship were designated “qualified chapels.” Hence there was introduced a cause of variance at once. After the penal laws were abolished it was hoped that reunion between these might have been effected, and in 1804 a Convocation of the Scotch Episcopal Clergy met at Laurencekirk, and subscribed to the English Articles and Liturgy as a basis. But a cause of difference remained. The Scottish Episcopal Church had adopted, with the English Nonjurors, a Liturgy resembling the First Prayer Book of Edward VI., and retained the mixed chalice in the Eucharist, and some other matters to which the "English Episcopalians" were opposed. It was agreed to leave to these the free use of the English Liturgy, whilst the Communion between them should not be interrupted thereby. But many of them were not contented with this. They called on the Bishops to abandon the Scotch Liturgy and adopt the English, and on their refusal the reunion was rejected. There are still a few, and only a very few, of these congregations in Scotland; nearly all of them have conformed to the Episcopal Church in consequence of that Church having left the choice of Liturgies to the congregations, and in the majority of the churches the English Office is in use. A memorable chapter in the history of this Church is that of the consecration of Bishop Seabury [q.v.], the first American Bishop, in 1784. [See also United States.]

The leading gentry and nobility of Scotland for the most part belong to the Episcopal Church, but nevertheless the Church is a very poor one. The income of a clergyman is seldom more than £100 a year, though this is the minimum. It is derived mostly from pew rents, and, in consequence, the amount depends largely on the popularity of the clergyman. The new life shown in the Church of England during the last fifty years has influenced Scotland, as is shown by the increasing number of services, and the building of various theological colleges. Of these the principal are: Trinity College, founded in 1841, to which are attached a few scholarships; St. Ninian Cathedral and College, Perth, the first cathedral established in Scotland since the Reformation, consecrated in 1851; Church and College of the Holy Spirit, Isle of Cumbrae, founded in 1849. At present there are seven Episcopal Sees, viz.:—Aberdeen, regarded as the chief; St. Andrews; Ross and Moray; Edinburgh; Brechin; Argyll and the Isles; Glasgow and Galloway. Patronage is chiefly in the hands of the congregation, who have the right of nominating their own pastor after they have heard him preach a sermon. The Episcopal Church has seven dioceses and 298 churches or stations.

Scott, Sir George Gilbert, R.A. [b. 1814, d. 1878], the most celebrated church architect of our time, was the grandson of Thomas Scott, of Aston Sandford. In 1844 he designed the Martyrs' Memorial at Oxford, and in the following year was entrusted with the rebuilding of St. Nicholas' Church, Hamburg, the great height of the steeple of which makes it so striking an object in the eyes of all visitors to the city. With the remarkable Church restoration movement which has characterised the last half-century Scott's name will always be associated, for among his works are the restoration of the cathedrals of Canterbury, Exeter, Ely, Lichfield, Hereford, Ripon, Gloucester, Chester; David's, St. Asaph's, Bangor, Salisbury, Alban's, and Westminster Abbey. He built also a vast number of new churches, as many public buildings. He was elected R.A. in 1860. His principal books on architecture are A Plea for the Faithful Restoration of our Ancient Churches, Remarks on Seen and Domestic Architecture, Gleanings from Westminster Abbey, etc.

Scott, Thomas, a very popular Biblical Commentator [b. in Lincolnshire, 1747; d. Aston Sandford in Buckinghamshire, 1822]. He was apprenticed to a surgeon, but expelled from this situation for misbehaviour and sent by his father to work at the low drudgery of farm work. After nine years spent in this manner, he announced his intention of entering the Church, took orders in 1773, and was appointed to the curacy of Weston Underwood, whence after a few years he removed to the curacy of Olney. He left by this time adopted strong Calvinistic views through the influence of John Newton, who succeeded at Olney; and he published 1779 a small book, the Force of Truth, containing a statement of his opinions, became chaplain to the Lock Hospital, London, 1785, and about 1802 Rector of Aston Sandford. His Family Bible, with notes a commentary, is still popular in the Evangelical school of divinity, but it is less full thought than that of Matthew Henry.

Scrutiny. An examination into the faith and disposition of catechumens before their baptism, accompanied by exorcism and religious instruction. In the Ordo Romanus, Feria Scrutinii, the most important day of scrutiny, was the Wednesday of the fourth week in Lent; besides this there were other days appointed in Lent, and at a later date the number of days of scrutiny increased to seven. When it became the custom to baptise infants at the Easter or Pentecost after their birth, the number again fell to three, and from the twelfth century onwards the ceremony of scrutiny was joined to that of baptism, when the time of baptism was longer limited to those seasons.

Scudamore, William Edward [b. 1818 d. 1881], a divine of the modern English Church. He was born at Wye, in Kent; educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; to holy orders in 1838, and two years later presented to the living of Ditchingham, Norfolk, where he spent the remainder of life. His parish had been greatly neglected but he quickly got it into thorough order. The Ditchingham House of Mercy, with Brotherhood and orphanage and hospital, if not originated by him, at least owed much of their access to his energy and care. He was Warden of the House of Mercy till his death.
But it is for his writings that his name will be briefly remembered. In 1846 he published Steps to the Altar, which has passed through numerous editions, and been translated into Greek, Latin, French, and German. Another devotional work of his,
Words to Take With Us. In 1841 his resonance to the theology of Rome caused him to publish Letters to a Seceder from the Church of England. In 1855 England and Rome and the Communion of the Laity both attracted con-derable notice. But Mr. Sandamore's principal literary work was the Notitia Eucharistiae, rointed in 1872. In this essay, which is a treasure of information on all doctrines con-ected with the Holy Eucharist, he aimed at coving that the practice of the early Church was opposed to the attendance of non-communicating worshippers at the celebration of the foly Communion; that the elevation and worship of the Host were of late introduction, and bally condemned by the Anglican Church;
and that previous private confession and absolu-tioni were not to be required as necessary of recipients of the Lord's Supper. Here, as in all his religious opinions, he closely followed the guidance of the early Fathers, and of the best of the Anglican divines—Hooker, Hudrewws, Bull, Cosin, and Jeremy Taylor.
Fr. Sandamore was a man of deep piety and personal religion, and singularly humble-dined. His devotional works are merely an outward expression of what he inwardly believed and felt and practised.

Sculpture, Christian.—Many causes combined during the early centuries of the Christian Era, to mark this period as deficient in works of art, as compared with those of earlier ages. The early Christian race was influenced by the Jewish ordinances, and by the customs and usages of the Gentiles.
Christian art was a blend of these elements,
and though early Christian works did exhibit a high degree of beauty and harmony, they were not consonant with the spirit of the age.

In the Roman Empire the art of sculpture reached its highest expression. The Roman sculptors were the most skilled and productive of their time. They,
working in marble and bronze, produced statues of great beauty and elegance.

The early Christian sculptors,
however, were hindered by the aversion of the Roman people to representations of the human form. They were forced to seek new themes for their art, and many of their works are characterized by a bold and free style, which was in harmony with the spirit of the age.

The early Christian sculptors,
like the writers, were also attempts to escape from the yoke of paganism and assimilate the principles of Christianity to the art of their time. They, therefore, were not content with the representation of the human form,
but sought to express the Christian ideals
through symbolism.

The early Christian sculptors
were also influenced by the doctrines of the Church. They sought to express the Christian message through their art, and many of their works are monuments of Christian faith and devotion.

Connecticut, 1729; d. at New London, 1796]. He graduated at Yale College in 1748, studied medicine in Scotland, and afterwards took holy orders, being ordained by the Bishop of London in 1754. He was first appointed missionary at New Brunswick, New Jersey, and was afterwards chaplain to the forces at New York; and when the English cause became hopeless, and the colonies were recognised as independent States, Seabury was unanimously elected by the clergy to be their first bishop, on March 25th, 1783. He started at once for England for consecration, and arrived in the summer of that year; but difficulties stood in the way which were not lightly to be got over. The See of Canterbury was vacant, and the Archbishop of York refused to consecrate without a special Act of Parliament, as it was illegal for the subject of a foreign State to take the required oath of allegiance. Seabury accordingly had recourse to the Scottish bishops, who had already manifested an interest in the American Church, and who had not the same fear which the English showed of the consequences of newly-born independence at such a time. He was consecrated at Longacre, Aberdeen, Nov. 14th, 1784, in the chapel of Bishop Skinner's house, as Bishop of Connecticut, by three bishops of the Scottish Church. After the consecration Seabury signed certain articles, which were to serve to maintain the friendly intercourse between the sister Churches, the chief being a decision that in the celebration of Holy Communion the American Church should follow as closely as possible the rites of the Church of Scotland. He returned to America in 1785, and held his first ordination August 3rd. The first Convention was held in September, when Bishop Seabury was not present: alterations were proposed in the Prayer Book, and the question of consecration was discussed. It was agreed that Seabury's consecration was valid, but all desired to perpetuate the union with the Mother Church, and they decided to request the English bishops to consecrate whatever other bishops they might choose. The English bishops consented, and in 1787 America had four bishops, who united to consecrate the Bishop of Maryland. Bishop Seabury was indefatigable in his work for the American Church, and has left a marked influence on its policy and present condition. His constant labours gave little time for literary work, but he has left several unpublished works and some volumes of sermons.

Seal of Confession.—Every confessor in the Roman Church is under the strictest obligation to keep secret all knowledge gained by auricular confession. The priest is supposed to stand in the place of God towards the people under his charge, and therefore to reveal what he has heard privately is sacrilege, punishable by the ecclesiastical law with heavy penalties. No exception is made to the slightest sins, the revelation of which might do no harm, or to crimes which revealed by the priest, would bring sinner to justice; nor is the priest allowed to remind the penitent of any knowlege he may possess by any sign or word of manner. The only exception is when a confession has been made sufficient clear another person suspected wrongly the crime. By the Fourth Lateran Council priest guilty of breaking the seal of conscience was sentenced to deposition and perpetual imprisonment, and another sentence was that his whole life should be passed in ignominious pilgrimage.

Sebastian, St.—St. Sebastian was the child of Christian parents at Narbonne, in France, in the third century, and educated at Milan. He obtained an appointment as captain of the Praetorian Guard, with a view to help the persecuted Christians at Rome. In capacity as soldier he gained access to other who were undergoing terrible fering in prison on account of their religi [Marcellinus and Marcus.] When he succeeded in converting their governor [Tetricus, St.], and so obtaining the release, he hid himself for a time in a frie house, though he still worked hard for suffering brethren. His retreat was discovered through the treachery of a renegade named Torquatus, and all the inhabitants of house were ordered to be executed by Fabian Governor of Rome. Feeling, however, that Sebastian was a prisoner of some importance, he did not dare sentence him without referring the case to the Emperor. Christian a personal interview with Sebastian, and, finding that his faith could be shaken, ordered that he should be put to death with arrows. A Christian was named Irenaeus, on coming to the body, in the intention of giving it decent burial, for to her surprise that life was not extinct. With great difficulty she conveyed him her house, where he quickly recovered. He was well enough he presented him boldly before the Emperor, begging him to be more lenient to the Christians. Diocles was very angry, and ordered the sold around him to beat Sebastian to death. prevent a second recovery, his body thrown down a sewer; but a Roman girl, Lucina, found it, and caused it to be buried in the Catacombs. His festival is on 20th.

Secessionists, Scottish. —The first cessionist, which took place in 1733, is in a sermon preached before the Synod of Perth and Sterling by Ebenezer Erskine; account of this movement will be found.
Archbishop of Canterbury in 1758. He was a famous preacher and a conscientious, liberal, and pious man. He died Aug. 3rd, 1768, and was buried in Lambeth churchyard. His Life was written and his works were edited by his chaplain, Beilby Porteus.

Secreta, or, as they are sometimes called, secreta oratio, are the prayers said inaudibly by the priest in the service of the Mass. The lawfulness of the practice was questioned at the Reformation and abolished by the Protestants, but they are still in use in the Roman Church. The argument in favour of their being retained is a canon drawn up by the Council of Trent; but as there is some doubt on the subject, the priests are told they may think as they like about the historical question, but must obey the law.

Sect ([Lat. seco, “to cut u”)—A collective term, originally comprehending all such as follow the doctrines and opinions of some divine and philosopher; i.e., amongst the Jews we have the sect of the Pharisees and that of the Sadducees, and the early history of the Christian Church tells of many sects, which have all been noticed under their different heads. The term is often used now to characterise those who form separate communions, and do not associate practically with others in religious worship, as Romanists, Lutherans, Methodists, etc.; but would not be rightly applied to the divisions of High and Low Church, because they are only parties in the Church, with great and important differences in opinion indeed, but having made no external breach in the Church, nor separated from each other's communion. [See Schism.]

Secular Clergy [Lat. seculum, “the world,” “an age”].—Clergy who lived comparatively in the world, in contradistinction to those confined in a monastery, and bound by vows and rules of life. The term “secular,” which had formerly been used to denote all things outside the pale of the Church, came into use as applied to the clergy in the above sense at the beginning of the twelfth century, when Honorius II. allowed the monks of Cluny to receive into their order any secular priests who wished to join them.

Secularism.—A modern form of atheism, the fundamental principle of which is that men should concern themselves solely with the duties and affairs of the present life. The National Secular Society says that “Secularism relates to the present existence of man, and to actions the issue of which can be tested by experience. It declares that the promotion of human improvement and happiness is the highest duty, and that morality is to be tested by utility; that in order to promote effectually the improvement and happiness of mankind, every individual of the human family ought to be well placed and well instructed.
and that all who are of a suitable age ought to be usefully employed for their own and the general good." The Secularists deny the existence of a personal God, or at most leave it as an open question on which there is no sufficient proof; and they say that the only God whose existence is evident is "Nature." They object to Christianity both morally and intellectually, but in nine cases out of ten the objections brought against it are wide of the mark, and take for granted beliefs which have no existence: a caricature of some Christian doctrine being set up, there is small difficulty in proving its ugliness. They deny any spiritual needs in humanity, and urge that the desire for the good of mankind is sufficient to move men to self-sacrifice. Secularism is largely made up of the chief principles of Rationalism and Positivism. We have not met with any summary better than the following, which is by the Archbishop of York, Dr. Thomson:—

"Secularism, whether system or not, aims at the overthrow of all belief in God and in a future state, and at such a modification of all political and social arrangements as may be required for the production of an era of general enjoyment, called, I perceive, by one writer 'universal beatitude.' It adopts in some measure the doctrine of evolution, which promises, after many ages, if the sun shall keep hot so long, such natural development of wisdom and self-restraint, that the children born shall just balance in number the adults that depart; these being exactly the number that can be pleasantly nurtured, without undue pressure on the means of subsistence. But the mills of evolution grind slowly, if they grind small; and the Hedonists or secularists of this moment have no notion of waiting in the interests of generations so far off. This is a form of entail, they think, in which the tenant for life is denied the usufruct, for the sake of heirs that may not be born for a million or two of years;—not born at all, indeed, if the sun should happen to get cool. So the march must be a good deal hastened, and as a beginning the human race is to be asked to desist from all belief in God; indeed, it is assumed that the belief in Christianity has already been refuted and made impossible. This accomplished, the way is paved for social changes, which shall confer on all classes, especially the labouring class, immense benefits, not even stopping short of that 'universal beatitude,' at which all good and modest reformers do not hesitate to aim."

Secunda. [Rufina and Secunda.]

Secundians.—A Gnostic sect of the second century, agreeing in some points with the Valentinians [q.v.], but not in all. The founder, Secundus, was a pupil of Valentinus, but he appears to have struck out an original line of thought in going to the philosophy of the East for instruction. He maintained that everything was attributable to one of two main causes—Light and Darkness, or to Prince of good or of evil.

Sedes Vacans.—A term used in ecclesiastical law to denote the vacancy of the see of any high dignity of the Church, though it is strictly applicable only to that of Pope or of a bishop. The interval is that between the death, resignation, or translatel of the occupant, and the legal installment of his successor. It was formerly the custom provide a substitute called the intervent during the interval, or to entrust the duty of the office to the cathedral chapter. It is still done in the case of a sedes occupied when the vacancy is owing to the unavoidable absence or illness of the occupant.

Sedilia [Latin sedilia, "seats"]—Se within the chancel (generally on the south side) for the use of the clergy. There usually three of these combined in one structure, but sometimes there are two or one, and in a few rare instances four or five. They are often richly carved.

Sedulius, Caius Celsius, author of "Carmen Paschale," an heroic poem on the life of our Lord and events of Scripture hitherto Nothing is known of the author, except that he lived in the fifth century, during the reign of Theodosius II. and Valentinian III.

See [Lat. sedes, "seat, throne"]:—word used for the throne of a bishop in cathedral, in distinction from his dioeces, which means the area over which he exercised spiritual power.

Seekers.—A Puritan denomination which arose in 1645. They derived the name from their maintaining that the true Church, ministry, Scripture, and ordinances were to be practiced in their society, and that they were seeking for them. They taught that the Scriptures were uncertain and that present miracles were necessary to facilitate their ministry was without authority and that their worship and ordinances were unnecessary or vain.

Selden, John, lawyer and antiquarian at Salisbury, Sussex, 1684; d. at Whi fers, 1654). He studied at Chichester, graduated at Oxford, and entered Clifford's Inn and afterwards the Inner Temple, for a study of law. In the early years of his career he published England's Epipolm, Anglorum Facies Altera, the Anglican Ang Britannicom, and De Dis Syris, an import work, which was published in 1617, established his fame on the Continent as well as in England. The History of Tithes [16] so roused the anger of the King that Selden was obliged to rewrite it, and to acknowledge his errors before the Court of High Commission. Selden seldom appeared at the Bar but was looked up to as an authority political matters, and was imprisoned in 1621 for advising the Commons to hold their ground against the encroachments of the King. He represented Lancaster in several Parliaments, and was zealous in the popular cause. He supported the Petition of Right, but appealed the King’s anger by the Mare Clausum, published in 1636. In 1643 he sat in the Westminster Assembly of Divines, and was made Keeper of the Tower Records. He was very intimate with Ben Jonson. Selden was a man of great learning in legal matters, and during his imprisonment he wrote his chief works: De Successione in Pontificatum Hebrewum and De Jure Naturali et Gentium juxta Disciplinam Hebreworum. Probably his most popular work is Table-Talk, published about 1690.

Selwyn, George Augustus, the first Anglican Bishop of New Zealand, was born a 1809, and was appointed to his bishopric in 1841. By his wonderful energy, zeal, and ability, he won himself a splendid name in the history of missionary enterprise. He landed in May, 1842, and spent the first five months exploring the Northern and part of the Middle Island. The Southern island was first visited in 1844. The diocese at first contained many of the Pacific Islands, and these Bishop Selwyn visited first in 1847. It was at last found necessary to divide the diocese [New Zealand], and in 1854 the Bishop revisited England to confer with the heads of the Church. His sermons at this time were very forcible, and four which he reached during Advent at Cambridge determined Mackenzie, afterwards Bishop of Central Africa, and Patteson, to devote themselves to a missionary life. Selwyn returned to New Zealand in 1855, and worked there unremittingly till 1868, when he was prevailed upon, but much against his will, to return and take the Bishopric of Liechfield. He died there April 11th, 1878.

Semi-Arians.—Those who, whilst catechetically denying the Arian doctrines, held them secretly in a somewhat modified form. They refused to accept the word “consubstantial,” but said that the Son was of like substance with the Father, thereby in reality denying the Divinity of Christ, for there can be but One God. The Councils of Rimini and Seleucia were composed for the most part of Semi-Arians. In modern times the term is used to denote those who believe that the Son was not from the beginning, but was begotten by the will of the Father. Such doctrines were held by some of the rationalist divines of the last century, such as Drs. S. Clarke and Hoadley.

Seminaries.—Schools or colleges appointed for the education of young persons destined for the priesthood. There are a great many of these in Roman Catholic countries, the first of which is said to have been founded by St. Augustine. In the sixteenth century many of the universities had fallen into the hands of the Protestants, and at the Council of Trent it was decreed that “the metropolitan of every province and the bishop of every diocese, should establish at some suitable place (if there were no institution of the kind already) a college or seminary, in which a certain number of boys exceeding twelve years shall be brought up and instructed in common, to qualify them for the ecclesiastical estate.” For the maintenance of these seminaries certain benefices were allotted, or the clergy were obliged to maintain them. The most famous of these was the seminary of St. Sulpiquius, founded at Paris by M. Olier about 1650. Almost all the seminaries were destroyed at the Revolution, but many have since been restored. There are also Evangelical seminaries in the kingdom of Württemberg, where youths are trained till they are ready for the University at Tübingen. In 1817, Frederick William III. of Prussia founded a seminary at Wittenberg, in honour of Luther.

In the reign of Queen Elizabeth the Roman Catholics formed the project of founding English seminaries abroad, that from thence they might be furnished with missionaries to perpetuate and increase their communion. Accordingly, the College of Douay was founded in 1569, that of Rome in 1579, Valladolid in 1589, Seville in 1593, and St. Omer in Artois in 1596. In the next century more seminaries were established at Madrid, Louvain, Liège, and Ghent.

By a statute of Queen Elizabeth it was made a prenunire to contribute towards the maintenance of a Popish seminary, and by one of James I. no persons are to be sent for instruction to Popish seminaries under divers pains and penalties. At present there are seminaries in England, at Westminster, Birmingham, and Liverpool; one in Scotland, at Glasgow; and eight in Ireland, as well as that at Maynooth. In the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States there are nine theological seminaries.

Semler, Johann Salomo, the founder of historical criticism of the Bible, was born at Saulfeld, in 1725. He was, in 1743, sent to the University of Halle, where he made the acquaintance of Baumgarten, who exercised a great influence over him. He took his degree in 1750, and in 1751 became Historical Professor at Altdorf, and Theological Professor at Halle. On Baumgarten’s death in 1757 Semler succeeded him.

The new departure taken by Semler was this:—The Lutheran teaching had not assailed the Bible as the means of God’s revelation to man, but had denied the authority of the Church. It became necessary to find a Seneca, Lucius Annaeus, a celebrated Roman philosopher, was born at Cordova a few years before Christ. His father, Marcus Seneca, was a rhetorician, rich, and high in Court favour, and from him his son inherited a great aptitude for rhetorical studies. But he became a Stoic, preferring philosophy to the study of words and the assemblies of men. He proposed to himself the acquisition of inward contentment and self-satisfaction. He rose high in the favour of the Emperor Claudius, when he was accused of adultery with a sister of Caligula, and was exiled to Corsica for eight years. He was at length recalled to Rome, and appointed tutor to Nero, the son of Agrippina, Claudius's wife. During this period he wrote his treatise on Anger, and it is characteristic of him. "I exhibits," says Mr. Maurice, "an ideal of a character which he set before himself habitually, and which it cannot be denied that in great measure he realised. The miseries and oppressions of the earth did not disturb his peace. The crimes of the palace never le him to dream, as an old Athenian might have dreamt, of Harmodius; or to pray, as an old Roman might have prayed, for a Divine avenger; or to mix, like his kinsman Lucan, reverence for Pompey and Cato with adulation of Nero. He was not inspired, a Juvenal was at a somewhat later time, by mere indignation, to pour out verses. He did not brood, likeTacitus, over the inevitable fall of his country's glory when its virtue had departed, nor anticipate the possible greatness of the untamed tribes in the forests of Germany because traces of old Roman virtue were to be seen in them. He disposed rapidly and decisively of the objection that moral evil ought to excite the displeasure of a philosopher, by urging that the philosopher in Rome who began to act upon that maxim must be displeased all along. Whatever subject Seneca handled I treated in this spirit."

When Nero became Emperor, his military tutor, Burrhus, exercised a beneficial influence upon the opening of his reign. Seneca addressed to him a treatise on Clemency, recommending to him gentleness and forgiveness of injuries, and congratulating him upon exhibiting so many noble qualities. Burrhus died, and then the worth of Seneca's far prognostications was seen. The young Emperor plunged into such vices and crimes as have made his name a byword of terror and disgust to all generations. How far Seneca is responsible for his bringing up may be regarded as a doubtful question. There are some writers, like Dion Cassius, who hold that the treatise on Clemency was mischievous in its results, and that Seneca's influence distinctly to be traced in what followed. Others assert, and not without probability, that Nero's murder of his mother was suggested by Seneca. Whether or not this be there is no doubt that he wrote the apology for the matricide. It had become part of his philosophy to endure not only personal injuries, but the sight of moral evil, without anger. It was part of his calm philosophy to look calmly upon oppression and wrong. It was not inconsistent in this. He had accumulated immense wealth — no less than ten million and a half pounds of our money. Nero coveted it, and endeavoured to have Seneca poisoned, but the attempt failed. Then he was accused of conspiracy, and this charge was commanded to kill himself with the same calmness which marked his templation of sin in others he met his own ath; opened his veins in a warm bath, and was his brother. In the Apocryphal New stament is a correspondence comprising sixteen letters between Paul and Seneca, but are certainly spurious.

Sentences.—The texts from Holy Scripture, one or more of which are read at the reigning of Morning and Evening Prayer, ey were placed there by the compilers of Prayer Book of 1552, who followed the ample of some of the old Latin breviaries.

sion of sins, thus forming a fit introduction

Separatists.—This term has been used many ways, and in many countries at ferent periods of ecclesiastical history. It y been taken to mean all those who dissent, separate themselves, from the national arch of their country. In Mary's reign was applied to those who refused to attend and in Elizabeth's to all who did not form to the Reformed doctrines. In Ger-ny we find the term in frequent use, sually during the last century, when a sprang into existence at Württemberg, ing for the most part the same views as Titians [q.v.]. They were much per-and, and at service, in 1803, emigrated to eria, where they became known under name of the Harmony Society. Frederick William III. of Prussia tried to effect a on between the Lutheran and Reformed ches, and those who refused to join were times called Separatists [see also Koun-
]. In Ireland at the present day there se sects known as Separatists. The nder of the first, John Walker, belonged Sandemanians [q.v.], and his followers tically hold the same doctrines; but announced that it was his intention to knowledge communion with no other sect ver, and hence the name Separatist. As linguishing name they are sometimes called cherites. Another sect, also agreeing in eessential points with the Sandemanians, septuagesima. [QUINQUAGESIMA.]

septuagint.—The Greek version of the Testament, used by the Hellenist Jews and by the early Christians. The story of the Septuagint, as given by Aristeas, is as follows: — Ptolemy Philadelphus, the son of Lagus, King of Egypt, wished to add a copy of the books of the Jewish Law to his library at Alexandria, and sent to the high priest, Eleazar, to ask for a copy, and for competent persons to translate it into Greek.
Seventy-two men, six from each tribe, were sent to Egypt, and after seventy-two days spent in translation, the five books of the Pentateuch were completed, the translators having assisted each other. Later accounts introduce miraculous elements into the story, and Justin Martyr tells that each man was shut up alone in a cell to translate the Old Testament unaided, and that when the results were compared they were found to agree in every point. This was one of the stories current at the time of Justin Martyr, but it is of course mere fable. [BIBLE.]

Sepulchre, The Holy, at Jerusalem,
the alleged place of our Lord's burial.
According to the traditional account, the Romans, who possessed Palestine, upon the destruction of the Holy City declared themselves professed enemies of the glory of Jesus Christ in that place, and in order to eclipse, and if possible extinguish it, they filled
the sepulchre with earth, and built an idolatrous temple on the spot: they erected the statue of Jupiter on the place of our Lord's resurrection, and that of Venus where He was crucified. All this was done by the order of Hadrian in 137, when, leaving the old city buried in its own ruins, he built a new one north of Jerusalem, and called it Ælia, and Mount Calvary thus profaned was enclosed in the walls of the new city. The same tradition goes on to state that Constantine the Great,
having defeated Licinius, and established the peace of the Church and provided for the security of its faith by the Council of Nico, turned his thoughts to the places consecrated by the life and death of Jesus Christ, which he resolved to rescue from the profanation to which they had long been exposed. The Holy Sepulchre was his first care, and he directed that a magnificent church should be built there in honour of our Lord's resurrection. Eusebius tells us that the Emperor's mother undertook to ex-cute this commission, and in 335 the stately edifice was consecrated by a number of bishops, who came thither from the Council of Tyre.
[HELENA, ST.; CROSS.] From that time the veneration of the Holy Sepulchre daily increased, and the church maintained its grandeur till the beginning of the seventh century,
when the Persians, coming into Palestine, demolished part of the building, carried off
the cross, and made Zachary, Patriarch of Jerusalem, their prisoner. His successor, Modestus, is said to have recovered the cross to have restored the church in 635, with the help of the Emperor Heraclius. But in the seventh century it fell into the hands of the Saracens, was restored to the Christians towards the close of the eighth century in the hope of gaining the friendship of Charlemagne, but on his death relapsed to the Infidels. They kept it till the end of the eleventh century, when Godfrey of Bouillon became King of Jerusalem in 1099; but in 1137 it reverted to the Infidels under Saladin, Sultan of Egypt.

Such is the tradition current concerning the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, the most sacred of all the holy places, “in comparison of which,” as Dean Stanley remarks, “all the rest sink into insignificance if it is genuine,
the interest of which, even if not genuine, stands absolutely alone in the world.” It is no wonder, therefore, that, as its genuineness has been altogether called in question, it has been also strenuously maintained. The case against the genuineness is most fully stated by Robinson in his Biblical Researches; everything which can be said in favour will be found in The Holy City of Mr. Williams.
The opponents urge that Hadrian’s wish was to insult the Jews, not the Christians, and,
therefore, that the story of his setting up the statues is improbable, and further, that there is no allusion to the sacred sites in Justin or Origen, though they lived on the spot. Another point urged against the genuineness is that the Holy Sepulchre is within the walls,
whereas Christ suffered “without the gate;”
but, as Dean Stanley points out, there are other sepulchres in the immediate neighbourhood which would not have been suffered within the city, and, therefore, the boundary-wall has clearly been altered. And he adds, “Granting to the full the doubts which must always hang over the highest claims of the Church of the Sepulchre, no thoughtful man can look unmoved on what has, from the time of Constantine, been revered by the larger part of the Christian world as the scene of the greatest events of the world’s history, and has itself in time become for that reason the centre of a second cycle of events of incomparably less magnitude indeed, but yet of an interest in the highest degree romantic.”

In this remarkable church may be seen all the diversities and forms of the older Churches of the world: the barbaric splendour of the Greek Church, which holds possession of Constantine’s basilica and of the rock of Calvary; the deep poverty of the Coptic and Syrian Churches, each confined to one paltry chapel; the Latin Church, which has contrived to assert its position among its rivals by establishing an altar for “the exaltation of the Cross” [Crost], and has secured possession of the Holy Tomb itself for its altar.
Between them all is a standing conflict, the two great Churches of the East and the West being brought side by side within the same narrow territory. It was a quarrel between these which was the immediate cause of the Crimean War of 1853-4; the Russian Government demanding from Turkey to be entrusted with the care of the Holy Places. There is a splendid description of the Easter ceremony of the Holy Sepulchre in Stanley’s Sinus a Palestine, pp. 464-469.

Sequence.—The name given to the rhythm which followed [Lat. sequor, “I follow”] the Epistle, and preceded the Gospel. In form times the Epistle was read at the altar as present, but the Gospel was read from the rood-loft, and therefore something was necessary to be sung during the transit of the deacon. At first the last note of the Alleluia sung after the Epistle was prolonged, but it was found too tedious, and in the ninth century special antiphons were introduced.
The first writer of sequences is generally supposed to have been Notker, a monk of St.
St. Gall, who is said to have seen some at the Benedictine abbey of Jumièges, near Rouen.
In some of the mediaeval Missals there are two sequences for each Sunday and festival,
but the Roman Missals of the sixteenth century were but four—for Easter, Whitsun, tide, Corpus Christi, and the masses of the dead.
A fifth for the two feasts of the Seven Dolours [the Stabat Mater] has been added since. Sequences were discontinued in England in the seventeenth century, when the disse of rood-lofts rendered them unnecsary. The name is sometimes used as synonymous with hymn, but this is obviously wrong, as a sequence is rhythmical with a regular metre, and has no stanzas.

Sequestration.—The separation of any thing in course of dispute from the possession of both the contending parties, in order collect and preserve the profits of a living benefice, the benefit of the next incumbent. If the value of a benefice is inadequate for the support of a clergyman, it is sometimes under sequestration for some years, in case of the curate and churchwardens. Sequetration is sometimes employed to satisfy depts of an incumbent if he has no private income, and he is obliged to pay them out the profits of his benefice, the bishop of the diocese being entrusted with directing confiscation. In the time of the Civil W the estates of delinquents were often set for the use of the Commonwealth by sequetration.

Seraphic Hymn. [Terescantus.]

Sermon [Lat. sermo, “discourse” “talk,” which is from sero, “to sow,” “to cultivate”] means, theoretically, a discourse delivered in public for instruction and improvement. Other names in the ngân Church were “homily” (which is from an signifying “a multitude”) and tractatus (treatise). The high dignity of the office preaching was shown by the fact that in African Churches no presbyter was suffered to reach before his bishop until the time of St. Augustine. In the Eastern Church this was not so, though after a presbyter had finished, he was bid to preach. It would seem that the deacons for many years were not allowed to preach. When this rule was relaxed, the right to preach was also conceded to laymen, but under careful restrictions. They acted as catechists (as in the catechetical school at Alexandria), but not in the churches. Ven monks, who were often laymen, were not allowed to preach in church as a rule. But in some cases a special lecture was given, as the case of Origen, who was licensed by his bishop to preach and expound the Scriptures before he took orders. It was usual then more than one bishop was present in a church for all in turn to take up the word of instruction. Frequency of sermons depended on the place and the season. Thus Chrysostom's Lenten Sermons were delivered on successive days, and Augustine makes reference to previous sermons as delivered "yesterday." It probably this was only in the case of large parishes and towns. The English Liturgy only actually prescribes one sermon each Sunday, directing in the rubric that it shall follow the Nicene Creed in the Communion Service. But almost universal custom gives sermon also at the evening service, where it generally placed at the end, though in some cathedrals and other churches it is put after a third collect. The Act of Uniformity mendent Act provides that a sermon may so be preached in church without other rite.

Sermons have been classed thus: [1] expositor of Scripture; [2] panegyric on saints; [3] sermons for special seasons; [4] sermons special duties. It is impossible to lay down rules concerning the structure of a sermon, but we may say that generally it should begin with an exordium, in which the preacher should state his subject in broad outline, avoiding such naturals as belongs to the separate divisions, sing that this tends to take off the attention from what follows. Then come the divisions, each more distinct the better, and they should not be too many; and then the application, addressed both to the judgment and to theections. The minister here should reason, postulate, warn, exhort, win.

The order of the seasons is useful to the preacher as furnishing him with a variation of topics, and ensuring, if he be painstaking, that shall have each doctrine of the Gospel in session before his eyes. "If I make a rule," says one well-known preacher, "to take one my sermons every Sunday from some passage which has occurred in the Services, and other from something which has not so mured, and so I force myself to search the titures for new material, and so avoid ten tracks." One of the most eminent of living preachers, Dr. Phillips Brooks, in his admirable Lectures on Preaching, lays down the principle that there are two elements to be considered in a sermon, and he calls them Truth and Personality. Preaching is the communication of Truth to man. Nothing can make up for the lack of it. It is truth that binds one preacher to another, and causes the message which they deliver to be received. But the truth is delivered from man to men. It is not written in the sky, it is not merely written in the Bible, it is to be conveyed from man to his fellows, and to be recommended by the vivid personality of the speaker, who delivers what he has received and has felt to be true. Consequently the preacher should know what his preparation ought to be. Not the mere acquisition of knowledge but "the kneading and tempering of a man's whole nature till it becomes of such a consistency and quality as to be capable of transmission. . . . Other works which the sermon writer will find very useful are Claude's Essay on the Composition of a Sermon, Mr. Spurgeon's Lectures on Preaching, delivered to his students, and Mr. D. Moore's Thoughts on Preaching.

Serpentinians. [Ophites.] Servetus, Michael, was born in 1509 at Villanueva in Arragon. His parents held a good position there, his father being a notary of some standing. Like his great contemporary Calvin, Servetus passed his young days in a Dominican convent, and like him, too, his first patron was an ecclesiastic, Quintana by name. This priest was father confessor of the Emperor Charles V., and Servetus went with him into Italy, and was much impressed there by the adoration given by the people to the Pope. Even at that time Servetus evidently held the novel opinions of the times, for he compared the Pope to a harlot. The natural ability and great versatility of intellectual powers with which Servetus was endowed, ought to have secured him a brilliant career, if not as a Reformer yet as a man of letters. At Paris in 1534 he gave and received lessons in medicine, mathematics, and astronomy. He conjectured and almost described the circulation of the blood. Large audiences were attracted to hear him, but owing to his exacting, arrogant character, he was soon embroiled with the whole University of Paris, which distrusted his views. Servetus openly characterised all who differed in opinion with himself as "fools and public pests." When he met at Basle such Reformers as Zwingli, Oeclamadius and Bucer, Servetus was written of by Oeclamadius as "That rash, hot-headed Spaniard." Later on Zwingli warned his friend, Oeclamadius, that "the views of the Spaniard will be the ruin of the whole Christian religion." It is remarkable what a different impression Calvin made on these same men. They saw danger to the Reformed religion in one, hope and strength in the other. In 1531 and 1532 Servetus wandered between Basle and Germany, and it was at Basle that he brought out his first work on The Errors of the Trinity, affixing boldly his own name to the work. This book violently attacked the doctrine of the Trinity, and met with disapproval by Catholics and Protestants alike. Even the most gentle Reformers were almost violent in their denunciation of Servetus and his views. The Government seized the book. Servetus, it is said, was imprisoned for a short time; but almost immediately he published a second work, which, however, was barely noticed. Becoming distrusted and disliked at Paris, where he was forbidden to teach astrology or to predict from the stars, Servetus left that city and settled at Lyons, where he was corrector of the press to a firm of printers. His great want of stability of purpose caused him to change his name and residence constantly; in 1540 he settled at Vienne, in Dauphine, where he was twelve years under the protection of the Archbishop, Mgr. Palmier, adopting the name of Villanueva, his native city. He published there many works, and brought out a translation of the Bible. He was in high repute as a physician, and conformed to the Roman Catholic religion. One of the latest of Calvin’s biographers, Stühelin, and M. Emile Saisset, another distinguished philosopher of the contemporary French school, agree in their opinion of the doctrine of Servetus, the fundamental principle being, they say, the assertion of the one absolute and indivisible God. “That doctrine is Pantheism, with the chaos of logic, mysticism, and mere words which Pantheism offers as rational explanation.” In the year 1534 Calvin and Servetus had met in Paris, and appointed a meeting to carry on their controversy in public. Calvin kept the appointment, but Servetus never appeared, and it is evident, from subsequent events, that Calvin ever after retained a contempt for the man who thus escaped from a contest. Servetus was obliged to acknowledge the wonderful power his opponent had over the minds of most people, and wishing to renew his acquaintance with Calvin he even wrote asking his advice, and sending him a copy of his new book, on The Restoration of Christianity. These letters were numerous between 1540 and 1546, Calvin replying coldly. He gave Servetus wise and earnest advice, evading his cavilling questions, and showing a strong wish not to enter into regular correspondence with him. Servetus, however, continued writing to Calvin, who, at last, was wearied into replying: “Neither now, nor at any future time, will I mix myself up in any way with your wild dreams. Forgive me for speaking thus, but truth compels me.” From this time the correspondence ended on Calvin’s part. Servetus thereupon made fierce attacks on Calvin’s book, Christian Institutes, and eventually he published his own work on the Restoration of Christianity, but anonymously. The book awakened a storm of indignation, especially in Lyons and Geneva, representative places of Catholicism and Protestantism. Servetus was suspected of being the author through the initials M. S. V. (Michael Servetus Villanueva being put at the end of the book, and he was summoned to appear before M. de Montigny, Lieutenant-General du Roi in Dauphine, whom Servetus was physician. He was acquitted, on the alleged ground that the volume was not sufficient evidence that he held heretical opinions. But neither falsehood nor evasions could shield him in an strict inquiry, when the Cardinal de Tournon and the inquisitor Ory took up the matter, making use of information they obtained through a zealous Protestant—De Trinh—by name—and they at last induced Calvin to give up to them many papers in Servetus’s own handwriting, containing some of his heresies. Amongst these papers was a copy of Calvin’s Christian Institutes, on the margin of which Servetus had written notes quite opposed to the Christian dogmas recognised both by Protestants and Catholics. Some have blamed Calvin for the part he took in this matter, as have accused him of duplicity and hypocrisy in showing some hesitation in giving up the papers, and eventually doing so unreservedly. Servetus was confounded by the mass evidence brought to bear against him, a made all sorts of useless and contradictory statements. He was arrested and imprisoned on April 5th, 1553, but was shown much leniency that he escaped after a few days, and wandered about between France and Switzerland for some months. At the end of July, Servetus actually returned to Geneva, where he spent twenty-seven days and excited some curiosity at the inn—the Auberge de la Rose—where he stayed. He even went to hear Calvin preach. Sentence had been passed upon Servetus while he was wandering about after his escape from prison, that “he should be burnt alive over a slow fire at the place of public execution, so that his body should be reduced to cinders as well as his book,” so that when Calvin heard that this “pantheistic visionary was at Geneva, he at once requested one of the syndics to arrest Servetus, which was done on Aug. 13th, 1553. At this time Calvin was engaged in a fierce contest with the Libertines, yet he did not hesitate to open proclaim the fact that it was he who had instigated the re-arrest of Servetus, and that in accordance with the laws of Geneva he had procured the assistance of his friend and secretary, Nicolas de la Fontaine, to act as prosecutor, and to submit to the necessary imprisonment during the trial, which lasted two months and thirteen days. After the first few days the trial became a theological troversy, and Calvin himself took part in Servetus incautiously admitted his pan-stic doctrines, which shocked and embarsed the council, amongst whom were the principal Libertine leaders—Ami Perrin and Ghetier—who were desirous to protect Vetus. But his vanity, frivolity, and unthankfulness led him to disclaim any connection whatever with the Libertines of Geneva,
that their confidence was shaken in him.
A majority of the Genevese magistrates led to modify the character of the trial, which had brought to light so much personal morbidity, and they therefore granted Serve-us's request that the Churches of Berne, rich, Schaffhausen, and Basle should be suitable on his case. They also adjourned trial several times, thus deferring the final decision. On Sept. 22nd, Servetus, after using Calvin in the strongest terms, publicly went so far as to demand that his adversary should be committed for trial, which would only end by the condemnation to death of the two. This attack on Calvin not even noticed; and, deserted by the episcopal censure, which now saw the final crisis was ruined, Servetus sank down into dejection for a time, and he at last appealed in the same abject way that relief might be sent to him in prison, where he was lying ill and sick. Necessary comforts were supplied him, but the "important things," which declared he had to communicate were only a pretext to gain a hearing, and so happens an influence over the minds of those who were sent to him. In October the four fonns sent in their answers, which were mimous in condemning Servetus, recom-mitting severity, but the advice was couched in the most cautious terms. On Oct. 26th, or several adjournments of the trial, the privity of the council decreed that, consi-ing the great errors and blasphemies of Servetus, he should be led to Champel
where burnt alive, and that his books should be burned with him. Calvin made effort to change the manner of Serve-us's death, although he openly admitted that the manner of the stake was what he considered the hence should be. Servetus implored mercy, Farel went to him, urging him to recant, but might lead to a mitigation of the sentence.
also arranged a meeting between Calvin Servetus, which, however, was of no ill, for Calvin's stern exhortation to renter was only wounded Servetus, who kept since asking Calvin's forgiveness at the beginning of the interview. Even in the ths of his despair Servetus refused to give his convictions, and he died even heroically of course the stake, attended by Farel on 27th, 1553.
Serving Tables.—This was a term used the administration of the Holy Communion
the Church of Scotland. This Sacrament formerly was often only administered twice in the year, and during the preceding week frequently preparatory services were held. The communication Sunday services were commenced by what was called the action sermon, and this was followed by a prayer and the singing of a psalm; then the minister proceeded to fence
the table—that is, to give a brief address warning
the ignorant and profane from coming to the holy table, and at the same time setting forth
the characteristics of worthy communicants.
This introductory address was followed by the singing of an appropriate psalm, such as the xxxii., during which the elders brought in the elements, and intending communicants took their places round the communion table, which was arranged so as to preserve the idea of a supper. Then the minister descended from the pulpit, and read from 1 Cor. xi. the account of the institution of the Lord's Supper, and then offered a prayer, popularly called the "consecration prayer." This was followed by an appropriate address to those occupying the table, and was called "serving the table.
Then, while repeating the words of institution,
the minister gave the elements with his own hands to those who were seated on each side of him, and the elders distributed to the rest of the communicants. During a solemn silence each communicant passed to his neighbour
the bread and wine after partaking of them,
then the minister added a few words of advice,
and dismissed them from the table with a blessing. The table was then again filled, and was addressed by one of the assisting ministers,
the minister of the parish taking his seat as a communicant. The service was closed by a psalm of thanksgiving, and a final address to all the communicants. Communion is now generally more frequent, and the practice somewhat modified.
Servites, or "Servants of the Virgin Mary," an Order founded on the festival of the Assumption [1233], at Florence, by seven merchants, one of whom was the uncle of Juliana Falconieri, the foundress of the female Servites in 1306. They previously joined a confraternity to sing the praises of the Virgin, and now withdrew to the Villa Camartia, in a secluded spot outside the city, and devoted themselves entirely to her worship. In 1236 they removed to the Monte Senerio, and built a convent, and in 1239 adopted the Augustinian rule, adding several particular constitutions.
Their habit was black with a leathern girdle, secular and a cope. The order was confirmed by Gregory IX. and Alexander IV., and in 1487, under Innocent VIII., they obtained equal privileges with the other four Mendicant Orders. The Order spread very rapidly, and at the death of the last of its founders, Alexis Falconieri, it numbered over 10,000 monks. It did not appear in England before the Reformation, but at present there is a community in the Fulham Road, London, with a branch at Bognor. There are two convents of Servite nuns near London, and one at Arundel. The great theologian and councillor of Venice, Paolo Sarpi, belonged to the Servite Order.

Servus Servorum Dei ["servant of the servants of God "]—A name used by the Pope when signing his name. St. Gregory the Great is said to be the first who adopted it as a distinctive title, and he did so as a rebuke to John, Patriarch of Constantinople, who styled himself Universal Bishop or Ecumenical Patriarch.

Session, Kirk. [Kirk Session.]

Sethians. —An Egyptian sect of the second century, who belonged to the Gnostic heresy. Their distinguishing doctrine was that they looked upon Seth, Noah’s son, as the most holy man of the Old Testament, and firmly believed that the Messiah, when He came, would be descended from him. Some writers class them with the Ophites [q.v.]. Irenæus says that they allowed that the Christ descended upon Jesus at His baptism, but left Him at the Crucifixion. Another of their theories was that the angels, and not God, were the creators of the world.

Sevenfold Gifts. —The gifts of the Holy Spirit which were to rest on the Messiah, as enumerated by the Prophet Isaiah [Is. xi. 2]. In the Confirmation Service they are given thus:—The spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and ghostly strength, the spirit of knowledge and true godliness, and the spirit of God’s holy fear. The Authorised Version only gives six gifts, but some writers explain this by saying, “The Spirit of the Lord” is a distinct gift in itself, and is synonymous with “the spirit of prophecy.”

Seventh Day Baptists. [Sabbatarians.]

Severinus, St., Abbot of Noricum.—Of his early days we know absolutely nothing. He came from the East about the year 452 to Pannonia, a district where no sort of order was kept, and moved about from town to town, helping with his advice and prayers the wretched people, then exposed to the ravages of the barbarians. At length he settled in Noricum, a Roman province occupying the present Austria and parts of Bavaria. Severinus built a monastery near Vienna, and from there he and his followers made excursions through the neighbouring towns, trying to organise some kind of government, and preaching the Gospel at the same time. His success was great, and in time he was consulted by all the chiefs of the country before they took a step of any importance, and his advice was always followed. One great secret of his power was the kindness and cordiality with which he greeted all who came to him, whether they were of his own creed or not. His influence over barbarian chiefs was marvellous. The most famous of these chiefs was Ododac, we came to Severinus for advice before attempting to gain the kingdom of Italy, on which he had set his heart. After labouring faithfully for thirty years he died on New Year’s Day 482, at Fiviana, a city on the Danube.

Severus, Sulpius, an eminent historian was born in Gaul, 363; died at Marseilles, 439. He was a lawyer, but on the death of his wife adopted a retired life, living in Aquitaine with a few chosen companions. He was an intimate friend of Paulinus, Bishop of Nola. He wrote an abridgment of sacred history from the creation to the end of the third century, a life of St. Martin of Tours, and a dialogue on the Egyptian hermits.

Sewell, William, D.D., born in 1744, died in 1811. He was a Fellow of Exeter College, and one of the most distinguished members of the University during the Oxford Movement; and was the founder of Radley and of St. Columba. Among his numerous works may be mentioned—Hera Philologica, or Conjectures on the Structure of the Greek Language; Christian Morals, an Introduction to the Dialogues of Plato; Nation, the Church, and the University of Oxford; The Character of Plato and Aristotle; The Character of the Church; The Servant of Christ; numbers of sermons, addresses, and letters.

Sexagesima. [Quinquagesima.]

Shaftesbury, Anthony Cooper, Earl of [b. 1671, d. 1713].—A Deist, says of himself that John Locke had entire direction of his education. He went to Winchester; in 1693 he began Parliamentary career, in which he had some success; but after Anne’s accession, devoted himself to literary pursuits. 1708 he published his Letter on Enthusiasm in 1709 Moralists, a Philosophical Rhapsody and Sensus Communis, or Essays on Wit and Humour; in 1710 Soliloquy, or Advice to Author. His writings, in spite of the sceptical tendency, were admired, and he has a great name in the history of English philosophy and literature. In 1711 appear Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, Times; in this work he covertly attacks Christianity, saying that its only purpose is to advance morality.

Shaftesbury, Anthony Ashley Cooper, 7th Earl of, the descendant of a long line of famous men, was born in Dorsetshire 1801; died, 1885. He was educated at Harrow and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he gained a first-class in the classical schools; graduated in 1822. In 1826 he was elected member for Woodstock, and in Parliament specially devoted himself to the question of Indian administration. But soon the state the lower classes at home came under notice, and he began that work to which afterwards devoted his life, and which ile his name so universally famous—that of proving the condition of the poor. His effort in this direction was the passing the Factory Act, which he effected after a long trouble and opposition on the part of Commons. But the chief of all his good works, and the one with which his name was nearly associated, was the institution of Ragged Schools. He was led to this work discovering the state of utter ignorance which existed amongst the lower classes. He sulking in his efforts, and brought several measures before the Lower House; but in 2, on the death of his father, he succeeded the peerage, and was able to draw the attention of the House of Lords to some of his times. He went on working to the end his life, and saw many of his plans achieve conclusion some time before his death, so was able to spend the last years of his life in comparative retirement. His sym- bles were entirely with the "Evangelical Party" in the Church, and he was President the Protestant Alliance, the Bible Society, Pastoral Aid Society, and the Society for Conversion of the Jews. He took a warm interest in the employment of youths as shoec- kers. In 1884 he was presented with the pension of the City of London, and in May of following year received an address from members of the Ragged Schools as a token their gratitude. It was proposed that he should be interred in Westminster Abbey, but had expressed the wish before he died to be buried near his wife at his native home in rechts.

Shakers.—By having some similarity the Quakers the Shakers are supposed to a branch of that sect. Their founder was George Lee, who left England on account of persecution, and went to New York in 1774, where she soon attracted a good following. He rose to importance from her receiving a posed revelation in 1770 testifying against carnal nature of the flesh as the root of man-depravity. She was called the "Elect" or "Mother Anne," and her followers asserted that she was the mother of all the sect, and that no blessing could descend to any son but by and through her. She died in 1774, but the society continued to exist. The name "Shakers" was given them on account the extraordinary contortions into which they throw their bodies all through the per- manence of their services. These exercises consist of jumping, dancing, and singing, clap- ping of hands, whirling round and round, which resulted in fits of shaking similar to those of the Cure. They lay claim to extraordinary spiritual gifts, besides the gift of tongues and of prophecy. They discard marriage, and declare all external ordinances of religion ceased with the Apostles. Even now they exist in great numbers in the United States of America. Their chief settlement is in New Lebanon, but there are seventeen more in different parts of America. Some years ago a branch of these Shakers established themselves at Hordle in the New Forest, where they led a camp life under the guidance of their mother, Elizabeth Girling. She pro- fessed to be immortal, but in the year 1856 she died, to the dismay of her adherents. These have gradually dwindled down to an insignificant number; they suffered great privation, and would have been starved had not the neighbouring clergy and other charitable people ministered to their necessities. On the death of Mrs. Girling the society was broken up.

Shamrock.—The national badge of Ire- land. Tradition says that it was adopted as such after the coming of St. Patrick to convert the Irish, A.D. 433; for in order to explain the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity, he showed them a shamrock-leaf, saying, "Is it not as possible for the Godhead to comprise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, as for these three leaves to grow upon a single stalk and to be three in one?" The Irish were at once convinced by his argument, and were converted to Christianity, in memory of which they have always regarded the sham- rock as their national emblem.

Sharp, Granville, a great opponent of negro slavery, was born at Durham, where his father was prebendary, in 1734; died in London, 1813. He was educated for the bar, but never practised, and entered the Ordnance Office, which he left on account of the measures taken by the British Government at the outbreak of the American War. In 1769 he published a work on the Injustice and Dangers Tendency of Tolerating Slavery in England, and soon after came forward on behalf of a negro named Somerset who had been brought to London, and on falling ill had been turned out of doors by his master. Sharp took care of him till he was cured, and then procured him a situation; but the master two years after captured and imprisoned him as a runaway slave. The case was tried, and referred to twelve judges, who finally declared, in May, 1772, that all slaves should be free on touching English soil. Sharp continued to write against slavery, and in 1787 was made chairman of the first meeting for the abolition of negro slavery.

Sharp, James, Archbishop of St. Andrews, was born at Banff, 1618. He was educated at the University of Aberdeen, and in 1640 became Regent or Professor of Philosophy in St. Leonard's College, St. Andrews, which post he soon exchanged for that of minister of Crail. In 1656 he was sent to London with some of the Resolutioners to plead their cause before the Protector. He had ingratiated himself with Cromwell, but Shastra or Shastras.—The name given to the sacred books of the Hindus, which contain their law both on civil and religious subjects. It consists of four parts, all of which were written at different times, in the Sanskrit language, and are said to have been collected by Manu, the son of Brahma.

Sheldon, Gilbert, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Staunton, in Staffordshire, in 1598; died at Lambeth, 1677. In 1613 he entered Trinity College, Oxford; in 1622 was admitted Fellow of All Souls', and at the same time ordained and appointed Chaplain to Lord Coventry, who recommended him to Charles I., and from that time he received numerous preferments. In 1633 he was presented by the King to the livings of Hackney, and of Ickford in Buckinghamshire, while Laud gave him the rectory of Newington, in Oxfordshire. He became a D.D. in 1634, and the next year Warden of All Souls' College, Chaplain to the King, and Clerk of the Closet. The appointments of Master of the Savoy Hospital and Dean of Westminster would also have fallen to him had not the Civil War broken out. He adhered to the King throughout, and was witness of the vow which he made to the effect that if he were restored to his throne he would give back to the Church all the appropriations held by the Crown. By his zeal for the King, Sheldon gave great offence to the Parliamentarians, who ejected him from his fellowship and imprisoned him for six months, only releasing him on a promise that he would never come within five miles of Oxford, that he would not join the King in the Isle of Wight, and that he would appear before them within fourteen days whenever cited. He retired to Derbyshire, and there lived till the Restoration. He then became again Warden of All Souls', and also Dean of the Chapel Royal and Bishop of London, and Master of the Savoy, so that he presided over the Savoy Conference of 1663 concerning which he is much blamed for unnecessary hostility towards the Puritans. In 1663 he succeeded Juxon as Archbishop of Canterbury. During the Great Plague he remained at Lambeth, and did much good to his charity. He became Chancellor of Oxford University in 1667, but resigned the post eighteen months after. During his last years he lived chiefly at Croydon, and was buried in Croydon Church.

Various opinions are held as to Dr. Sheldon's character. Bishop Parker of Oxford describes him as a man of undoubted piety, with a great aversion to all pretences in other Bishop Burnet, on the other hand, says that he 'seemed not to have a deep sense of religion, if any at all; and spoke of it not commonly as of an engine of government for a matter of policy.' The truth of this judgment seems to be shown by a curious passage in Pepys's Diary, which tells that on one occasion visiting Lambeth, he was invited to hear a sermon, and went, 'expecting to listen to something serious, instead of which the doors were closed, and a colonel imitated a Presbyter in a most ludicrous manner, turning his eyes and talking through his nose, using Puritan phrases in abundance, till the room echoed with shrieks of laughter. Sheldon himself was one of the audience. The sermon is almost incredible, but Pepys was not given to invention of this sort, and we have preserved herein that the prevailing irreligion of times had infected Sheldon himself. He is said to have spent over sixty thousand pounds on public benefactions to learn and other pious uses. Thus he built a theatre at Oxford which bears his name and cost him about £16,000, besides £2,000 to buy lands to keep it in repair. He created the library at Lambeth, gave £2,000 towards the rebuilding of St. Paul's Cathedral, and considerable sums of money to several colleges both at Oxford and Cambridge.

The only publication left by the Archbishop was a sermon on Ps. xviii. 49, preached before the King at Whitehall on June 24, 1660, being the day of solemn thanksgiving for the Restoration.

Sherborne, Bishopric of.—About the year 705, Sherborne in Dorsetshire was made into a bishopric, the diocese being taken out of that of Winchester. It comprised Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, and a part of Wiltshire (sometimes called the Diocese of Wilton, or Wiltunensis); but in 1060 the two bishoprics were re-united, their seat removed in 1076 to Old Sarum, and in 1220, by Bishop Richard Poore, to Salisbury.

An abbey was built here in 998 by Rialdus Wulfisson on the site of an earlier cathedral.
church raised on the formation of the See Ina, King of the West Saxons. This was burnt by Sweyn, and the present minster was begun about 1060. In 1436 the roof, choir, and east end were destroyed by fire, and rebuilt in the Perpendicular style by bots Bradford and Saunders [1436-1475], between 1830 and 1858 it has undergone complete restoration. It is dedicated to St. Aldhelm [q.v.] a by far the most noted. There were ten hops of Ramsbury or Wilton, the last one, rumen, being consecrated in 1045, who in 98 became Bishop also of Sherborne. Edward VI. founded a King’s School at Sherborne in 1550, which has an endowment of 000 a year, and several exhibitions at Ford and Cambridge.

Sherlock, Thomas, Bishop of London, the son of Dr. William Sherlock, was born in London in 1678. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, where he graduated in 1701. Six years later his father, who was Master of the Temple, was appointed Dean of St. Paul’s, and his son Thomas was given the Mastership. He was afterwards successively Bishop of Bangor, Salisbury, and London. He died in 1761. In politics he was a firm Tory and a strong upholder of the policy of Church and State. He was Holland’s most formidable opponent in the BANGORIAN CONTROVERSY [q.v.]. He was much esteemed as a preacher in his day, and published a volume of sermons, some of which are very fine. Among his other literary works we may mention Use and Intent of Prophecy, and Trial of the Witnesses of the Resurrection of Jesus.

Sherlock, William D.D., born in Southwark about 1641; died, 1707. He was educated at Cambridge, and, having held several London livings, was made Master of the Temple; this he held, with the exception of a few months at the time of the Revolution in 1689, till his death. His conduct at the time of the Revolution has been the subject of much criticism. At first, there is no doubt, he, with several other eminent Churchmen, refused to take the oath of allegiance to the new Government; but later, when he saw the new system working well and William apparently firmly settled, he changed his mind, took the oath, and was allowed to resume his duties at the Temple. Some writers say that he changed his mind on conscientious grounds, others that he did it solely with an eye to the main chance. There is this to be said for him, that he received nothing whatever at the hands of the new Government, but remained what he had been before—the Master of the Temple. He vindicated his conduct in a pamphlet entitled The Case of Allegiance to Sovereign Princes Stated. His name as a writer was great, other works being: Vindication of the Doctrine of the Trinity and the Incarnation of the Son of God, and several treatises on Providence and Future Judgment.

Shiites.—One of the two chief divisions of Mahomedanism. Their religion has been the established one of Persia for the last four hundred years. After Mahomed they revere the memory of Ali, the fourth of the Caliphs who succeeded Mahomed. For this reason they are regarded as unorthodox by their rivals, the SONSITES [q.v.], who recognise the rights of the first three Caliphs. The Shiites hold Fatima, Mahomed’s daughter and Ali’s wife, in the greatest veneration, which is the only known instance of Mahomedans giving homage to a woman. When the Shiites are called to the mosques for prayer, they add to the usual declaration, “There is no God but God, and Mahomet is His prophet,” the words, “and Ali is His vicear.” They occasionally make pilgrimages to Mecca in common with other Moslems, though Bagdad is sanctioned for this purpose, and is often chosen as being a shorter and less laborious journey.

Shin-Shiu [or Reformed Buddhism], literally the “True Sect,” is said by its followers to have been established in China, A.D. 381, by Hwui-zuen, who introduced the worship of the fourth of the five Buddhas. This religion was founded on a Sanscrit writing, brought to China from India in the second century, which has lately been found in Japan. The members of the sect believe in salvation by faith in Buddha, and in ultimate bliss in the Paradise of the West. The Jōdō-shinshū, or “True Sect of the Pure Land,” derived from the above, was not established till 1173, by a priest named Hōnen; it was afterwards developed by his pupil. The sect is a curious mixture of doctrines, partly resembling Protestantism and partly Romanism; its chief temple and “archbishop” are at Kioto, and it numbers about ten million followers in Japan alone. Other Buddhists do not acknowledge Shin-Shiu, and in many Buddhist countries it is unknown. [See Buddhism.]

Shinto, or Sintoism.—The most ancient form of religion held by the Japanese, which chiefly consisted in the worship of the Kami or honoured dead. From these after many evolutions sprang Izanagi and Izanami, two of their chief gods, who created the earth. Another important object of their worship is the goddess Tensio-Dai-Dsin, from whom were descended the Dairi, the spiritual head of the Shintoists, and also their temporal head until the middle of the twelfth century. This dignity was supposed to be invested with almost superhuman attributes, and to be visited by the gods once in every year. The temples were called Mias, and were perfectly plain, with neither images nor pictures. Their worship consisted of prayers and prostrations. They had frequent lustrations, and twice a year a general purification took place. In the ninth century a priest, Kukai, showed that Shintoism was very similar to Buddhism, which caused several divisions, as “Rōbu,” a mixture of Shinto and Buddhism; Yuiitsu, Buddhism with a Shinto basis; Deguchi, Shinto explained by the Chinese Book of Changes; and Suiga, a mixture of Deguchi and the tenets of Chiu-hi. Divided into these different religions, Shinto gradually disappeared. In the eighteenth century, a school of writers deciphered and edited the Shinto scriptures, which caused the revival of Sintoism for a short time; but, after the restoration of the monarchy in Tokio, it was abolished. It is still, however, a living power among millions of the Japanese.

Shortened Form of Service.—Under the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act, 1872, it is allowable in Church of England services to substitute a shortened form for that prescribed for morning and evening service except on Sundays, Christmas Day, New Year’s Day, Good Friday, Ascension Day. Such shortened form omits the exhortation and all the prayers between the third Collect and the Prayer of St. Chrysostom, uses Lord's Prayer once instead of twice, one less at the discretion of the minister, and one Canticule and Psalm only.

Shrine.—A term derived from the Latin serinium, applied either to a tomb or to a movable repository of relics. We sometimes find the tomb of a man, much held in honor after his death, called a shrine, although it may not have been regularly canonised. It was the custom for pilgrims to come in distances to visit the shrine of some pope or saint; and to make offerings of all sorts of valuable jewellery, etc.—as, for example, the shrine of St. Thomas at Canterbury. Shrines in England were nearly all destroyed at the time of the dissolution of the monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII.

Shroud, Festival of the Holy, held the Roman Catholics on the Friday after second Sunday in Lent, in memory of the shroud in which our Lord was wrapped before his burial. There are several churches or Continent dedicated to it, and at the shrine erected to its memory many wonderful miracles are said to be wrought. Indulge were formerly offered to those that visited the shrine of the shroud at Besançon on certain days of the year, and crowds of pilgrims to flock thither.

Shrove Tuesday [Shrive]—day before Ash Wednesday, so called because the Anglo-Saxon shrive or shrove. This Anglo-Saxon in form [scribun], is real Latin word Anglicised. “scribun, “to write “to draw up a law,” and hence “to impenance.” It was in ancient times the custom to confess on the day before Lent, so as to begin the Fast by receiving Communion.

Shuckford, Samuel [d. 1754], Cura Shelton, in Norfolk, Prebendary of Carbury, and Rector of All Hallows, Long Street, London, was the author of The S and Profane History of the World com from the Creation of the World to the Di- of the Assyrian Empire at the Dea Sarananapals, and to the Declension of Kingdoms of Judah and Israel under Reigns of Abaz and Tekah. This was intended as a continuation of Prideaux’s but was never completed.

Sibylline Books.—In the reign of quinius Superbus, so goes the legend, certain Sibyl came to Rome, bringing her nine books, which she avowed to be of priceless value, but which she never Sidesmen.—In ancient episcopal synods bishops were wont to summon laymen, or more, according to the size of the sees, who should appear at the synod and give account of their respective parishes, the conduct of both clergy and people, of any needs or any wrongs which they observed. These were called testes synodorum or popularly synodomen; and this became mede into sidesmen. In their origin, therefore, they are the same as churchwardens. They were also sometimes called "questioners" as making quest or inquiry concerning cases. They became in time standing persons in many places, especially in large sees, and are chosen, in accordance with 90, at the Easter Vestry.

Siena, Council of.—At the dissolution he Council of Constance it was resolved as the question of the reformation of the Church had been so slightly dealt with, her Council should meet in Pavia in five years. When the time came [1452], the question there so fiercely that the Pope ordered the members to remove to Rome. By this means, as Siena was near Rome, he was able to exercise more influence over the arrangements of the Council. The king of Wielich and Huss was condemned, after that, the various members began to rebel, and the Papal party objected to the admission of the representatives of the nations. It came the question of fixing the place of the next Council, and after many disputes Basle was decided upon; and on 14th, 1454, the Council was dissolved, having effected absolutely nothing.

Simeon, Charles.—One of the chief party leaders of this century in the Church of England [1754–1836]. He was Incumbent of Holy Church, Cambridge, for more than thirty years, and by the great influence of his personal piety, and his zeal and vigour as a preacher, he became the chief representative of the Low Church party, into the teaching of which he infused a larger element of Calvinism than it had hitherto possessed. His power with the undergraduates of the University was very great. "Charles Simeon's preaching," writes Dr. Stoughton, from his own pleasant recollections, "was not penetrating like dew, but coming down like hailstones and coals of fire. He spoke as one who had a burden from the Lord to deliver—as one who, like Paul, felt 'Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel.' Simeon's Hora Homiletica is a work containing 2,536 sermon outlines upon the entire Scriptures, and of real value, though critical ability is not to be looked for. In his zeal for Calvinising the Church he founded a scheme for buying up advowsons, and the Clergy List gives eighty livings as in the gift of the Simeon Trustees.

Simeon Stylites [from stylos, "a pillar"], the originator of the custom of doing penance by living on a pillar, was born probably about 390 at Sisan, between Antioch and Cilicia. He was brought up by Christian parents, and when fifteen years old was induced to enter a monastery near his home, where he stayed two years, and then went to one at the foot of Mount Corythus, where he spent ten years. But the austerities were not great enough for him, and he then lived as a hermit in a little house under the peak of the mountain Telanassus. Here he used to fast forty days at a time, in imitation of Moses and Elias. After three years he took possession of the peak, had a wall built round him, and fastened one end of a chain twenty cubits long to a great stone, and the other to his right foot, so that he could not if he wished leave his bounds. His fame spread over all the country, and the sick and palsied came from far and wide—even, it is said—from Spain, Britain, and Gaul, to be healed. At last, wishing to escape from them, he ordered a pillar six cubits high to be built, which was afterwards increased to twelve, twenty-two, and thirty-six. Here he lived for forty or fifty years, spending his time, as is related by his disciple Anthony, in working miracles, teaching the people, meditating, and praying. He died in 460. He was buried with great pomp at Antioch.

There were two other pillar saints of the name of Simeon, one being called Fulminatus from having been killed by lightning; he lived in the twelfth century, and seems to have been one of the last to adopt the practice.

Simon Magnus.—In the second century the Christian Church was assailed by what proved a long and lasting trouble—viz. the appearance of heresy respecting the Person and Nature of Christ. That it had begun when St. John wrote, may be seen by his denunciations of those who dispute the doctrine of Christ [2 John 10]. Simon Magnus has been by some declared to be the first of the Gnostics, and to have asserted that he was an Æon, or emanation from God. He was by birth a Samaritan, and tradition identifies him with the man mentioned in Acts viii. 9. If we may trust the somewhat uncertain traditions of him, he went to Egypt, and there learned all sorts of heathen philosophy and magic. On his return he practised his acquired arts, announcing that they were the sure signs of his Divine authority. He seems to have had many followers, among whom may be mentioned Menander and Dositheus, and a small sect declared themselves his followers for some years. Tradition says that he attempted to fly from the top of the Capitol, intending to represent the return of our Lord in glory, and died from the effect of the fall.

Simon’s, St., and St. Jude’s Day.—Kept by the Church on Oct. 28th. Very little is said of these saints in the Gospels, but where they are mentioned they are always together, and were most likely brothers. It is not quite easy to identify them. With regard to St. Simon, some writers have contested that there were two Apostles with the name Simon, because in St. Matthew he is called Canaanite and in St. Luke, Zeleotes. But when it is realised that Zeleotes is nothing but the Greek equivalent of Canaanite, which was the name given to the strictest sect of the Pharisees, it is easy to identify them as the same. He was some relation to our Lord—most likely His half-brother. St. Jude has also two surnames, Thaddeus and Lebbeus. Thaddeus is generally supposed to be a name of endearment for Judas, and Lebbeus is a Hebrew word meaning heart; but the derivation of both the words, and the reason they were applied to St. Jude, is quite uncertain. The collect for the day does not speak of them and their work in particular, but of “the blessed saints” in general.

Simionians, St. [Socialism.]

Simony originally meant the sin of buying and selling spiritual gifts, which was so called from Simon Magnus, who attempted to buy the gift of the Holy Spirit. In the early Church the practice of buying ordination was severely censured; both ordained and ordainer were subject to total excommunication. From this head were also considered the sins of exacting a reward for administering baptism or the Holy Communion, Confirmation, or any other similar rite. Afterwards two other kinds of simony were recognised, viz. [1] purchasing spiritual preferments, and [2] usurpation of holy offices. In the first three centuries there was no law against the former, as the stipends for offices were small, and to hold them was attended by great danger of persecution; but afterwards a bishopric was much sought after, and so tried to gain one by bribing the stewards, This was condemned by the Council of Chalcedon; and by the laws of Justin every elector had to take an oath that chose the elected, not from any gift or promise, but because he believed he was fit for the position. Under usurpation of holy offices is included the investing of any man in an office or preferment to which he had legal title, or the intruding into any position which was already filled. Thus several historical bishops who took possession of seats ready occupied by orthodox men were accused of simony. Also it was forbidden for bishops to move arbitrarily from one see to another without the consent of the Provincial Council.

Sin.—The commonest word for sin in the Greek Testament is hamartia, and it has the same meaning as the commonest word in Old Testament. [See Gesenius’s Heb. I. s.v. chata.] That meaning is strictly a failure to do what God has dictated or a failure to live up to what God has declared to be right. The other New Testament word, parapetoma, “transgression,” is derived from a word signifying, “to fall down besideth Allison.” The Scripture gives no definition of sin, the whole tenor of it indicates that this rests in failure to regard and do the will of God. It is selfishness, which is the set up of the individual will against that of Divine Creator and King. That he is willing to be righteous and love, forbearance, and hope. “This is the will of God, even your sanctification,” writes an inspired Apostle [1 Thess. iv. 3]. Each of the words meaning heart; but the derivation of both the words, and the reason they were applied to St. Jude, is quite uncertain. The collect for the day does not speak of them and their work in particular, but of “the blessed saints” in general.

d's will is evil must be clear at once; the heinousness of the guilt will vary according to circumstances. The conscience of mankind, and the voice of Scripture bear witness to this. Thus man is, according to Scripture, infected with Original Sin (q.v.). The Scripture also declares all men commit actual sin, and the incipience bears witness to the fact. Singing.—An ordinance of Divine Worship used to spread forth the praise of God. All times this has been a branch of worship, among heathens as well as Christians. It was practised by God's people before the giving of the law, and is enjoined both by ceremonial and by the Apostles under the Christian dispensation. The public worship of the mitre Christians consisted mainly in un-singing, which developed to a great extent when the persecutions ceased. The people met before dusk for the purpose of singing hymns; and St. Basil says that it was customary to sing hymns in private uses. St. Augustin considered that the secular used in his time for Church services was secular, and recommended the practice of having the Psalms recited with very slight modifications, consisting only of a few notes.

In the Anglican rubric the reference is made, "Quires and places where they sing," and in the rubric before the Canticles, Psalms, and Litany, directs them to be "sung." At the present time in most churches where there is a regular choir, the anticle and Psalms are sung, and in many Cathedral plan is followed of "Choral vice." This proceeds on the interpretation of the two words, that "sung" means in musical inflections and "said" either in manner of reading or in monotone.

Sion College was founded with some money left for the purpose by Dr. Thomas White, in 1630. There had previously been, the street known as "London Wall," a giotic house founded in the fourteenth century, a priory for the reception of the Jews. The ground was, therefore, sacred to the Scientists, and White, who was rector of St. Martin's-in-the-West, sought to restore it to religious use. His plan was to make a college of which all vicars and incumbents in City should be Fellows. There is an extensive library attached, containing more than 500 volumes, founded by one of Dr. White's executors, Dr. John Simpson, Rector of St. John's, Hart Street, and containing among other scarce works the Jesuit library seized in 1604. All the clergy of London are privileged to use this library, and they may borrow books for the payment of an annual subscription charge for incumbents is one guinea, for curates. Under the copyright of Queen Anne a copy of all books entered at Stationers' Hall was sent to the library; but this was put a stop to in 1836 by an Act of Parliament, the sum of £363 15s. 2d. being ordered to be paid annually as compensation, the money being applied exclusively to the purchase of books. The Bishop of London has been the Visitor of the College ever since its foundation, and the government of the whole body is carried on by the president, two deans, and four assistants, all of whom are elected by the Fellows to hold office for a year. In Defoe's time the College included almshouses for ten men and ten women. In 1884 the house in London Wall was sold, and the ground built over, and in 1886 a handsome building was erected on the Thames Embankment.

Sion, Notre Dame De.—This is an Order which specially devotes itself to the bringing up of Jewish children in the faith of the Roman Catholic Church. The founder was M. Alphonse Ratisbonne, a Jew, who declares that he had always felt a strong antipathy to the teaching of Christianity until one day in 1842, while standing in a church at Rome, he saw a vision of the Virgin. He was so much impressed, that he was induced to study the question closely, and very soon after was baptised. His brother had previously been converted, and the two together determined to found an Order for the conversion of the Jews. This they did in Paris, and branches were soon established not only in France, but in England and the East, one standing in the Via Dolorosa at Jerusalem.

Si quis.—A name given to the notice appointed to be read in a parish church when any parishioner intends entering holy orders. The form of the notice, after the name and degree of the candidate have been given, is as follows:—"If any person (si quis) knows any just cause or impediment, for which the said M. N. should not be admitted into holy orders, he is now to declare the same, or to signify the same by letter forthwith to the Lord Bishop of_______."

Sirmond, Jacques, was born at Riom in Auvergne, in 1559; died at Paris, 1651. He studied at the Jesuit College at Billom, and in 1667 joined the Order. He was Professor of Rhetoric at Paris in 1590, then went to Rome to become Secretary to Aquaviva, General of the Jesuits. He remained there, studying the manuscripts in the Vatican library, until 1608, when he returned to Paris, and became Rector of the College there in 1617, and Confessor to Louis XIII in 1637.

Sirmond visited the libraries and archives of the convents, and saved many valuable manuscripts, which he published. He edited the Opuscules of Geoffrey, Abbot of Vendôme, and the works of Enodium, Bishop of Pavia; of Apollonius Sidonius; of Eugenius, Bishop of Toledo; the chronicles of Solarius and Marcellinus; the collections of Anastasius the Librarian; the Capitolarii of Charles the Bald and his successors; the works of Theodulphe, Bishop of Orleans; also Flodoard's Histoire de Rheims, the Letters of Peter de Cellis, and the works of Paschasius Radbertus, of Himinar, Archbishop of Rheims, and of Theodoret. He published also an account of the Councils of France.

Sisterhoods.—These Orders, which of late years have been revived in the English Church, are of very early origin. Sisters must not be confused with Deaconesses [q.v.], the difference being that sisters were always members of a body, each being responsible to their superior; whereas deaconesses were generally free, devoting their lives to the care of the poor and the sick entirely in their own way, not under vows. St. Jerome, in his writings, speaks of a girl and her mother who lived in a convent with a few other women, spending their time in good works; and we find references to them in both St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine. All through the history of these Orders we find again and again their apparent dislike to solitude. The first female hermit, Syncretica, was followed into the desert by several of her former companions, and together they made a small colony. At first the history of the female Orders is identical with that of the male, and it seemed as though one would be but an imitation of the other. But in the eleventh century female monachism made a great advance. This was caused to a great extent by the Crusades, which united all Christian nations in one cause against the Mahommedan. Several of the highborn ladies, who had lost their fathers, brothers, or husbands in the wars, wished to retire from the world till quieter times. They did not feel inclined to take the vows necessary for the cloister life, and so we find them establishing themselves together in communities, not bound by any vows, nor promising to renounce intercourse with the world, but simply living together a life of meditation and prayer, and helping their poorer neighbours in such ways as they could. These were called Beguines [from the Teutonic word beg, "to pray"]. These communities were quickly established in different countries, notably in Germany, Belgium, and Italy; two still survive in the town of Ghent and Bruges. In course of time the Beguines extended their sphere of work, and founded hospitals, penitentiaries, and schools. For the last four centuries the education of girls of all classes has been largely connected with sisterhoods. In the eleventh century these sisters were by far the best educated of any of their sex, many of them being able to read Virgil and Terence in the original. Large bodies of sisters were organised in connection with the Franciscan and Dominican Orders, who were known the name of the "Grey Sisters;" an attempt was also made to establish an Order of Jesuitesses, but without success. All time female education had been their care, but at the beginning of the seventeenth century a movement was made in France to provide for the relief of the suffering poor, and in course of time the Sisters of Charity were organised. They had no property, were maintained and provided for by community. They passed through a period of probation, and were then called upon to take certain vows, which had to be renewed every year, they being at liberty to leave the institution when they liked. The movement found great favour both in France and the Netherlands, and several public institutions in Paris were given into their charge, similar society, called the Congregation of Joseph, was founded some years later. So that time sisterhoods have increased wonderfully, nearly all having for their object the reformation of fallen women, of which Daughters of the Good Shepherd may give as an example. From the time of the Reformation, for many years, no thought pears to have been taken of sisterhood the Church of England, and when, in the Church Revival of the present century, establishment of sisterhoods was first taken in hand, the movement was regarded with much suspicion and dislike. The first sisterhood in connection with the Church of England was founded by Miss Sellon in 1848, the benefit of the poor of Plymouth, great opposition was raised, but Bishop Pott's of Exeter bravely stood by her, her success among the rough sailors was wonderful and unmistakable, that she was said to have secured the success of the movement, and to have disarmed opposition. In the following year the Sisterhood St. John, at Clewer [Monseil, Harriet], established, the members of which devoted themselves entirely to fallen women, since then several others have arisen in different parts of England, such as the Samaritans, of which Sister Dora was, a time, a member. The sisters generally wear a distinguishing dress, but this is no universal rule; and they are not obliged to take vows, though it is understood that they mean to devote themselves heart and soul to the work. Six Articles, The, passed June 2 1559, by the English Parliament; a moment on the part of Henry VIII. and Roman Catholics to restore Romanism in part of the doctrines of the Reformation. Six Articles were popularly known as "Bloody Statute," or "The Whip with Strings." They required the people's quiescence in [1] the doctrine of Transubstantiation; [2] the use of private masses;

But at the time in which the Apostles lived, slavery was an organised system, and never worse in its conditions than at that time, and it was clear that its abolition could only be a matter of progressive growth or change, to be wrought by the mutual love which would spring up in the followers of Christ. Sixtus was chosen Pope in place, and held that dignity for about a year. His parents were Greek, but he had been brought up in Rome, and was greatly ached to the Church in that city, where he had served the office of deacon. Slavery.—It has been a matter of cavil unbelievers that Christ gave no commands the subject of slavery, that neither He nor his immediate successors, the Apostles, should be prohibited it, and that St. Paul, by sending Onesimus to Philemon, and by exhort-

Smith, John Pye, D.D., LL.D. [b. at Sheffield, 1774; d. at Guildford, 1851], Congregational minister, studied theology at Rotherham College, and became theological professor at Homerton College, which post he held from 1805 to 1850. He was the first Dissenter to study and propound German theology, and was looked upon by his brethren as unorthodox, because he followed the discoveries of modern science, and showed how they might be reconciled to Divine revelation. He wrote the Scripture Testimony to the Messiah, Four Discourses on the Sacrifice and Priesthood of Jesus Christ (a defence of Evangelicalism); Scripture and Geology, and the First Lines of Christian Theology.

Smith, Sydney, the famous English wit, was born at Woodford, in Essex, in 1771; died in London, 1845. He was educated at Winchester on the Wykeham foundation, and rose to be captain of the school: then at New College, Oxford; was ordained in 1794, and two years after became Curate of Nether Avon, near Amesbury, where he remained till 1798, and then accepted the office of tutor to the son of his squire, Mr. Hicks-Beach. In 1800 he became Incumbent of the Charlotte Episcopal church in Edinburgh. Here, together with Francis, afterwards Lord Jeffrey, and others, he started the Edinburgh Review, the first number of which was published in October, 1802. In 1804 he removed to London, where he became popular as a preacher, and also as a wit. In 1806 he was made Rector of Foston-le-Clay, in Yorkshire, and eighteen years later the Duke of Devonshire presented him to the living of Londesborough. In 1828 Lord Lyndhurst made him a Prebendary of Bristol, and enabled him to exchange Foston for Combe Florey, in Somersetshire. In 1831 he became a Canon of St. Paul's.

His chief works were: Peter Plymley's Letters, written in 1807, to promote Catholic Emancipation; Speeches on the Catholic Claims and Reform Bill; The Ballot; several sermons and letters; and numerous contributions to the Edinburgh Review.

Socialism.—English Socialism is defined by its founder, Robert Owen [1771–1858], as the Science of Happiness. Its object is to promote the well-being of man in society first of all, his well-being as an individual necessarily following. Socialism is undeveloped Positivism or Comtism [Positivism], and in this it is now for the most part merged.

On its religious side, Socialism is a form of Pantheism, and God or Nature is resolved into a "mysterious power which permeates every particle of the elements which compose the universe, and these elements possess qualities which are unchangeable, and operate according to fixed laws, which are called the laws of Nature."

By this power man has been made what he is, and he must be, in the future, what the power shall make him to become. Man therefore, entirely dependent on this power for all his faculties, and all that he possesses. Man is thus non-responsible, except in so far as he is necessarily amenable to the natural consequences of his actions. To reward or punish him by artificial means is irrational. Such being man, to ensure the happiness of the human race permanently, all that is required is that society shall create proper conditions for the purpose of forming free birth a good, useful, and superior character for all, according to their natural qualities and organisations. To bring about these desirable ends, it is necessary first of all to abate the irrational conditions of society, "all public and religious governments, men-made laws, artificial marriages, modes of producing and distributing wealth, of buying cheap and selling dear, and all other past and existing institutions," and to enter upon a new life, surrounded by new conditions, in which spirit of universal charity and love will govern the population of the earth, as one enlightened and affectionate family, upon a system of perfect equality, according to age, of education and condition [condensed from "socialism," by Robert Owen, in Religions of World]. Distinctions of rank and possession of wealth by an individual would thus come to an end in the Socialist system. Owen tried to propagate Socialism, or, as he called "The Rational System of Society," by establishing co-operative workshops for the various industries in this country and in America, labour being regarded as a high duty for all: His followers were, as we have seen, practising Atheists, and they permitted as much freedom in the relations of the sexes as the laws of the country would not actually punish.

Communism is Socialism put into practice on its political side. The necessity for so strong, central, despotic power, capable of keeping order, is recognised, primogeniture necessarily abolished, and all property and the earnings of industry are thrown into common fund, from which distribution is made to each person according to merit. We have an example of Socialism carried on into Communism in the Commune of Paris after the Franco-German War in 1871. French Socialism or Communism was founded by comte St. Simon [1760–1825], a contemporary of Robert Owen, from whom the latter profited. Borrowed ideas to a large extent. St. Simon regarded labour as the one sacred duty, life, the best labourer as the most religious man, the highest in rank in the social scale. He a ised a system of worship, if so it can be ed, in which social happiness and joy were put before the mind by means of poetry, art, painting, etc. Like Owen, he resolved into Nature, and defined Him as “all putting its practical Atheism aside, there is in of truth in Socialism. It is the clear its upon those who possess it, but it also lies duties to be fulfilled by them. Each in some way his brother’s keeper. But the truths are after all but the constant thing of Christianity. Christianity is the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.—This is the oldest missionary society, founded in 1701. Offices at 19, Delahay Street, Westminster. The objects of this Society are:—[1] to receive, manage, and dispose of funds contributed for the religious instruction of our fellow-countrymen beyond the seas; [2] to provide a sufficient maintenance for an orthodox clergy to live among them; [3] to make other provision for the propagation of the Gospel in those parts.

Sufficient account of this Society has already been given. [Bible Societies; Missions;

PROPAGATION OF THE GOSPEL, SOCIETY FOR.] In connection with the missions of this Society is the Ladies’ Association for the Promotion of Female Education in India and other heathen Countries. The objects of this Association are to provide female teachers for the instruction of native women and children in the missions of the Society, to provide suitable clothing for the female mission schools, and a maintenance for boarders. Funds for this are raised in England by branch associations

throughout the country. The first teacher was sent to Madagascar in 1867, and in 1868

two ladies joined the Delhi Zenana Mission, and one went to Burmah. In 1869 the work was extended to South Africa. Many Zenana missions have since been formed in India, and at present there are about 2,000 pupils under instruction in their schools, besides about 1,250 in other schools connected with the Ladies' Association.

The Colonial and Continental Church Society was established in 1835, for the purpose of sending clergymen, catechists, and schoolmasters, to the colonies of Great Britain, and to minister to British residents elsewhere. It was united in 1851 to the Newfoundland School Society, which had been formed in 1823. Its labours are carried on in thirty colonial dioceses of North America, India, Australia, and other parts of the world. Its income is £40,152. Office: 9, Serjeant's Inn, E.C.

The Universities Missions.—A very successful mission is carried on in Central Africa by the Universities.

Oxford founded a Mission to Calcutta in 1880, on the principle of a community bound by no vows, but living together as a brotherhood, to work among the educated natives of Calcutta.

Cambridge in 1876 commenced a mission to Delhi, with the direct object of carrying on Evangelistic work.

Haileybury in 1873 started a fund for a mission in India, and supports the Haileybury Lecturer at St. John's College, Agra.

Turkish Mission Aid Society.—Founded in 1854, for evangelistic work in the East. Unsectarian. Office: 7, Adam Street, Adelphi, Strand.

Corporation of the Sons of the Clergy.—Founded in 1678. During the time of the Great Rebellion—in the year 1650 or thereabouts—a body of gentlemen, sons of clergy, associated themselves together for the relief of the numerous distressed ministers, who had been ejected from their preferments, and, with their families, were in sad straits. In the year 1655 the first festival was held at St. Paul's Cathedral, when the Rev. George Hall, afterwards Bishop of Chester, preached on behalf of the charity. The annual festival and sermon have continued from that day to this to be its most characteristic and profitable feature. The society received a Royal charter of incorporation in the year 1678, "His Majesty King Charles II. being moved thereto by the numerous cases of distress which existed among the clergy, their widows and children, the result of loyalty and fidelity during the trying periods of the Rebellion and Commonwealth." Its present objects are:—[1] To afford continuous or occasional assistance to clergy men of the Church of England when incapable of duty from mental or bodily infirmity, or burdened with large families, or in unavoidable necessity. [2] To grant pensions to widows of clergymen and their unmarried daughters. [3] To grant donations to clergy widows in temporary difficulty, and [4] to apprentice clergy-

The English Church Union was formed in the year 1860 for the purpose of uniting clergy and laity in defence of the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, and of the rights and liberties of her faithful children. The maintenance of such an organised body to undertake, under God, this work of defence, has been rendered necessary, in the opinion of its promoters, by the circumstances of the times: "by the laxity of professing Churchmen; by the desire for sweeping changes in the Prayer Book, and in the old-established order of the Church, as evidenced by the passing of the Public Worship Regulation Acts; and the introduction of the Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister Bill; by the attacks on Eucharistic Doctrine, the Athanasian Creed, and the use of Confession; and by the attempts to alter the standard of ritual laid down in the Ornaments Rubric, and meanwhile to "put down" by penal proceedings, deprivation, imprisonment, confiscation of property, and even by mob violence those who conform to that rubric; and lastly, by the tendency among statesmen to apply the test of expediency or popularity to the rights and claims of the Church, and to the most sacred subjects of religious truth."

Socinus, Faustus, the founder of the Socinians, was born of one of the most noble families of Sienna in 1539. He received very little education, but followed the profession of his family, who were lawyers. In 1559 he went to Lyons, where he remained till the death of his uncle, Laelius Socinus, in 1562. Laelius Socinus (b. 1523) left Italy on the breaking up, in 1557, of a club which had met at Vincenza to discuss the doctrine of the Holy Trinity. He had formed a sect at Cracow, and finally settled at Zurich, where he died. He left many manuscripts containing an account of his views, which his nephew studied for three years. He returned to Italy in 1565 and lived in the court of the Duke of Florence till 1574, when he went to Basle. Meanwhile the Anti-trinitarians at Cracow greatly increased in numbers, but in 1579 a division took place, some (the Farnovians becoming almost Arians, others (the Beneficiaries) holding the opinion that Christ was merely a man, whence they belonged to the Pansynthists (Gr. psilos, "merely," a anthropos, "a man") while others kept to the medium course. In 1579 Socinus was called upon to reconcile the parties, which at first with some difficulty he managed to do; they became one community, and received the name of Socinians. Socinus wished to admitted into the Unitarian Society at Cracow, but was refused, his views not being quite identical with theirs. His opinion was accepted at the Synod of Racow in 1633, he immediately began to draw up a confess of faith, called the Racovian Confession, and his uncle's papers, but died in 1604, before it was completed. The confession was published in 1605 in Polish, in German in 1608, and in Latin in 1609. The sect continued to flourish under Jacobus a Sienno, the founder of the Racow Academy, Schmalz, Vökel, Ostrog, Moscorovius, and others, till 1638, when some of the Racovian students broke across the highway, and in consequence a decree was made at Warsaw ordering the church and college to be closed, the press to be stopped, and the professors exiled. This decree was followed by several others, till 1658 they were forbidden, under pain of death, publicly to solemnise their worship, profess their sentiments. If they had ined the Catholic, Lutheran, or Calvinistic communion within two years they were to be tried. The day fixed for their departure was Aug. 10th, 1660, when the law was carried out with the utmost severity, and the Socinians disappeared from Poland. Socinian exiles were taught in Germany by Ernest Roter (d. 1612), and some of the Polish exiles met and settled here, but the heresy soon died out. It took a firm hold in Transylvania, rough Blandina, one of the chief advocates of the Anti-trinitarian doctrines. It did not prosper in England, the only purely Socinian congregation being formed by John Biddle in aneaster during the Commonwealth. He was in prison for heresy in 1662, and was succeeded by Thomas Firmin, but the congregation soon disappeared.

The doctrines of the Socinians are to be found in the Racovian Catechism and in the writings of Socinus and other great leaders of the society. The chief are:—that Christ did not exist before His birth; that He and the holy Ghost are not God; that Christ's death was for Himself, not for His sins, but for the mortality and infirmities of our nature, which He had assumed; that God could justly condemn our sins without satisfaction; that Christ did not become our High Priest, nor mortal till He had ascended; that the soul man becomes insensible at death and will be raised again with the body at the general resurrection; and that the good will be established in eternal felicity, while the wicked will be consigned only to a limited punishment.

Socrates was born at Athens in 469 B.C. He was the son of a sculptor, and followed his profession of his father till he was nearly sixty years old, when he gave it up for that of a philosopher. He came to Athens about the time of the commencement of the Peloponnesian war. His career differed considerably from that of his contemporaries, inasmuch as he instituted no school, resented the title of teacher, and therefore had no followers the accepted sense of the word. His plan was to walk about the streets of Athens, talking with his fellow-citizens on all sorts of subjects, leading them to express their views, and then proceeding to show them where their argument was faulty; for he believed only that he was designed by the gods to fulfil a religious mission, and that a divine teacher, διδασκαλικός [divinity] was with him at all times, and was his teacher. Such was his conviction. At the same conviction led him to believe that his fellow citizens had all their inward teachers, and therefore he questioned his companions in order to be instructed. Accordingly, he was no literary thinker, but loved to draw a circle round him. And the young men of Athens were to be drawn; for he was a humourist: he was genial, brave, patriotic. One young man was whom Socrates regarded with intense affection, Alcibiades. He was skilful, handsome, fascinating in manner—all the qualities of the brilliant Greek were exhibited in him in their perfection. Had he also but learned that there is a right and a wrong, the whole history of Athens might have been different. Socrates would fain have taught him. But whilst he joyously listened to the bright teaching of the philosopher, he did not train himself to walk in the light which he found; he became selfish and wilful, and turned his best gifts into means of mischief.

The Socratic dialogue consisted of cleverly contrived questions of the philosopher, intended to draw out his companion, to lead him to think to reconsider his subject, to view it on all sides. His aim was to draw out the faculties; not to make them the supreme arbiter, but to bow them before a divine power. It was the very object of his life to do this, and it cost him his life. For he made virtue the foundation of all teaching and the aim of all intellectual exercise, and virtue was the pursuit of good and the rejection of evil. The Athenians would have cared nothing for his word-splittings; they were the most tolerant people in the world of abstract opinions. But he declared that he was not a promulger of opinions; that they were bound to know and to distinguish truth, that it was no matter of indifference. He was upon this accused of not worshipping the gods which the city worshipped, and of introducing divinities of his own. Alcibiades, too, who had proved a traitor to the State, was known to have been a learner from Socrates, and upon this fact was founded the charge that he was a corruptor of the youth of the State. He was brought before the judges of Athens, and his trial was the most momentous which up to that time the world had ever seen. By a majority of six, 282 against 276, he was pronounced guilty. There was a chance of escape for him. The penalty was death, but the smallness of the majority would probably have induced the judges to inflict some lighter punishment. He was asked to speak for himself, and he boldly answered as follows: "And what shall I propose on my part, O men of Athens? Clearly that which is my due. And what is that which I ought to pay or to receive? What shall be done to the man who has never had the wit to be idle during his whole life; but has been careless of what the many care about—wealth, and family interests, and military offices, and speaking in the assembly, and magistracies, and plots, and parties? Reflecting that I was really too honest a man to follow in this way and live, I did not go where I could do no good to you or to myself; but where I could do the greatest good, privately, to every one of you. Thither I went, and sought to persuade every man among you that he must look to himself, and seek virtue and wisdom before he looks to his private interests, and not think of the triumph of Athens before he thinks of Athens herself; and that this should be the order in which he observes in all his actions. What shall be done to such a one? Doubtless some good thing, O men of Athens, if he has his reward; and the good should be of a kind suitable to him. What would be a reward suitable to a poor man who is your benefactor who desires leisure that he may instruct you? There can be no more fitting reward than maintenance at the expense of the State in the Prytaneum."

This bold answer was received by the judges as a direct insult, a fresh proof of audacity, and they condemned him. Plato has told the story of his death with immortal power. Thirty days ensued before execution. Then the solemn evening came. The fatal draught of poison was brought, and amid the frantic lamentations of his friends and disciples he drained it to the dregs with his habitual ease and cheerfulness. He spoke to the last of his opinions of immortality, and of what he hoped to do in the world to come. Thus died the greatest of heathen philosophers, the greatest of heathen martyrs. "It is instructive to observe," writes Dean Stanley, "that here, almost alone, outside of the Jewish race, is to be found the career which, at however remote a distance, suggests whether to friends or enemies, a solid illustration of the One Life, which is the turning-point of the religion of the whole world. We do not forget the marvellous purity of the life of Buddha; nor the singular likenesses and contrasts between the rise of Islam and the rise of Christianity. But there are points of comparison where these fail, and where the story of Socrates is full of suggestions. When we contemplate the contented poverty, the self-devotion, the constant publicity, the miscellaneous followers of Socrates, we feel that we can understand better than before the outward aspect, at least, of that Sacred Presence which moved on the busy shores of the Sea of Galilee, and in the streets and courts of Jerusalem. When we read of the dogged obstinacy of the court by which he was judged—the religious or superstition prejudices invoked against him—the expression of his friend when all was finished—'Such was the end of the wisest and justest and best of all the men I have ever known'—another Trial and another Parting inevitably rush to the memory. When we read of the last conversation of the prisoner in the Athenian dungeon, our thoughts almost insensibly rise to the farewell dis- courses in the upper chamber at Jerusalem with gratitude and reverential awe. The differences are immense. But there is a likeness of moral atmosphere, even of external incident, that cannot fail to strike the attention. Or (to turn to another side), when we are perplexed by the difficulty of reconciling the narrative of the first three Evangelists with the altered tone of the fourth, it is at least a step towards the solution of that difficulty, to remember that there is a parallel diversity between the Socrates of Xenophon and the Socrates of Plato. No one has been tempted by that diversity to doubt the substantial identity, the true character, unless the historical existence, of the man whom they both profess to describe. The divergences of Plato from Xenophon are contestable; the introduction of his or colouring and thought undeniable; and yet the less is his representation indispensable as the complete idea which mankind now receive as the picture of Socrates. Nor, when we think of the total silence of Josephus, or other contemporary writers, respecting events which we now regard as greatest the history of mankind, is it altogether irrelevant to reflect that for the whole this years comprised in the most serious of ancient histories, Socrates was not only living but acting a more public part, and, for all future ages of Greece, an incomparably important part, than any other Athenian citizen; and yet that so able and so thoughtful an observer as Thucydides has never noticed him, directly or indirectly. There no stronger proof of the weakness of argument from omission, especially in case of ancient history, which, unlike own, contained within its range of vision more than was immediately before it for moment."

Socrates, an ecclesiastical historian, born at Constantinople about 380. He studied the law, and pleaded at the bar, who he obtained the name of Scholasticius or advocate. His history dates from 399, when Eusebius ended, down to 445, and is writ with great simplicity and comparative ac-

Under the bishop, the see is governed by an deacon and a vicar-general. The income of the deece is £2,000 per annum. According to ancient custom an annual convocation of the Manx Church is held on the cathedral and whether it should be at

in the matter. Peel contains the ruins of two cathedrals—those of St. Patrick and German—both on a small island in the bour; churches were erected in those situations in olden times for safety, as at Holy land and Iona. The whole of the ancient Somascha, The Regular Clerks of, an order formed at the beginning of the sixteenth century by St. Jerome Emiliani, a Venetian, born in 1481. He was of noble birth, and had served in the campaigns against Charles VIII. and Louis XII., but was taken prisoner while defending the town of Castelnuovo, and on his deliverance devoted himself to the service of God. He first took charge of some orphan nephews, but in 1528 founded an orphan asylum at Venice, and afterwards others at Milan, Bergamo, Pavia, and other towns. The central point from which all the institutions were managed was fixed at Somascha, between Milan and Bergamo. It was first worked by laymen, but Emiliani was afterwards joined by some priests, and they were gradually formed into an order. The founder died in 1533, was beatified by Benedict XIV., and canonised by Clement

XIII. The order was confirmed in 1568 under the rule of St. Augustine, and received the name of Regular Clerks of St. Mayeu, or of Somascha. It was for a time united with the Theatines, and in the seventeenth century with Fathers of the Christian Doctrine. It extended rapidly, and has the charge of several orphanages and colleges.
The principal house is at Rome.

Sonnites or Sunnis are a sect of Mahammadans who are strongly opposed in every way to the Shiites [q.v.]. They are very numerous, the Shiites being confined for the most part to Persia. The Sonnites are sometimes called Traditionists, on account of their looking upon the sonnah or traditions as of equal authority with the Koran. They recognise the rights of all four Caliphs who immediately succeeded Mahomet, and this is one of the great points of difference between them and the Shiites, who reject all but Ali, the fourth. They are subdivided into four parts, but the difference consists chiefly in ceremonials and ritual—all uniting in fundamental doctrine and in hatred of the Shiites.

Sorbonne, a celebrated college founded at Paris in 1252 by Robert Sorbon, chaplain to Louis IX., within the University of Paris.
It was originally intended for sixteen poor theological students, four of whom were to be French, four Norman, four Picard, and four English. The congregation was confirmed by Clement IV. in 1268. A teacher of theology was appointed, the college became formed, most of the Paris doctors of theology were trained there, and when the lectures of the faculty began to be held there,
the college and the faculty became identified.
During the first three centuries after its foundation it threw wonderfully, and is noted for having established the printing-press in Paris in 1470. In every doctrinal, liturgical, or ecclesiastical controversy which arose in the Gallican Church the Sorbonne has taken the most prominent place. Its acts are among the most characteristic passages of medieval Church History, all manner of subjects being discussed by the sharpest wits, sometimes numbering as many as sixty. Its fall began when it became the property of the Guises; and, though Richelieu attempted to re-construct it, it gradually decreased in importance till the Revolution, when it was destroyed along with the other ecclesiastical establishments. In 1808 a faculty of Catholic theology was re-established at the Sorbonne, but owing to the influence of the Government in appointing the professors, it is regarded with much distrust, and holds a position very different to that of former days.

Soteriology. — From Greek, soteria, "salvation," and logos, "knowledge." The science or doctrine of the salvation of man, and the means by which God accomplishes it. See Justification, Work of Christ, etc.

Soul. — This word is used as the English version of the Hebrew word nephesh, and the Greek psyche, and signifies primarily "animal life." But it is used more widely to express the whole region of mind as contrasted with visible substance. The deep conviction of mankind that there is in man a nature which differentiates him from the brutes, led to a belief in a threefold nature, and this view finds confirmation in Scripture, which speaks of the body (σώμα) or flesh (σάρξ), the soul or life (ψυχή), and the spirit (πνεῦμα) (1 Thess. v. 23). Speculations as to the origin of the soul, its essence and seat, were float from the earliest times, and are by no means at an end in our own day, but form one of the questions of some biologists. The Epicureans thought that the soul was a subtle air, composed of primitive atoms; the Stoics, that it was a flame, a portion of heavenly light; while the Cartesians made thinking the essence of the soul. The Ego was the living personality which the body covered, but was independent of it. Both Pythagoras and Plato held the brain to be the central dwelling-place of the soul. The Materialist carries that view to the length of attributing all consciousness and thought to the vibrations of the brain-fibre — and holds the soul to be, in fact, a product or property of the bodily organisation, and in no sense independent of it. Consequently, as the body is not immortal, so neither can the soul be. [This subject has been discussed in the article on Materialism.] Such a view is contradicted by the innermost consciousness of us all. Non omnis moriar, said the heathen poet, "Not all of me will die." Even now I am not bound to this body, for there is within me a principle which can travel into far-off scenes, while I remain at home. I can think scenes of my childhood which I may not see again. Therefore, there is nothing probable in the belief that, whilst chemists' agencies dissolve the body, they have no power over the Ego, over my innermost self. The doctrine of Transmigration [q.v.] was plainly one form of assertion of the responsibility of the individual soul, and so far seems to be a step above the theory of absorption which found favour with many rationalising philosophers—the theory that souls are swallowed up in the great ocean of a Divine Life. So a theory is a denial of moral responsibility, destroying the faith in a conscious continuity of intellectual life and affection. It is of the many evidences of the obscurity in Spinoza's philosophy on some points, that he has been claimed, both by those who prize the immortality of the soul, and by those who deny it, as being, respectively, on this side. Dr. Martineau, who has not a half idea of Spinoza, believes that he had no conviction of such immortality.

As we review the arguments adding favour of this all-important doctrine of Christian faith, the vast capacities of thinking part of man, the universal consent of all nations, the conscience of sin and conviction of God's justice, we still hold beyond them all, mighty as they are, is fact of the Resurrection of Christ and evidence thereof. Death could not hold Him, and when He came forth from the grave was not only as the image of the Invisible God, but as "the first-born of every creature."

South, Robert, the son of a London merchant, was born at Hackney in 1634; died at Islip, 1716. He was educated at Westminster School under Dr. Busby; in 1651 went to Christ Church, Oxford; was ordained in 1658, and in 1660 became University Orator. He was appointed dome chaplain to the Lord Chancellor Clareon account of a speech which he had delivered on Clarendon being installed in office at Oxford. In 1663 he took his D. degree, and became a Professor of Divinity, and in 1670 a Canon of Ch. Church. In 1677, Laurence Hyde, son the Lord Chancellor, and afterwards Bishop of Rochester, was sent as ambassador to Poland; and South, who had been tutor, accompanied him. On his return England he became Rector of Islip, in Oxfordshire, and Chaplain-in-Ordinary to King. He refused all further preference being strongly opposed to James II.'s attempts to restore Roman Catholicism. He ever, he believed in the duty of submission the rightful Sovereign, and it was with difficulty he was persuaded to swear allegiance to William and Mary; and he utterly refused to take the Sacrament of either of those which were ejected for refusing to take the oath.
Southwell, Joannah.—A fanatical woman, born in Devonshire about the middle of the 15th century, who gave herself out as the Daughter of the Lamb, and announced, when she was over sixty years old, that she was about to give birth to the Messiah. She published a collection of her "prophecies" in shilling ents; they consist of wild rhodomontade, interspersed with doggrel verse, and form two go 8vo volumes. It speaks very badly of the state of intelligence and education, at the time of her death she had hundreds of followers, and after her death [Dec., 1514] many of them continued to observe the ceremonies she had prescribed, so till a very few years since there were congregations who still called themselves her name.

Southwell, Bishopric of.—This See was constituted in 1884, its first bishop being Dr. George Ridding. It is taken from the dioceses of Lincoln and Lichfield, and comprises the whole counties of Nottingham and Derby, including 471 parishes besides eparchies, with an area of 1,182,419 acres, and a population of 699,152. The endowment of the See is £3,000 a year. There are 6 archdeaconries, but as yet no cathedral. The Church of St. Mary the Virgin, Southwell Minster, is in every way worthy of being advanced to the rank of a cathedral. Another of the newly-constituted cathedrals in the last half century can approach it in unity of design and beauty of architecture, the massive Norman nave and western central towers, Early English choir, and elaborated chapter-house. Southwell Minster, though never formally recognised as a cathedral, was regarded by the Archbishops of the Northern Province, until the secession of the county of Nottingham from the province of York in 1839, almost as secondary cathedral for that remote part of its wide-stretching spiritual domain. Possibly the site of a Romano-British church: most probably, according to early and content tradition accepted by some of our most useful historians, one of the centres of Paul's missionary labours, c. 630, after the version of the men of Lindsey, and the election of the first Christian church in the man city of "Lindum Colonia," the modern Lincoln; rebuilt and endowed by the ubiquitous Wilfrid, in the fifth last years of his, 705-9; augmented by Edwy's grant of royal demesnes in the soke of Southwell, Archbishop Oskytel in 958, and re-founded re-modelled (according to the statement of Henry VIII.'s Commissioners) by Edwy's brother Edgar, after the middle of the tenth century, when the first three prebends were probably founded, and the church, endowed with the great tithes of the soke, became collegiate; furnished with large and sonorous bells by Archbishop Kinsky [1051-60], at the same time that he bestowed like gifts on the minsters of Beverley and Stow; constituted by Kinsky's successor Ealdred [1061-69] a college of secular canons, for whose use, according to the reformed rule of Chorle-gang, he erected a common refectory, as he had done at York; established as the Mother Church of the county of Nottingham by Archbishop Thomas II., freed by him from all episcopal customs and dues, placed on the same standing as St. Peter's at York, St. John's at Beverley, and St. Wilfrid's at Ripon, and enriched with royal privileges and immunities; the seat of a yearly synod for the county, at which the consecrated chrism, brought solemnly from York, was distributed to the rural deans, to be by them dispensed to the parish priests; at Whitsuntide the object of yearly processions by the clergy and laity of the whole county of Notts, released from the ancient duty of repairing to York to pay their Pentecostals, to which came the mayor and corporation of Nottingham with the justices of the peace, on horseback, in their most magnificent array, to lay down their Whitsuntide under the wide Norman archway of the great north porch, where the treasurer of the Chapter stood to receive them—a time-honoured custom, only abolished little more than a century ago by Archbishop Drummond, " proprio motu," as a meaningless survival from the past—it is evident that Southwell Minster has always occupied a place of peculiar dignity and importance in the organisation of the vast diocese of York. In later times it more than once narrowly escaped destruction. In 1540 it surrendered its possessions to Henry VIII., and was re-founded by him in 1543; in 1547 it was seized by the Crown, but re-founded by Queen Mary in 1558; in 1604 still further established by James I., to be once more suppressed in our own days, and by a melancholy but just Nemesis on luxury and inefficiency under the guise of religion, reduced to the level of an ordinary parish church, it is now happily raised to more than its pristine dignity as the cathedral of the newly-formed diocese. It must be confessed that the history of the collegiate church is not an edifying one before its final extinction on the death of the last prebendary in 1873. The number of prebendaries was sixteen. It was an acephalous body without a dean, or even any permanent president, such as the precentor was at St. David's, and the archdeacon at Llandaff, both of whose chapters were dean-less. Few professedly religious foundations could show smaller grounds for exemption from the axe.
of our ecclesiastical reformers. Of the sixteen prebendaries, each came into residence for three months once in four years, his only duties being to attend the daily choral services—and even these it was at one time in the last century seriously proposed to suppress—to preach statutory sermons, and to "exercise hospitality." That is to say, to quote the Bishop of Lincoln: "In a church having sixteen canons, only one was resident at a time for a quarter of a year in four years, and the other fifteen were non-resident for three years and three quarters."

Southwell, Robert, a Roman Catholic poet, was one of the least known writers of Queen Elizabeth's age. His thoughts are often very beautiful, although not powerful. He was born in 1560, in Norfolk, and was educated at the English College at Douay. In 1581 he returned as a Jesuit missionary to England, where the Countess of Arundel made him her chaplain. His most admirable poems are The Triumphs over Death, St. Peter's Complaint, The Epistle of Comfort. In July, 1592, Southwell was apprehended on a charge of sedition, and imprisoned for three years, during which time he affirms that he underwent the torture ten times. Some few books were allowed him, and he chose the Bible and the works of St. Bernard. After three years he wrote to Lord Cecil, begging for a day to be appointed for his trial, to which Cecil is said to have replied, "That if he were in haste to be hanged he should have his desire." On Feb. 20th Southwell was removed from Newgate and taken to Westminster, where he was tried and condemned. On the following day, Feb 21st, 1595, he was hanged at Tyburn.

Sozomen, Hermias, a Church historian, called Scholasticus, was born about the end of the fourth century at Salamin, in the island of Cyprus, and for a long time pleaded at the bar of Constantinople. He compiled an Ecclesiastical History in nine books, from the third consuls of Crispus and young Constantine to the seventeenth consuls of Theodosius the Younger, that is, from 323-439. This book is still extant, except the part which describes the events of the last twenty years. He seems to have known and made use of Socrates' history. His book is useful as giving a good idea of discipline of the Church. He died some time after 443, probably towards 450.

Spanheim, Friedrich, was born at Amberg, in the Upper Palatinate, January 1600. After having studied in the College of Amberg, he went to Heidelberg, and in 1620 to Geneva to study divinity. His father's circumstances becoming somewhat straitened by the Palatinate disturbances, he lived for three years as a tutor. In 1625 he travelled in England and France, and finally settled down at Geneva as professor of philosophy. He was ordained, and in 1631 became divinity professor. He showed such learning and understanding that he was sought after several universities, and in 1642 moved to Leyden, where he remained till his death 1648. He wrote many works, among which are Dubia Evangelica, Chamierus Contractus, Ejercitationes de Gratia Universali, Epistola Mattheum Cotterium de Conciliacione Grae Universalis, Epistola ad Euchananum de Controversis Anglicanis, and L'indicia exercentum.

Spanheim, Friedrich, son of the preceding [b. 1632, d. 1701], was professor of theology at Heidelberg and Leyden, and one of the champions of Calvin against Descart and Cocceius.

Spanish Reformed Church.—The religious body took its origin in Mexico. The Spanish yoke was thrown off and Mexico proclaimed a republic in 1824. In 1861 came the ill-conceived attempt of Napoleon III. to subject the country to French domination, and the Archduke Maximilian of Austria was proclaimed Emperor, to the satisfaction of the Roman priesthood of the country. But this nation resented the interference, rejected the Empire, and put Maximilian to death in 1867. This was followed by a declaration of toleration, which had been refused during Spanish rule. Up to this time the country had been in the very depths of superstition and ignorance; but now the Bible began to be introduced. In 1866 Miss Rankin started a systematised Protestant Mission, which gradually made way. Not only so, but a reformation movement was begun within the Roman Church itself; a priest named Aquaelar opened a hall for preaching which he named "Church of Jesus." On his death his congregation besought assistance from the Episcopal Church of America; it was given, and Dr. H. C. Riley was consecrated Bishop of the Mexican Reformed Church, a remarkable grand sermon being preached on the occasion by the Bishop of Western New York, affirming the distinctive principles of Episcopacy distinguished from Romanism. Since these two other bishops have been consecrated, 1871 a Dominican friar was chosen for eloquence to oppose Bishop Riley, and him became one of his proelytes.

Meanwhile a corresponding movement was going on in Spain. In 1881 an appeal from the Bishop of Meath, Lord Plunkett [afterwards Archbishop of Dublin], was sent forth calling attention to this movement, and asking for "the sympathy of Protestant Europe." This appeal was contained in a magazine entitled Light and Truth, which still continues as the organ for the communication of information respecting this Reform movement. The first number contains a letter from the Rev. J. B. Cabrera, Bishop-Elect of Madrid, who states that he has a congregation of 456 and a school of 100 children. This congregation was visited by Bishop Riley in February, 1880, on who asian Reformed congregations from Seville and Malaga attended with that of Madrid, and the Spanish Reformed Church was solemnly instituted. In Portugal also Reformed congregations were established, whom Bishop Ley also visited. Several of these were ministered to by men who had been Roman Catholic priests. In the course of the year the Liturgy was drawn up, partly from that of the Church of England, partly from the old Saracenic Liturgy. The last report gives 13 bishops-elect and the following: eight of whom are ex-Roman priests, others have received American orders, and they have besought the English Church to consecrate their bishops-elect; but a difficulty was felt by the English Bishops on the ground that the Roman Bishops, though held to be in grievous error, are yet in possession of the English Church, following the universal precedent from the beginning, has used to be a party to what many ecclesiastical authorities hold to be a schism. Those who argue thus, whilst they look hopefully on, Reform movement, are desirous that the form shall be carried on from within, vertheless, there are others who strenuously declare that the Reformed Episcopal churches ought to stand aloof no longer, but the gap and consecrate the bishops. The following passage from a recent address by Bishop Plunket puts the case very early:

"A remarkable movement in the direction Church Reform has taken place during the last years in Spain and Portugal. Fifty or sixty years ago there were not a score of active Protestants in these countries. There were some ten thousand. The faithfulness I observe with which these brave-hearted men, in the face of tremendous odds, have stood their way out of error into light and truth, is beyond all praise, and towards all, I have so done, even though they follow us, we should be ready to extend a hand. But among these Reformers are some with whom English and Irish bishops should especially sympathise. Of those who, after the example of their forefathers, have organised themselves on an Episcopal basis, and have adopted a Liturgy, purged, as our own, from man error, but wisely shaped, as in our case, upon the model of an ancient liturgical ritual. The number of these Reformers is not as yet large. About two thousand in Spain, and about one thousand in Portugal, may be counted as belonging to their ranks. But the congregations into which they are gathered occupy important centres in these two countries. In Spain they are to be found in Madrid, Seville, Malaga, Salamanca, Lleida, and in the neighbourhood of Barcelona. In Portugal we meet them in Lisbon, Porto, de Moura, and Oporto. Moreover, though widely separated from one another, these scattered flocks are bound together even already by a sense of corporate unity, which adds not a little to their power for good. Each congregation has its vestry, and both in Spain and Portugal there is a central Synod attended by delegates from these vestries, where in each case the foundation of a Reformed Episcopal Church has been solemnly and prayerfully laid. In Spain the Synod has chosen a Bishop-Elect. In Portugal it is purpose to do likewise when the right opportunity presents itself. So far, therefore, as an outward organisation goes, the elements of cohesion and continuity are duly provided. But there are, thank God, closer and more sacred bonds than these. Speaking as one who has twice visited the Peninsula for the special purpose of testing the reality of this movement, I can certify without reserve to the fact that these Reformers are becoming daily more and more, and one to another by love and devotion to a common Master—the great Shepherd and Bishop of their souls—and by a profound conviction that they have a work of evangelisation to do for Him in their native land! Such are some of the hopeful features of this movement. Did time permit, I could point to many more. I could show from its history that it is a movement from within, and that, though foreign agencies, especially in the way of Bible circulation, have done much to help the work, their function has been not so much to create a desire for reform as to meet an already existing want. I could also show that this want is not due to merely political aspirations, or to any ephemeral burst of enthusiasm, but that it is in very truth a craving for somewhat more satisfying in the way of spiritual food than Rome can supply. But I must pass from the hopes of the movement to its needs—for it is because of these needs that I have felt constrained to take up my pen. These Reformers, like the early Christians, are few, and poor, and weak. None of the wealthy or the mighty ones of this earth have, up to this, joined their little band, and hence they find it impossible as yet to stand alone. They do not ask us to undertake the work of Reform in their land. They are already engaged in that work, and all they ask of us is to help them in accomplishing it themselves. Nor do they ask us to help them thus for ever. Ere long they hope to be self-supporting. But just at present, though, as I can vouch, they are contributing according to their ability, they find it hopeless, without aid, to meet their own spiritual needs. And for this aid they have appealed to us. We have not gone out of our path to look for this duty. We have found the wounded traveller on the very highway by which we have been journeying. Can we, with a clear conscience, pass him by on the other side? The next few years will be to these Reformers a season of terrible suspense. In adopting for their churches an Episcopal constitution, they staked all upon the prospect of finding some Sister-Church in Christendom willing to consecrate the Bishops-Elect of their choice. Had they been satisfied with a Presbyterian form of government they would have run no such risk. But they chose rather to follow the example of our own Reformers, trusting that we—who must approve of their resolve—would not deny them the means of carrying it into practice. They have accordingly asked for this privilege at the hands of the Irish Bishops, and a final decision will be come to by that body after an opportunity for consultation with their brethren of the Anglican Communion at large has been given them at the Conference which it is expected will be held at Lambeth about three years hence. I earnestly trust that the bishops of my church will see their way to grant the request of our brethren in Spain and Portugal who have so far trusted us.

Sparrow, Anthony, D.D., Bishop of Norwich [b. at Depden, Suffolk], was educated at Queen’s College, Cambridge, of which he was fellow, till ejected in 1643 for refusing the Covenant. At the Restoration he was appointed one of the preachers at St. Edmundsbury; thence he was promoted to the Arch-deaconry of Sudbury, and to the mastership of his college. In 1667 he was consecrated Bishop of Exeter; and on the death of Bishop Reynolds [1670] he was translated to the See of Norwich, where he died in 1685. He wrote Rationale of the Book of Common Prayer, a Collection of Articles, Injunctions, Canons, Ordinances, Orders, etc., and several sermons.

Spener, Philipp Jakob.—Founder of the Pietists [q.v.] in Germany [b. at Rappoltstein in 1635; d. at Berlin, 1705]. His father was Counsellor to the Count of Rappoltstein, and the Countess, who was godmother to Philipp Jakob Spener, took a great interest in him, and had him educated by the Court Chaplain, Joachim Stoll. At the age of fifteen he went to Colmar, and a year later to Strasburg University; here he pursued his theological studies under Sebastian and Johann Schmidt and Dannhauer, all of whom were zealous Lutherans. Here also he studied Hebrew and Arabic. In 1659 he went to Basle, where he took lessons in Hebrew from Buxtorf; he also visited the universities of Tübingen, Freiburg, and Württemburg. In 1662 he was chosen public preacher at Strasburg, and also gave lectures at the University on history and philosophy. In 1664 he took his D.D., and the Senate of Frankfort-on-the-Maine invited him to become chief preacher of that city. His early training had given him strong religious impressions, and his preaching was characterised by great earnestness and sincerity, and his life by its singular purity; but his zeal against the Calvinists, who were an influential body in Frankfort, made him many enemies. However he ceased to contend with them, and turned mind to the great object of his life, which was to enforce purity of doctrine and to make his hearers acquainted with the contents of the whole Scriptures, instead of only just portions appointed to be read during church service. To encourage the study of the Bible he in 1670 instituted his Collegia Pietä where he explained passages of the New Testament, and invited discussion and further inquiry from his hearers of both sexes. Thus unintentionally founded the sect Pietists. In 1675 he published his Pia Doctrinia, urging the need of a general reform of the mode of preaching and teaching Christ doctrines. In 1686, at the request of Elector of Saxony, he accepted the post of Court Preacher at Dresden, and he soon came involved in a religious dispute with theological teachers of Leipzig (Carps Alberti, etc.). Spener had founded in Leipzig Collegium Philobiblicum for studying the Bible in its original languages, and this looked on as a censure on the University its neglect of exegetical teaching. Jocelyn moreover, at Spener’s having been appointed to one of the most coveted Church prebends had much to do with causing opposition to his views, and his enemies success in prejudicing the Elector against him in getting his religious meetings forbidden. He was at Leipzig that the nickname of Piet was given to Spener’s followers.] Spener therefore, removed to Berlin in 1690, and again he commenced his catechetical instructions, and enjoyed universal respect. His heretics at Leipzig (Francke, Anton, & Breithaupt) were in 1692 made Professors of Theology at the new University of Halle, which henceforth became the home of Pietism. The theologians of Wittenberg next attacked Spener, accusing him of founding various fanatical sects, and of holding no less than 283 heretical opinions. To them Spener replied in 1695 by his True Agreement with the Confession of Augsburg. Soon after this was mixed up in a very serious dispute concerning the necessity of confession before receiving the Sacrament, and Spener gave his opinion that Christians might be allowed to use their own judgment in this matter. In 1694 the new Elector, Frederick Augustus urged Spener to return to Dresden, but he refused the offer. His last work was On Eternal Godhead of Christ, which he finished shortly before his death in 1705.

Spinoza, Baruch de, the greatest rationalistic philosophers, was born at Amsterdam on Nov. 24th, 1632, of Jewish parentage who had settled there on escaping the persecution of Jews in Spain. He afterwards Latinised his name Baruch into Benedict. He was destined to commerce, but his love of study and great intellect made his parc... or their resolution in favour of a rabbinical cation. Let it be remembered that the th thus linked to men of various lands—for father was a Portuguese Jew—was bound one nation only by spiritual affinity, and nation without a home, and the course the earnest young Jew’s mental life will more easily followed. The education of Jews was almost exclusively religious, the Testament and the Talmud forming their scriptural studies. Spinoza entered into them a most fanatical zeal, which, backed by remarkable penetration and subtlety, won the admiration of his instructor, the Chief Rabbi, Levi Morteira. At fourteen Spinoza told almost all the doctors in the exacte and extent of his biblical knowledge. He pursued his inquiries further than they could follow him, and put questions which could not solve. Thus, because he found mention of the doctrine of Immortality in Old Testament, and because he was acquainted with some of the interpretations of Law which his Rabbi gave, and those interpretations which Christ Himself had asked, he was accused of heresy, and excommunicated from the Synagogue. [See terrible curse quoted at length in Mr. Tineau’s Types of Ethical Theory, i. 258.] friends and relations were forbidden to intercourse with him, but he made some friends, particularly Frans van den Ende, had a great influence on his life; he was physician in Amsterdam who kept a philoical seminar, and is said to have been a critical plotter and an atheist. Some years r he was hanged in Normandy for конеч ny. He taught Spinoza Latin, which he but with great ease, and which was very able to him. At this time the works of Cartes fell into his hands, and he studied eagerly. He left Amsterdam in 1660, retired to Rynsburg, near Leyden, where he lived on a trade, as all Jews were taught to. His was that of a maker of telescopes, microscopes, etc., but he devoted all his spare time to philosophy. In the next year he went to Woobarg, a small village near the Veer, and finally to the Hague itself. Here he frequently attended the Calvinistic worships, and expressed the deepest admiration for the character of Christ and the writings of St. Paul; but he was never baptised, nor called himself a Christian. He was offered a professorship of philosophy at Heidelberg, but refused, conscious that the philosophy he would teach was too closely allied to theology not to trench on its dogmas. I resigned the heritage which fell to him by his father’s death to his sisters, refused to accept the property which his friend, Simon de Vos, had intended to leave to him, and also suspension offered to him by Louis XIV., and continued his labours in the greatest party, sometimes, it is said, expending his food only 24d. a day. He died Feb. 22nd, 1677, of phthisis, from which he had suffered for twenty years.

Spinoza’s system is the logical development of the system of Descartes, though the two philosophers differed on many points. Spinoza’s first published work was an Abridgment of the Meditations of Descartes, with an appendix containing the germs of the Ethics, and Tractatus Theologico-Politicus. This work contains a rationalistic criticism of the Bible, and an attack on the institution of the priesthood as injurious to the general welfare. He also explained in it that philosophy and theology have nothing in common. This book was at once condemned and forbidden in every country, and many spectacles were used to introduce it into the various countries under different names. But Spinoza is chiefly known by Ethics More Geometrico Demonstrata, which contains a statement of his doctrines drawn up in a mathematical form, and which has gained for him the name of “The Euclid of Meta-physicians.” He gives eight definitions, and seven axioms. The eight definitions are:

1. By a thing which is its own cause, I understand a thing, the essence of which involves existence, or the nature of which can only be considered as existent.

2. A thing finite is that which can be limited (terminari potest) by another thing of the same nature; e.g. body is said to be finite because it can always be conceived as larger. So thought is limited by other thoughts. But body does not limit thought, nor thought limit body.

3. By substance I understand that which exists in itself, and is conceived per se; in other words, the conception of which does not require the conception of anything else antecedent to it.

4. By attribute I understand that which the mind perceives as constituting the very essence of substance.

5. By modes I understand the accidents (affectiones) of substance; or that which is in something else, through which also it is conceived.

6. By God I understand the Being absolutely infinite, i.e. the substance consisting of infinite attributes, each of which expresses an infinite and eternal essence.

7. That thing is said to be free which exists by the sole necessity of its nature, and by itself alone is determined to action. But that thing is necessary, or, rather, constrained, which owes its existence to another, and acts according to certain and determinate causes.

8. By eternity I understand existence itself, in as far as it is conceived necessary to follow from the sole definition of an eternal thing.

The seven axioms are:—

1. Everything which is, is in itself or in some other thing.

2. That which cannot be conceived through another (per alius) must be conceived through itself (per se).

3. From a given determinate cause the effect necessarily follows; and, vice versa, if no determinate cause be given, no effect can follow.

4. The knowledge of an effect depends on the knowledge of the cause, and implies it.

5. Things which have nothing in common with each other cannot be understood by means of each other, i.e. the conception of one does not involve the conception of the other.

6. A true idea must agree with its object (idea vera debet eum suo ideato convenire).

7. Whatever can be clearly conceived as non-existent, does not, in its essence, involve existence.

By these definitions and axioms Spinoza demonstrated the following propositions:

Prop. 1. Substance is prior to its accidents.

Prop. 2. Two substances having different attributes have nothing in common with each other.

Prop. 3. Of things which have nothing in common, one cannot be the cause of the other.

Prop. 4. Two or more distinct things are distinguished among themselves either through the diversity of their attributes, or through the diversity of their modes.

Prop. 5. It is impossible that there should be two or more substances of the same nature and of the same attributes.

Prop. 6. One substance cannot be created by another substance.

Prop. 7. It pertains to the nature of substance to exist.

Prop. 8. All substance is necessarily finite.

The Ethics was not published until after his death; it was, however, left by him complete and ready for publication. It is a work comparatively small in bulk [264 small quarto pages], but it has had a profound effect upon the philosophy of modern times. For a while his system was regarded with horror; then a strong reaction set in, which has lasted to our own time. "His system," says Dr. Martin- eau, "rightly understood, responds to no enthusiasm, pretends to no beauty but that of cold consistency, and maintains no higher attitude than that of serene neutrality towards all that is and happens in heaven and earth. It is a strange but unquestionable fact that in the fervour of young doubt and mental need the precise and passionless propositions of the Ethics—the severest of all books—have often been seized with an intense eagerness. It is, perhaps, that the hottest fever loves the coldest drink." The best account that we have met with of the practical bearing of the ethics of Spinoza is Mr. Maurice's. He shows how near the ardent Jew came to the doctrine of the Incarnation, how his confusions arose from not arriving at that doctrine, how he realised that the love of God towards His own perfectness involves a love to mankind stopped short of the Christian dedication to the Love of the Father towards the Son of men in Him. Spinoza closes his treatise with the grand words: "If now the way I have shown leads to these rewards seem to be very difficult, nevertheless it may be found. Difficult, indeed, it must be, because it is so rarely discovered. For how can happen, if safety were near and could not be found without labour, that near safety should neglect it? But all noble things are difficult, all noble things are rare." On this Mr. Maurice comments thus: "A grand conclusion, we say; yet one in which not would be concluded if a voice which claimed, 'Strait is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth to life,' had not been proclaimed. 'I am the way; I am the truth through which every man may enter in find safety.'"

The late Mr. Blunt thus constructs Spinozistic Creed from passages in the philosopher's writings:—"I believe in One Indwelling God, Eternal and Unchangeable, existing and acting by the sole need of His nature; of infinite attributes, which two only are capable of being conceived by man—Extension and Thought, wherein Himself is the Identity; of all thing Free Cause; immanent, not transient. Whom all things consist, and without Whom nothing can exist or be conceived. By Whom all things were made, not by design or for the sake of any end but, predetermined, and lowering necessarily from the absolute or infinite power of God. Of which is Man, whose consciousness is the basis of the whole, in which whatsoever is perceived is true, and exists objective nature; whose will is not free, but necessary or constrained; whose acts and deeds are good so far as they are defined reason, and whose salvation, liberty, and eternity consists, not in the reward of virtue but in the virtue itself, whereby affection restrained, and in the constant and eternal knowledge and love of God; whose way by man consists in the exercise of obedi- ence, charity, and justice. And I believe in communion and fellowship of all men far as they are led by reason and in the ends of the mind."

Spinoza taught that God is the only in substance, and that nothing can be con-ceived without Him. He is not corporeal, but a mode of God, and, therefore, unchangeable. He is the same as Nature; as Spinoza pressed it, "God is the identity of the nature naturans and the nature naturata. He is idea immanent, that is, the One and All eternally. Spinoza has been accused of Pantheism from a misconception of his "substance," and also of Atheism from doctrine that the universe is a manifest of the Deity, not as the Deity Himself, 1 life; when released at once enters upon the possession of higher powers and more extended knowledge, and its condition is one of regularly progressive advancement. Disembodied spirits are able to hold converse with those in the body; not with all immediately, but through the instrumentality of privileged or specially gifted persons called Mediums, who are on occasion influenced, or, as they term it, controlled by the spirits. Spirits can also apply force to physical objects, perform certain actions, such as writing, and produce sounds; they can sometimes show themselves in materialised forms, some of the material being borrowed from the medium. A new era is now dawning on us. The old religions, Christianity included, have played their part, and must pass away in face of clearer light. By intercourse with the spirit world, man will advance as he never has advanced before in knowledge, purity, and brotherly love "[Paper read at Durham Church Congress, by Rev. R. Thornton, D.D.]. Among the Spiritualists who have attracted most notice have been Douglas Home, who gave settings before Napoleon III. and Alexander II. of Russia, and Robert Dale Owen [b. at Glasgow, 1801; d. 1877], who emigrated to the United States, and became the most prominent of the Spiritualists. His publications on this subject are Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World [1860] and The Debatable Land between this World and the Next [1872]. Spiritualism has been claimed by some as an adjunct to the Christian religion, by others as a substitute for it. As an adjunct, it is rejected by almost all the leaders of the Christian Communion; as a substitute, it involves the virtual setting aside, more or less completely, of the authority of Holy Scripture and of the teaching of the Church Universal. Some have not inaptly called it a "ghostly caricature of religion."

The author from whom we have already quoted, Dr. Thornton, thus admirably sums up what may be said in its favour:—

"Now, there is much of the Spiritist teaching with which the Church can most cordially agree."

[1] It is a system of belief, not of mere negation of all that is not logically demonstrated. Its adherents are not ashamed to avow that they hold as true, propounding which are incapable of mathematical proof. They are at least theists, if no more; certainly not atheistic.

[2] It is in its very nature antagonistic to all Sardinianism and Materialism. It flatly contradicts the assertions of the miserable philosophy that makes the soul but a function of the brain and death an eternal sleep. It proclaims that man is responsible for his actions, against those who would persuade us that each deed is but the resultant of a set of forces, an effect first and then a cause in an eternal and immutable series of causes and effects, and that sin and holiness are therefore words without meaning. It tells of angels, of an immortal spirit, of a future state of personal and conscious existence.

[3] It inculcates the duties of purity, charity, and justice, setting forth as well the loving Fatherhood of God as the brotherhood of men, to be continued, with personal recognition, in the future life.
"[4] It declares that there can be, and is, communion between spirit and spirit; and so by implication acknowledges the possibility, at least, of intercourse between man and the Supreme Spirit; in other words, of revelation, inspiration, and grace. For the statement of a point of agreement I pass on to those in which I think Spiritualism wars against the Church that her trumpet sometimes gives but an uncertain sound.

[5] While habitually remind these we teach that 'there is a spiritual soul'; we too seldom convert the phrase, and tell them that they are really spirits, and have a body, which contains an immortal part, to be prepared for immortality. We must say to the body of the soul a sort of appendage to it—an error against which Socrates could caution his disciples. [Phaedo, p. 115, sec. 64.] No doubt bodily existence is [in measure] more of a reality to us in this life than spiritual being; yet we cannot thus allude—nine out of ten people, when they hear the words 'Real Presence,' understand bodily presence; they have not grasped the truth that to the spiritual only can the epithet 'real' be justly applied here below. Minds thus disciplined are easily led away to believe that the soul is only a certain phase of the bodily organism, and is dissolved with its dissolution. Those who have learnt with Socrates that the soul is a body, properly speaking, a spirit—is the essence of the man, could never suppose that the existence of the reality depended upon the existence of its instrument. We should have taught carefully than we have done, not that men are bodies and have souls, but that they are souls, and have bodies; which bodies, changed from the glory of the terrestrial to the glory of the celestial, will be theirs to do God's work hereafter.

[2] Again, we are terribly afraid of saying a word about the intermediate state. We draw a hard and fast line between the seen and the unseen world. In vain does the Creed express the belief in the communion of saints; it is a hint that one who prays for his beloved on earth may carry them when, his earthly frame dissolved, he is removed nearer to the presence of his Lord, popular religion confuses such intercession with the figments of the Mediation and Invocation of Saints. Once again the bodily life, not that of the spirit, is made the true life.

[3] Further, there is a widespread reluctance, even in the Church, about the superhuman as such. I do not say this is held far from us; but it is very general. There are some, for instance, who abhor all spiritual exposition of Scripture. The four rivers of Paradise [to use a Rabbinical epithet] have not for us, they may accept two, but the other two, 'searching' and 'mystery,' they cannot away with. Others do not like to hear of the work of the Eternal Spirit in His Church, or of things done in God's wisdom, otherwise than earthly wisdom would direct or conjecture. They acknowledge, indeed, some Divine guidance, but shrink from spiritual influence or spiritual illumination, the ministry of angels or the presence of the Evil One.

Not less wise is his statement of the points in which he is obliged to condemn the Spiritualist's teaching. First, the belief of the phenomenon to carry conviction:

Strange knockings, we are told, are heard, which on demand are made to represent the letters of the alphabet, and frame mysterious words; musical instruments about the room, and unearthly melodies; sentences are written by unseen hands; shadowy forms are described in the darkness; light touches are felt; indeed, one spirit has permitted himself to be killed by another. Now, supposing for a moment that these are real spiritual beings, one would see a great danger in the practice of conferring with them. How can we know their character? It is curious that they are considered to shrink from daylight in general. 'Your light hurts us,' they are represented as saying, though we read, 'God saw the light that it was good.' Spiritualist (Mr. Brittan) declares that in the five years he has never met with a spirit who told him a wilful falsehood; but it is confessed there is a danger of becoming associated with spirits. Indeed, we are told that on some occasions stones have been thrown by spirits; so that they appear to be roughs or Fenians among the spirits. But we need not, I think, be under any apprehension. There is no such evidence that any spirits exist.

The spiritualism of the mediumistic has been censured at some of the séances by unimpeachable witnesses that all manifestations point to simple human force, which we may call a chaos of pure magnetism, occult, symbolic, conditions of which are as yet unknown (as those of electricity were a century ago), but may before years be as well known as those of heat, electricity, magnetism, and light, with which it is no more correlated; and may perhaps be represented by a proposed to represent the conditions of life.

But, farther, we cannot accept that degred view of the body which seems to be an element in the highest Spiritualist teaching. It is represented not as an instrument for the acquisition of knowledge, and as being, no less than the spirit, work of God, and consecrated to His service. It is, of course, teetotalism, are essential to one who would reach the higher knowledge; his very reason must be a place where no blood is or has been [W].

There is at the same time a 'glimpse' of Gnostics, Bardeanes, and Tatian, and the Koran, with horror how short and easy was the step to their stern asceticism to Caracoprates and Ophites.

But still worse, we find in Spiritualism that is a terrible degradation not of our human only, but of the great Master of bodies, souls and spirits. And here it is that I call it special teaching the Church; Jesus in his system is an adept, but an adept in spiritualism, his aedship by an ascetic diet, for 'there evidence that He partook of any animal food or the flesh of the paschal lamb.' Or he has a is a remarkable medium, gifted with an excessive amount of spirit-force, and a peculiar power of communicating with and controlling spirits. Or an Essene, a leader of a Baptist sect, of which indeed, but inferior to the great Gauthier who man He. His life is indescrib. grand example of purity and charity, His death a noble piece of self sacrifice. With such views is hardly necessary to say that the personal ev of the spirit, as rather than denied, and Scriptures displaced from the post of honor by the written Word of God.'

Spiritualities.—That part of the of the Church which relates to its official functions, as distinguished from temporalitie matters of ordinary and worldly character

Spirituality.—In ecclesiastical parl the whole body of the clergy, whose of the charge of the spiritual affairs of man

Sponsors [Lat. sponeo, "I professed also godparents and surities. There have been sponsors in very early Christ times, and it is said they were first appointed by Hyginus, Bishop of Rome, in 154. This was at first only one sponsor for each chum, and they were chosen from deacons and deaconesses. All catechumens, heretics, and penitents, and in some those who had not been confirmed, were bidden to act as sponsors. At the Concilee Aucerre, in 578, monks and nuns were excluded. At first it was common for pa and as sponsors to their children, but was forbidden in the ninth century. It was proposed in 1839 that they should be void the privilege. It was not carried at time, but has been since. The number of sponsors in the English Church is now three, according to the ancient custom in this try—two godfathers and one godmother, a male, two godmothers and a godfather a female. In the Roman Church it is necessary to have one god-parent, though there are sometimes more; and in this rh no person is allowed to marry his or her sponsor. It was formerly the law in the Iish Church that the sponsor might not be the parent of his or her godchild, but is now repealed.

The office of sponsors for infants is twofold: they are acting in their name in making an official profession of faith in Christ, and all its works, in the promises of a holy life; and, that of witnessing and securing for the child by its parents the benefits of the principles of the Gospel, but, as may be, a practical acquaintance with important vows made for them in baptism, and the solemn consecration of heart and body to which they involve.

The rubric at the end of the Catechism is: "Every one shall have a Godfather or a mother as a witness of their Confirmation," this sponsor is to be distinguished from Baptismal Sponsor.

The provision of the Prayer Book is a survival of still more ancient usage. Thus bishop Walter in the Council of Oxford, [Lnywood, L 1, tit. De Sac. Unc. cop. iotis], ordered that parents should not be sponsors to their children at Confirmation: "and Confirmationem nullus puer teneatur tre vel matre."

Lywood glossing the teneatur says that the candidate is held taken by the right hand) by another, to try that he has not yet received his full blessing. The same idea is very beautifully lighted up by St. Thomas Aquinas, who says at Confirmation we are given the full of Christ for the spiritual conflict, and he becometh, feeing not yet girded with his weapons, is upheld by his sponsor to that as yet he is weak and immature: "quasi adnneum imbecillis et puero." In just as in old times the candidate for knighthood was presented by a sponsor, so is the candidate for the spiritual knighthood.

A custom of appointing a Confirmation sponsor is still observed on the Continent. It may be allowed to regret that this custom has been allowed to fall into desuetude, but surely would be exceedingly helpful to young people both at and subsequently to Confirmation that they should have an elder who should remind them of the solemn vow of the vows they had made and of due use they are to make of their full privileges as members of the Church. If the old custom were to be followed of the candidate being led up to the bishop by his sponsor, this would give the sanction of an outward solemnity to a very real spiritual bond. It may well be thought that a revival of this ancient custom so clearly indicated in the Prayer Book might result, by God's blessing, in a far larger percentage of our candidates becoming communicants, and, of what is of more importance, persevering in the better thoughts and purposes God gave them at Confirmation. For this sponsor relationship would be no temporary one, but would involve the ties of a permanent spiritual friendship. There can be little doubt that in this would be found a real spiritual work for our lay communicants which would be of true interest to them and of real advantage to their own souls. It would, in fact, to a great extent do what is good and useful in John Wesley's idea of class-leadership while, like everything on old Church lines, avoiding its many dangers." [E. G. W. in Ely Diocesan Remembrancer.]

Sports, Book of—or, as it is sometimes called, Declaration of Sports—was issued by James I. in 1618. In the earlier days of the Reformation no difference had been made in the observance of Sunday from what it had been in the Middle Ages, when, after Morning Service, all sorts of games and sports were indulged in on the village green. The Puritans, however, set up a far more severe standard of discipline, taking as their model the old Jewish Sabbath, and following the rules laid down in the Old Testament. [Sabbath]. The first action taken by the Puritans was in Lancashire, where they endeavoured to enforce the strict observance, and the magistrates took their side. King James happened to pass through on his way from Scotland to London, and on being appealed to decided against the Puritans. After he had left, news was brought that the villagers, content with the permission to indulge in their sports after Morning Service, had, in several instances, met together for amusement at the very door of the Church with the intention of disturbing the worshippers. The result was the Declaration of Sports, first published for use in the diocese of Lancashire, but afterwards extended to the whole kingdom. The King announced in this declaration that "no lawful recreation should be barred to his good people which should not tend to the breach of the laws of his kingdom and the Canons of the Church." The lawful games were archery, dancing, leaping, vaulting, and the setting-up of May-poles. It was stipulated, however, that no one should be allowed to take part in the sports who had not first been present at Divine Service. He did not issue this declaration in the usual way as an Order of Council, but commanded that it should be read by the clergyman of every parish from the pulpit. The opposition of the clergy, including Abbot, the Archbishop of Canterbury, was so great, that James prudently withdrew it. In the reign of his son, Charles I., the question was again revived, this time in consequence of the attempt to put a stop to the village wakes in Somersetshire. In former times these wakes had been held on the day kept in honour of the saint to whom the parish church was dedicated, but gradually had come to be held either the previous or following Sunday, and were often the cause of so much rioting and drunkenness, that attempts had been made to put a stop to them. In 1633 Judge Richardson commanded that henceforth wakes should be discontinued, thereby incurring the wrath of Archbishop Laud, who considered that in so doing he had encroached on the rights of the Bishop. The opinion of the clergy in that part of the country was asked, and the majority were in favour of allowing the wakes to be continued; though it is alleged that care was taken in the first instance to consult only those who were known to be of the High Church party. The Bishop of the diocese makes his report to Laud in these words: "I find also that the people generally would by no means have these sports taken away; for when the constables of some parishes came from the assizes about two years ago, and told their neighbours that the judges would put down these feasts, they answered that it was very hard if they could not entertain their kindred and friends once a year to praise God for His blessings, and to pray for the King's Majesty, under whose happy government they enjoyed peace and quietness, and they said that they would endure the judges' penalties rather than they would break off their feast days. It is found also by experience that many suits have been ended at these feasts by mediation of friends, which could not have been so soon ended in Westminster Hall," and he adds, "If the people should not have their honest and lawful recreations upon Sundays after Evening Prayer, they would go either into tippling houses, and there, upon their benches, talk of matters of the Church and State, or else into conventicles." In October of the same year, therefore, Charles I. republished the Book of Sports, adding that any minister refusing to read it in church was to be severely punished. The outcry was even fiercer than it had been before, and the indignation caused was one of the strongest elements in the destruction of the monarchy. The declaration was publicly burnt by order of the Long Parliament in 1644.

Spotswood, John, Archbishop of St. Andrews, was born at Mid Calder, near Edinburgh, in 1565; died in 1639. He was educated at Glasgow University, where he took his degree when only sixteen. He soon after succeeded his father in the onor of Calder, and subsequently official as chaplain to the Duke of Lennox, wh went as ambassador to Henry IV. France. James I. having heard of Spotswood's learning and piety, took him England when he succeeded to the throne and the See of Glasgow falling vacanc he was presented to it, and became one of the Scotch Privy Council. In 16 he was promoted to the Archbishopric of Andrews. He was strongly opposed to the Puritans, and thus when the Covenant was signed he was ejected from his See and car to London, where he died.

He wrote a History of the Church and St of Scotland from the third century to his own times.

Stabat Mater.—The opening words a hymn composed about the end of the thirteenth century by Jacopo da Todi, is one of the most beautiful of Latin hymn and describes the Virgin at the foot of the cross, as depicted in St. John's Gosp. The beauty of the hymn, and the adoration paid to the Virgin, have made it a favourite in the Roman Church, and it has been set to music by Nanini, Palestrina, Palegese, Haydn, and Rossini, whose version is the best known in England. It has been many times translated into English, German and Dutch. Another Stabat Mater, supposed to be by the same author, describes the joy the Virgin at Christ's birth; but it is little known, and far inferior to the Stabat Mat Dolorosa.

Stockhouse, Thomas [b. 1650, d. 175 Vicar of Beenham, in Berkshire, is the aut of The New History of the Holy Bi A Letter to a Right Reverend Prelate, bei an account of the hardships of the infer clergy; Memoirs of Bishop Atterbury, Co complete Body of Divinity, and an Exposition the Apostles' Creed.

Stalls.—The seats in cathedrals and college churches which, situated in the cho are reserved exclusively for the use of the clergy. The word is sometimes given to the benefice, the incumbent of which is entitled to be a member of the cathedral body.

Stancarists.—A sect founded in Pola in the sixteenth century by Francesco Stcaro, who was born at Mantua in 1501, d at Stobnitz in 1574. He was ejected fr the University of Mantua on account of leaning to Protestantism. He published Hebrew grammar at Basle in 1546, and 15 years later became Hebrew professor Königsberg, and in 1550 was called on to a similar post at Cracow. He was, howe soon dismissed for propagating Protestant principles in his lectures, and was imprisoned, released in a little time through the inter of some noblemen. In 1551 he went Russia, and settled at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder. Here he began his controversy with Osiander v. concerning the Atonement of Christ; and he held that Christ is our Mediator by respect to His Divinity; for that if we were mediator with respect to His Divinity, we were inferior to the Father in His Divine nature, and could not be co-essential with God as Father. Thus, he asserted, those who denied that Christ was a Mediator in His Mediatorship revived the Arminian heresy. He returned to Poland in 1558, where he excelled in no ammotions, and he wrote "Apologia contra Osiandrum de Trinitate," and was strongly opposed by Blandrata, Lismannin, etc. The unearists did not long survive their founder, and soon became absorbed in the Socinians.

Stanislas Kostka, Sr., a Polish saint, born Oct. 28th, 1550, was the younger son of Stanislaus Kostka, senator of Poland. He and his other Paul were educated together by a tutor, John Bilinski, who afterwards accompanied them to the large Jesuit college of Vienna. Stanislas was of a more serious disposition than his brother, and was very particular in the choice of his companions; Paul d Bilinski were fond of excitement and assurance, and were perpetually taunting him until he tried to tempt him to share their pleasures. He was seized with a dangerous illness, and on his recovery vowed that he would henceforth give up the world altogether and live like a monk. He took his vows in Rome, on SS. Simon and Jude's Day, 1567, and thence incurred the violent wrath of his father. He had not been long in Rome before he was seized with a violent fever, of which he died, Aug. 15th, 1568, before he had completed his eighteenth year. He was beatified 1604, and canonised by Benedict XIII. in 1727. His festival is kept on Nov. 13th, the day of the translation of his relics. He is generally regarded by the Poles as one of their chief saints, and is the patron saint of most of their principal towns.

Stanley, Arthur Penrhyn, Dean of Westminster [b. at Alderley, Cheshire, where his father was rector, Dec. 13th, 1815; d. in London, July 18th, 1881]. In January, 1829, he entered as a scholar at Rugby, where he showed a remarkable talent for history, and a very retentive memory, but an incapacity for the study of mathematics, which was a serious drawback to his progress. He entered at Balliol College, Oxford, in 1833, where he gained the Newdigate prize for a poem on "The Gipsies"; and in 1840-1 travelled in Greece for the purpose of pursuing his classical studies. His father had been appointed to the bishopric of Norwich in 1837. On his return to England, Stanley began his career as a college tutor, and met with good success. His lectures showed more than ordinary ability, and he became known by two works which he published, "A Life of Arnold," which appeared in 1844, and "Sermons and Essays on the Apostolic Age" [1846], which took an entirely new line in dealing with the lives of the Apostles. He was made secretary to the first Oxford Commission; and in 1850, in writing in the Edinburgh Review on the Gorham judgment, he began a series of criticisms on ecclesiastical questions. In 1851 he was appointed Canon of Canterbury, and during the years in which he held that office he wrote a "Commentary on the Epistles to the Corinthians;" "Memorials of Canterbury;" and "Sinni and Palestine," a delightful volume, in which he brought the observation of his travels to bear upon the Sacred History. It was in consequence of this volume that he was appointed by the Queen to accompany the Prince of Wales in his tour in the East in 1862. He had previously made a tour in Russia, which led him to deliver lectures on its history, published in 1861. He became Dean of Westminster in 1863, and soon afterwards married Lady Augusta Bruce, who was equally in earnest with himself in the labours which he undertook among the people of Westminster, while neither lost sight of the duties which they owed to society. Dean Stanley devoted himself to beautifying the Abbey, and making it popular, and to cultivating the friendship and religious feeling of the poor of the neighbourhood, and he spent much time in lecturing and preaching in all causes for the good of the people. His tenure of the office of Dean was an epoch which will never be forgotten in the history of Westminster, and of the religious life of England. He was a Broad Churchman, always eager to promote union with other denominations. His wife died in 1875; this was felt by him as a lifelong sorrow. He was never the same man again; but he was brave in his endurance, and did not neglect his good and holy work, and in 1878 he visited America, where he was cordially received, and delivered numerous addresses and sermons. His other works, are: — "Lectures on the Jewish Church," three series [1863-79]; "Historical Memorials of Westminster Abbey" [1868]; "Essays on Church and State" [1870]; "A History of the Church of Scotland" [1872]; "Christian Institutes" [1881]; "Memoirs of his Father and Mother, Edward and Catherine Stanley"; and numerous articles in reviews. Stanley's courageous endeavours to promote union with Nonconformists, and also to protect the freethinking divines of the Church of England, notably, the writers of "Essays and Reviews" [q.v.], and Bishop Colenso [q.v.], exposed him to many hard words. But his courage made him popular even with those who opposed him, and his conspicuous piety and philanthropy were admitted on all hands. His funeral in Westminster Abbey was a marvellous spectacle, from the crowds which gathered to it representing every phase of religious belief and of intellectual greatness.

Starobradtzi, Starovertzi, or Raskolniks. [Russian Church.]

States of the Church.—The position of the Papal See as a temporal Power in Europe was acquired gradually. [See Papal Power, Growth of.] We have seen in that article how within the walls of Rome the Pope became the greatest potentate, in consequence of the fall of the Empire. It was by the gift of Pepin, King of the Franks, in 751, of the Exarchate of Ravenna and the Pentapolis (Ancona, Sinigaglia, Fano, Pesaro, Rimini), with Bologna and Ferrara, to the Pope, that the Papal States were founded. It is noticeable, however, that Pepin named himself, and not the Pope, as supreme ruler of Rome itself. By the bequest of the Countess Matilda of Tuscany, that State was added to the Papal possessions in the eleventh century. Under Innocent III. in the thirteenth century the Papal States became absolutely independent of the Empire. Elsewhere we have shown how, after Innocent's time, Papal power declined. After the Reformation the Papal Chair was filled exclusively by Italians, members of noble families, and in the Papal States prosperity, industry, and intellectual life steadily went down. By the successes of Bonaparte in Lombardy he was enabled to force the Pope to cede the Romagna, Bologna, and Ferrara to France in 1797, and in 1808 the great usurper went further, and as Pope Pius VII. steadfastly refused to enter into an offensive and defensive alliance with France, and, to close his ports against England, Napoleon proclaimed the Papal States incorporated with France. For this he was excommunicated by the Pope, who was therefore imprisoned for three years, and treated with cruelty and violence. In 1814 the Papal States were restored to their owner. They would again have been lost amid the Revolution, which took place in Europe in 1848-9, but for the intervention of Louis Napoleon, the President of the French Republic, who sent a French army of occupation to Rome to protect the Pope; which remained until 1866, when the Emperor withdrew it. Meanwhile Garibaldi, with an army of volunteers, having made successful war on Naples, the result was the unity of Italy into a monarchy under King Victor Emanuel [1859]. All the country, except the State of Venice and the province known as the "Patrimony of St. Peter," became part of the new monarchy. This province also was attacked by Garibaldi, but he was defeated and wounded, and thereupon retired into private life. The withdrawal of the French army removed the last obstacle to the absorption of the Papal States, and on Sept. 20th, 1870, the Italian army took possession of the "Patrimonium Petri," and the secular authority of the Pope was at an end. He now only possesses the Palace of St. Peter in Rome, and it is the capital of Italian Kingdom. Up to the present moment the protest of Pope Pius IX. has not been withdrawn, that the annexation is an unlawful usurpation, and the Pope has refused to take part in any ceremonial outside his residence; but the opinion is held by many that Leo XIII. will yield to circumstance and enter into amicable relations with the secular Government.

Stationary Days.—Wednesdays are so called as being the days of week-day services of greater length than other week-days; Wednesday because it was the day on which the Jews took counsel to kill our Lord, Friday because it was the day of the Crucifixion. In the Western Church the fast was obligatory on Friday, while on Wednesday, always voluntary, gradually died out. In the Eastern Church both days are still kept. The fast lasted always three o'clock in the afternoon.

Stations of the Cross.—A series of pictures to be found in every Roman Catholic Church, sometimes on the Continent in open air on the road to the church. They represent the events of the Passion in order, the first being on the right side of the altar, and the rest going round the walls of the church, until the last is to be found on the left side. The custom of prayer and meditation before the representation of each event is a very favourite one with Roman Catholics, and was instituted by the Francis Orders in the seventeenth century. There are usually fourteen pictures. The following are the scenes depicted:—The sentence passed on Christ by Pilate; Christ receiving the Cross; His first fall; His meeting with the Virgin; Simon of Cyrene bearing the Cross; St. Veronica wiping His face with her handkerchief; His second fall; His words to women of Jerusalem; His third fall; the pinning of His garments; His crucifixion; His death; the descent from the Cross; His burial.

Staupitz, Johann von, a great friend of Martin Luther, died at Salzburg, 1524. To date and place of his birth are not known. He joined the Augustinian Order, and entered heart and soul into its doctrine of faith and election. In 1500 he became Prior of an Augustinian Convent in Tübingen, a Doctor of Theology at the university; but two years after, at the invitation of the Elector Saxony, moved to Wittenberg. In 1503 was chosen Vicar-General of his Order in Germany. It was he who first kindled a love for the Gospel, when they met at Erfurt in 1505. Staupitz saw that this young monk was capable of great things but was too much given to asceticism and fear of God more than he loved him; so gained him confidence and cheered him. In 1508, at ing dukes declared that he had taken this title from ambition, and they were resolved to humble his pride. Stephen defeated them, and took the leader, the Prince of Transylvania, prisoner; but soon released him, on condition that he would cause all the idols in his country to be demolished, and allow Christianity to be freely taught in his dominions. He drew up a code of laws, which form the groundwork of the Constitution of Hungary to this day. Stephen died Aug. 15th, 1038. Innocent XI. canonised him in 1687.

Stephen, Sr., Pope and martyr.—St. Stephen was a deacon, a native of Rome, and on the death of Lucius, in 253, was made Pope. When he had been Pope three years, he had a long and learned dispute with St. Cyprian on the question of baptism—whether it could be administered by heretics or not. They could not agree, so St. Cyprian called together two councils, both of which agreed that there could be no valid baptism, except that which is administered by the Church. St. Cyprian was supported by other African bishops, but Stephen refused to yield, and proceeded to excommunicate them. He did not live to see the contest end, as it afterwards did, in his favour, as the majority of the Eastern and African bishops retracted their decrees. He was martyred in the year 275, under the Emperor Valerian. August 2nd is kept in his memory.

Stephen's (St.) Day.—The death of the first Christian martyr is commemorated on Dec. 26th. Very little is known of his history and life, a few words in the Acts of the Apostles preceding the account of his martyrdom being all that is recorded of him. It says there that he was one of the first deacons, and excited the wrath of the Jews by telling the people that the law and the old dispensation had passed away, and that a new one was beginning. Tradition says that he had been brought up in the Jewish faith in Greece, and his name, Stephen, which means a "crown," is evidently Greek. The custom of keeping this day and those of St. John the Baptist and the Holy Innocents on the three days immediately after Christmas Day is very ancient, and many explanations have been given to account for the arrangement. Most commentators agree now that it was so arranged without any special design; others say that it was to draw attention to the three special graces of self-sacrifice, love, and purity.

Stephen the Sabaitic.—One of the earliest hymn-writers of the Greek Church (b. 728, d. 794). He was the nephew of St. John Damascene, who placed him in the Monastery of St. Sabas, where he remained for fifty-nine years. He is the author of the hymn translated, Art thou weary, etc.

Sternhold and Hopkins, authors of the old Metrical Versions of the Psalms.—
Sternhold was Groom of the Chambers to Henry VIII., and afterwards to Edward VI., and it is said he owed that position to his poetical talents. Certain it is that although many Psalms had been translated into verse by different scholars, Sternhold’s version was the first introduced into England. Of his fellow-labourer, Hopkins, little is known, save that he was a clergyman and schoolmaster in Suffolk, and by some considered even a better poet than Sternhold. There was published also a collection of Psalms in verse by different poets, to which William Wyttingham, a friend of Calvin and Knox, was a contributor. Sternhold died in 1549, and in the same year fifty-one Psalms, versified by him, were printed. A more complete version was published in 1562.

Steneld, Johann Christian Friedrich [b. 1779, d. 1857], a German Evangelical theologian, who, having studied at Tübingen, was pastor at Oberesslingen, Canstatt, and Tübingen, and in 1815 became professor of theology in the last-named town. He wrote Lecture on the Theology of the Old Testament, and an attack on Strauss’s Life of Christ.

Stier, Rudolf Ewald [b. at Frankstadt, 1800; d. at Eisleben, 1862].—He studied law at Jena, but in 1816 he became a student of theology, and for a while a disciple of Richter, but his deep religious earnestness led him to yield obedience to the faith and doctrine of the Gospel. He went to Halle in 1818, and was made head of the Burschenschaft there, and he subsequently studied and taught at Berlin, Wittenberg, Karlsruhe, and Basle. He became pastor at Frankleen in 1829, and at Wichlingenhausen in 1833; after eight years he retired, and became superintendent, first at Schkeuditz, and afterwards at Eisleben. His writings are numerous, and of deep value for their piety and suggestiveness for homiletical purposes; the most important is Words of the Lord Jesus, written in 1843, in which he insists strongly on the doctrine of inspiration. He wrote also The Words of the Apostles and The Words of the Angels; Altes und Neues in deutscher Bibel; Auslegung von 70 ausgewählten Psalmen. The most important of his works are translated in Clark’s Theological Library.

Stigmata.—The miraculous wounds which are said to have appeared in the hands, feet, and side of persons, resembling those of our Lord. In the primitive Church it was believed that these marks appeared on those who were specially favoured by God. The first authentic account of the stigmata being received was by St. Francis [d. 1226], of whom it is said that, after seeing a vision of the Crucifixion two years before his death, his feet and hands were marked with thorns, and there was a wound in his side. These wounds were seen by many of his friars, though St. Francis strove to keep them hidden. An exhaustive discussion of this miracle may be found in Mrs. Oliphant’s Life of St. Francis of Assisi. St. Cathar of Siena [d. 1380] is also said to have received the stigmata, also Ursula Aguirre, Mf Magdalen di Pazzi, and Mechtlidis von Sta. Some received not only the marks of the Crucifixion, but also of the crown of thorns; others had no visible marks, but suffered excruciating pains. The most recent case is said to be that of Estatica of Calda, about forty-three years ago. There are said to have been altogether 145 persons who have received the stigmata, of whom eighty lived before the seventeenth century.

Stillingfleet, Edward, Bishop of Worcester, was born at Cranbourn in Dorsetshire in 1635, died at Westminster, 1699, was educated at the Grammar-schools of Cranbourn and Ringwood, and then passed on to St. John’s College, Cambridge, which he became a Fellow in 1653. He was presented to the Rectory of Sutton in Bedfordshire in 1657, by Sir Roger Burgoine, whose family he had been private tutor. 1665 Lord Southampton gave him the living of St. Andrew’s, Holborn, and he became preacher at the Rolla Chapel, Doctor of Divinity, Lecturer to the Temple, Chaplain Ordinary to Charles II., Prebendary of Canterbury, Canon of St. Paul’s [1676], and the promotion of Sancroft to the Archbishopsric of Canterbury [1678] Dean of St. Paul’s. He refused to be a member of the ecclesiastical commission revived by James II., and was rewarded at the Revolution with the bishopric of Worcester.

Bishop Stillingfleet, though a great controversialist, was gentle and amiable, and of questionable piety. His views at first were inclined to latitudinarianism, but in his later life they became modified. His first work was The Armenia, or the Divine Right of Parties in Church Government Examined [1648], a second edition of which appeared in 1660, with an appendix on the Power of Excommunication in a Christian Church. This was thought by the High Church party to savour of Presbyterianism, and contained opinions which he afterwards retracted. His next work was Origins Sacrae; or Rational Account of the Christian Faith, as to the True and Divine Authority of the Scripture, which made his reputation, and is still considered one of the best treatises on the subject. In 1665 appeared A Rational Account of the Grounds of the Protestant Religion, which was a refutation of the charge of schism brought against the Church of England for separatism from Rome. His other works were:—A Course Concerning the Idolatry Practised in the Church of Rome, and the Hazard of Salemi in its Communion [1671]; The Unreasonableness of Separation, being an answer to Bax, Owen, Howe, and other Nonconformists, who had attacked him for a sermon which he preached against them, entitled, The Mis
Stoics.—A sect of Greek philosophers, so derived their name from the Stoa, or colon- de, in which their leader, Zeno, lectured at Athens, about 308 B.C. The doctrines of Zeno, it is thought, may have been derived from the Jewish Scriptures, but it is certain that Socrates and Plato had taught much of them before, and Stoicism camearest in morality to Christianity, for which prepared the way. The Stoics maintained at nature (which in reality they identified with God) impels man to do that which is good; and that conformity to the laws of nature constitutes virtue. Every one who has right discernment of what is good, desires to follow the will of Nature in all his desires and pursuits; and beyond this he must have desires, but be independent of all surrounding circumstances. All external things are different, and incapable of affecting the apperance of man; pain, which has nothing to do with the mind, is not evil; and a wise man will be happy in the midst of torture, because virtue itself is happiness. Stoicism gained a firm hold on the mind of the Romans, chiefly through its fundamental principle that action is far superior to meditation or to enjoyment; and it was expounded in Rome by Seneca, and by the Emperor Marcus Aurelius, and Epictetus the slave. Such was Stoicism in theory, and such were the best of its teachers; but practically the Stoics lived very much as they felt inclined to live, without any very strict reference to their philosophy about virtue; and their theory about endurance of suffering often led them to suicide as the easiest way of escaping it; which Zeno himself, as well as Cato, are notable examples.

Stole [Gr. stilé, "a robe"].—A scarf, said to represent the yoke of Christ, which is worn behind the neck and hanging down in front, with two ends. It is either black or coloured — when the latter, the colours of the different seasons are worn, according to the use of the Church. In the case of a deacon it is sometimes worn across the breast and tied under the right arm. It is one of the oldest Christian vestments used by the clergy.

Strauss, DAVID FRIEDRICH, the leader in our century of the extreme rationalists on the subject of the Life of Christ [b. at Ludwigsburg, in Württemberg, 1808; d. there, 1851], studied theology at Blaubeuren, and afterwards at Tübingen. He went to the seminary at Maulbronn as professor's assistant in 1830, and was at first a follower of Schelling and Boehme, but at Berlin, where he next went to study, his early opinions were exchanged for the philosophy of Hegel and the theology of Schleiermacher. He became under-teacher at the seminary at Tübingen, but forfeited this post through the publication of Das Leben Jesu, kritisch bearbeitet, in which he maintained that the Gospel history is a collection of myths, written in the first and second centuries of the Christian era, and founded on the Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah. Strauss was next appointed teacher in the Lyceum at Ludwigsburg, and in 1839 was chosen by the Council of Education to fill the office of Professor of Divinity and Church History at Zürich; but the appointment met with so much opposition from the people that he was dismissed with a small pension. He published Zwei Friedliche Blätter, Charakteristiken und Kritiken, and Die Christliche Glaubenslehre, in ihrer geschichtlichen Entwicklung und im Kampf mit der modernen Wissenschaft, between 1838 and 1841, and raised thereby a controversy in which Neander, Tholuck, and others wrote in refutation of his doctrines. In 1847 he published Der Romanist auf den Throner der Cäsaren, oder Julian der Abtrünnige, a political satire, in which he gave great offence by comparing the Roman Emperor to Friedrich Wilhelm IV. of Prussia. In 1848 he was elected a member of the Württemberg Diet for Ludwigsburg, but disappointed his constituents by taking the side of the Conservatives, and soon after resigned. Strauss's later works were Die Halben und die Ganzen, Der Christus des Glaubens und der Jesus der Geschichte, and Der alte und der neue Glaube; in these he retracted his former reverence for Christianity, denied the possibility of personal religion or belief in any god but the universe, which is "the development from a blind force or law, without any foreseen end," and expressed the opinion that there is no life hereafter. The hopelessness of such a creed made itself evident, and even rationalists recoiled from it. The theories of Strauss find but little acceptance, and have been successfully rebutted by both English and German critics. One of the finest works in antagonism is Professor Milligan's Treatise on the Resurrection.

Strigolniks.—A sect of Judaisit Christians which sprang up in Russia in the fourteenth century and spread with some rapidity. A few even of the bishops favoured them for a while. At a later period they were severely repressed, but still exist under the name of Sua and Str

Seleucetchins. These observe circumcision and the Seventh-day Sabbath, and portions of the Mosaic Law.

Strype, Rev. John, Church historian, was born in London, 1643; died, 1737. He was educated at St. Paul's School, and afterwards at Jesus College, Cambridge. He removed to Catherine Hall, where he took his B.A. in 1665. In 1669 he was made M.A., and ordained to the curacy of Theydon Bois in Essex. A few months after he removed to Low Leyton, and there he stayed till within a few years of his death; he also held the lectorship of Hackney and the sinecure of Tarring, given him by Archbishop Tenison. He spent his later years at Hackney with a married granddaughter, and died at her house at the age of ninety-four. Strype published nothing till after he was fifty; it is therefore probable that he spent his life up to that time in collecting the immense amount of information and curious detail which we find in his books. He was by no means a brilliant writer—in fact, his books at times are tedious to the last degree. They consist for the most part of transcriptions of curious and valuable papers, which he brought to light for the first time; but he makes no attempt at commenting on them, and does not seem to have had the gift of knowing what was worth preserving and what not. The chief of them are: Memorials of the most Renowned Father in God, Thomas Cranmer, sometime Archbishop of Canterbury; The Life of the Learned Sir Thomas Smith, principal Secretary of State to Edward VI. and Elizabeth, wherein are discovered many singular matters relating to the state of learning, the reformation of religion, and the transactions of the kingdom during this time. His most important work, published in 1721, was Ecclesiastical Memorials, relating chiefly to religion and the reformation of it, and the emergencies of the Church of England under Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Queen Mary. He wrote the lives of all the most celebrated divines of the Reformation time, and published several sermons as well.

Stuart, Moses [b. at Wilton, Connecticut, 1780; d. at Andover, Massachusetts, 1832].—He showed marvellous precocity as a child, and at nineteen, while a student at Yale College, was appointed to deliver the salutatory oration, this being the highest honour that he could receive. He became a schoolmaster for a short time; studied law, and was called to the Bar in 1802; and after applying himself to the study of theology, was ordained in 1806, and made pastor of the first Congregational Church at Newhaven. In 1810 he was appointed Professor of Sacred Literature at the Theological Seminary at Andover; and though it was said that he had mistaken his vocation, and should have devoted himself to preaching, he proved as successful in his professorship as elsewhere. He composed a Hebrew grammar for the use of the students, and introduced the study of German literature into America. He held this post for eight years, during which time he published several Greek and Hebrew grammars; commentaries on some of St. Paul's Epistles, on the Apocalypse; Hints on the Prophet, a Critical History and Defence of the Old Testament Canon, translations of Elementary Principles of Interpretation, and of Roediger's Canon, and other works.

Sturm, Sr.—Among the many discipulus made by Boniface during his labours in Germany, Sturm was one of the most zealous. He was born in Bavaria in 710, and his parents took the opportunity of a visit paid by Abbot Boniface to their part of the country to ask him to undertake the education bringing up of their boy. Boniface placed him in a monastery at Fritzlar, and left him to spend such time as he should be ready willing for ordination, which was in 733. He then assisted his master for three years; and at the end of that time had an intense cure to found a monastery in some lonely part far away from any human habitation. Bona cipe hoped that by this means a desert might be turned into a cultivated and flourishing district, and readily gave his consent. After many unsuccessful attempts Sturm found a suitable spot on the banks of the Fulda. He once returned to report his success to Boniface. The Archbishop received from the bishop of Fulda a grant of this land, and the monastery began under the direction of Sturm. It was soon ready for the reception of members, and Sturm was appointed abbot, but before setting to his work he went to Italy to inspect the cline and regulations of the religious houses there, in order that he might the better go his own. From its foundation Boniface made this monastery exempt from any interference of reigning bishops, and ordered that abbot should be considered responsible to Rome, and Pope alone. On the accession of Lullus to the archbishopric, however, he persuaded Pope Urban the second to disprove Sturm, and deprive him, there by to get the government into his hands. Sturm was soon restored, and peaceably at Fulda till his death in 779.

Stylites. [Simeon Stylites.]

Suarez, Francis.—A Spaniard and a Jesuit [b. at Grenada in 1447; d. at Lisbon, 1517]. He entered the society at the age of seventeen, and became famous for his knowledge of divinity. He was professor successively at the colleges of Alcala, Salamanca, and Rome. As he grew old he determined to live a quiet, retired life in order to devote himself entirely to literary works, of which, at his death, he had written twenty-four volumes. His writings were mostly concerned with the questions of scholastic theology, and the philosophy of stoicism.
Sub-Deacons.—The principal of the minor orders of the clergy in the early Church were ordained without imposition of hands. Their chief duties were to prepare sacred vessels for the Eucharistic Service, deliver them to the deacon at the proper time, and to attend at the doors of the church during the celebration of the Communion. They were also the bishop’s messengers, employed by him to convey letters to foreign archbishops.

Sub-Delegate.—The assistant of a judge-Delegate. The Sub-Delegate has the power of trying minor cases, though he cannot by law judge those of any importance; cause, although he may be qualified, he is posted not to have the experience necessary for such a responsibility.

Sublapsarians. [Infralapsarianism.]

Subscription, Clerical.—By Canon 36 1603, “No person was to be received into a ministry except he shall first subscribe to the following articles:

1. That the King’s majesty, under God, the only supreme governor of the realm, and of all other his highness’s dominions and territories, as well in all spiritual or ecclesiastical things or causes as temporal; and that no prince, person, prelate, state, or potentate, hath or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within his majesty’s said realms, dominions, and countries.

2. That the Book of Common Prayer, and ordering of bishops, priests, and deacons, therein in nothing contrary to the Word of God, and that it may lawfully be used, and that he himself will use the form in the said book prescribed in public prayer and administration of the Sacraments, and none other.

3. That he alloweth the book of Articles of Religion agreed upon by the archbishops and bishops of both provinces, and the whole clergy, in the convocation held at London, the year of our Lord God 1562, and that acknowledgment all and every the Articles therein contained, being in number nine and forty, besides the ratification, to be agreeable the Word of God.”

Which subscription, as it seems by the me and the following Canon, must be before a bishop himself: “And, for the avoiding of ambiguities, such person shall subscribe in the form and order of words, setting down his Christian and surname, viz.:—

I, N. N., do willingly and ex animo subscribe to these three Articles above-mentioned, and to all things that are contained in them.”

And if any bishop shall ordain any, except shall first have so subscribed, he shall be spared from giving of orders for the space of twelve months.”

But by 28 and 29 Vict., c. 122, ss. 4, 9, and 32 Vict., c. 72, the only oath now required to be taken is that of allegiance, which is as follows:—

“I, ——, do swear that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to her Majesty Queen Victoria, her heirs and successors, according to law. So help me God.”

Between the passing of 28 and 29 Vict., c. 122, and 31 and 32 Vict., c. 72, the oath to be taken was one of allegiance and supremacy contained in 21 and 22 Vict., c. 48, s. 1.

By s. 11 of 28 and 29 Vict., c. 122, no oath is to be taken in the Ordination Service. In 1866 the Convocation of Canterbury passed a new Canon in conformity with this Act, and repealing the former Canon 36. The new Canon has, however, mutatis mutandis, the same provisions and penalties as the old one.

By 14 Car. II., c. 4, s. 13, “Every governor or head of every college and hall in the universities, and of the colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eton, within one month next after his election, or collation, and admission into the same government or headship, shall openly and publicly, in the church, chapel, or other public place, of the same college or hall, and in the presence of the Fellows and scholars of the same, or the greater part of them then resident, subscribe unto the Nine-and-thirty Articles of Religion mentioned in the statute of Eliz., c. 12, and unto the Book of Common Prayer, and declare his unfeigned assent and consent unto and approbation of the said Articles and of the same book, and to the use of all the prayers, rites and ceremonies, forms and orders in the said book prescribed and contained, according to this form following:—

‘I, A. B., do declare my unfeigned assent and consent to all and everything contained and prescribed in and by the book intituled The Book of Common Prayer and Administration of the Sacraments and other Rites and Ceremonies of the Church, according to the Use of the Church of England; together with the Psalms or Psalms of David, pointed as they are to be sung or said in churches; and the Form and Manner of making, ordaining, and consecrating of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons.’

And all such governors or heads of the said colleges and halls, or any of them, as shall be in holy orders, shall once at least in every quarter of the year (not having a lawful impediment) openly and publicly read the Morning Prayer and Service in and by the book appointed to be read, in the church, chapel, or other public place of the same college or hall, upon pain to lose and be suspended of and from all the benefits and profits belonging to the same government or headship, by the space of six months, by the Visitor or Visitors of the same college or hall; and if any governor or head of any college or hall suspended for not subscribing unto the said Articles and book, or for not reading of the Morning Prayer and Service as aforesaid, shall not at or before the end of six months...
next after such suspension subscribe unto the said Articles and book, and declare his consent thereunto as aforesaid, then such government or headship shall be ipso facto void."

This Act has been repealed as to the universities and the colleges named therein, but not as to the colleges of Westminster, Winchester, and Eton, as to which it is still in force.

It is provided by 16 Geo. IV., c. 7, commonly called the Roman Catholic Relief Act, s. 16, as follows:

"Nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to enable any persons otherwise than as they are now by law enabled to hold, enjoy, or exercise any office or place whatever, and by whatever name the same may be called, of, in, or belonging to the colleges of Eton, Westminster, or Winchester, or any college or school within this realm."

Substance.—This word signifies in theological language the essence, that which constitutes a thing what it is. Thus the word is applied in the Athanasian and Nicene Creeds to God, and signifies the Divine Nature—that which distinguishes God from His creatures, and in which all His Divine attributes inhere. [Hypostasis.] In the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation it is held that the substance of the Sacrament is changed, while the accidents of bread remain. The word has no connection whatever with material form or solidity, as used in ordinary language.

Substrati. [Genuflectentes.]

Succession. [Apostolical Succession.]

Suffragan Bishops.—This title expresses [1] the relation of all provincial bishops to their Metropolitans. Thus the Bishops of Durham, Newcastle, Carlisle, Liverpool, Manchester, Chester, Ripon, Sodor and Man, are Suffragans of York, and the other English bishops of Canterbury. [2] All bishops having foreign titles, who have from time to time been employed on occasional duties in England. Such were Danish bishops brought over by Canute, and foreign refugee bishops. [3] Those who have at different times been consecrated for the special relief of aged bishops and overgrown dioceses. Sometimes these were consecrated with, sometimes without, right of succession. Among the latter, in Saxon times, were the Bishops of St. Martin’s, who are said to have been the predecessors of the Archdeacons of Canterbury. One or two of these, however, did actually succeed to the primacy. [4] Suffragan bishops appointed under the Act 26 Hen. VIII., c. 14. In that reign there were consecrated Suffragan Bishops of Dover, Bedford, Bristol, Taunton, Hull, Shaftesbury, and Westminster. In the American Church the suffragans are known as assistant bishops, and are consecrated with promise of succession.

Suffrage.—The original meaning of this word was that of unanimous assent. It is used in the Prayer Book to designate petitions which are uttered by the congregation with one voice; as, for example, verses after the Creed in the morning evening services, and those at the end of Litany. The word itself is found in the O for the Consecration of Bishops, where rubric orders the use of the proper *Suffrag."

Sufis.—A class of Mahomedans for the most part in Persia. They fully knowledge the authority of the Koran, in some respects differ from the pure *Sufis. The derivation of the name is disputable, some saying that it comes from an Arabic word meaning "pure," others that it is derived from the word soof, meaning "wool," referring to woollen garments worn by the priests. Their chief doctrine is that man being made in image of God, must possess to a certain degree the qualities of God, and is for that reason His representative. A Sufi therefore tries to forget the world and to live in a state of abstraction, quite ignoring the use of any outward signs or ceremonies. [Mysticism.]

Suger, Abbot of St. Denis [b. near Omer, about 1081; d. at St. Denis, 1151]. Educated at St. Denis with Louis VI., as a councillor he became on Louis’s accession to the throne, he was made abbot in 1122, but did not assume the charge of the monastery till 1124, when, influenced by the religious reformation, he changed from a courtly to an ascetic. He continued to be a politician and statesman, and after the death of Louis VII. was made regent during the minority of Louis VII., and again during the Crusade of 1149. Suger’s aim was to consolidate the French monarchy as a Divinely appointed instrument to spread the truth of the faith, and he never abandoned the scheme, strongly opposed by feudal lords and others. Throughout his life he was the leading statesman of the French Government.

Suicerus, John Caspar [b. at Ziirich in 1520, d. 1584].—He went through a course of study at home, and then travelled through France, where in 1640 he made the acquaintance of Admiral Capelius and several eminent French Protestants at Montauban. On his return to Ziirich he devoted himself entirely to the study of the works of the Christian Fathers. He became famous as a philologist and a divine. His chief work was Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus Graecus, and he made very full annotations to the Nicene Creed.

Sumner, John Bird, Archbishop of Canterbury [b. at Kenilworth, 1780; d. at Adelacon, 1862].—He was educated at Cambridge, and became successively an assistant master at Eton, Rector of Mapledurham, and C. of Durham. His brother, Charles Rich, had meanwhile, through the almost unilith power of Lady Conyngham over George [See also the Tracts for the Times the two brothers drew themselves strongly to the opposite side, and the Bishop of Chester was regarded as the leader of the "Evangelical" party. In 1848, on the death of Archbishop Howley, Dr. Sumner was translated from Chester to Canterbury. He was not a learned man nor a powerful thinker, but he was everywhere recognised as a man of deep personal piety, and those who knew him best loved him. Probably the greatest flaw in his public life, in that of his brother, was nepotism. The relations of both prelates were all provided with rich Church preferments, and both bishops died wealthy. Archbishop Sumner's equinessence in the Gorham Judgment [q.v.] drew upon him a bitter attack from the then Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Philpotts, who declared that he had betrayed the doctrines which he was sworn to defend, and that he could never again hold communion with him. Both brothers set their faces against the revival of Convocation, but when at length the obstacles were removed, and Convocation resumed its sittings after more than century of silence, they both joined very heartily and usefully in its deliberations. Both bishops in their time were reckoned good preachers, but only occasional sermons of theirs have been published. Archbishop Sumner's best published work was Apostolic Teaching considered in an Examination of St. Paul's Epistles [1815], which went through many editions. His Practical Exposition of the New Testament [9 vols.], though marked by much piety and gentleness of spirit, is of little value to the student. His brother, the Bishop of Winchester, held the See till 1869, when he resigned it, but lived till 1873—"the last prince bishop," as he was styled, he incomes of the bishops being thenceforth much less than had been the case before the pontificate of the Ecclesiastical Commission.

Sunday. [Sabath.]

Sunday Schools, as a properly organised system, were founded in 1781 by Robert Raikes [q.v.], a printer of Gloucester, who formed the plan of collecting a few children from the streets on Sundays, and with the aid of teachers instructing them in religious knowledge. The improvement in the conduct and morals of the children was so marked that in 1783 Raikes published an account of his success in the Gloucester Journal, of which he was the editor; it was reprinted in the London papers, and the subject attracted much attention. The example of Raikes was followed in several towns, and in 1755 a society was formed for the establishment and maintenance of Sunday-schools in all parts of the kingdom, a large sum being expended in the payment of teachers. So great was the expense, that after Raikes's death many schools were closed for lack of funds, and hence originated the system of gratuitous instruction by teachers of a higher class than those who had been employed for the first schools. In 1803 the Sunday School Union [q.v. under Societies] was formed, to secure continuous instruction by unpaid teachers, and to publish books and tracts for the benefit of the cause. The first Sunday-schools united secular with religious instruction; but in later years the establishment of an organised system of week-day schools has removed the necessity of teaching reading and writing on Sundays. The Society of Friends have, however, retained the practice in their large Sunday morning schools, with great benefit as regards influence over the working classes above the age of childhood. [Friends.] Sunday-schools were introduced into Scotland, Ireland, and America in the years immediately following their establishment in England; the Scottish Society for Promoting Religious Instruction among the Poor was formed in 1796, and the Irish Sunday School Society was founded in 1809, though a system of Sunday teaching had prevailed for some years previously. In later times they have become general in connection with all Protestant Churches on the Continent, and in England the Roman Catholics have established numerous Sunday-schools. In the year 1853 it was ascertained that since the census of 1851 the children in the Sunday-schools of the Church of England had increased about 138 per cent., of the Methodists 136 per cent., of the Baptists 129 per cent. (and Congregationalists probably about the same, but no returns were made up); of the Presbyterians 313 per cent. (owing to previous neglect in Scotland), and of the Society of Friends 720 per cent. It is believed that in the schools of the United Kingdom there were in 1885 about 650,000 teachers and 6,000,000 scholars.

Superaltar [called also in the Roman Church Antinimium].—A portable altar which, having been consecrated, is put into a wooden frame. This name is wrongly applied to the re-table, a shelf put upon or behind the altar for the vases and cross.

Supererogation, Works of.—In the Roman Church, good works done beyond those which God absolutely requires for eternal salvation. The merit of all such works is gathered up, and may be given to those who have not done enough. This doctrine is defended by Matt. xix. 21, where, it is alleged, our Lord distinguishes between works necessary to eternal life, and works which make perfect. The Greek Church rejects this doctrine, and it is not mentioned in the Council of Trent, but is held by all Romanists. [In- dulgences.]
Superstition.—The error of those who, in their opinions of the causes on which the fate of man depends, believe or disbelieve without judgment or knowledge, and found upon their ideas the observance of unnecessary rites and observances. The word is derived from the Lat. superstes, "one who stands by," "a witness," and therefore signifies "standing beside any person or fact in stupid and helpless amazement." The well-known passage in the Authorised Version in which St. Paul addresses the Athenians as too superstitious (Acts xvii. 22) signifies literally "more fearful of the gods than others." The word was applied to those who consulted soothsayers or believed in omens, or were terrified at eclipses. Probably the Apostle used the word with the intention of showing the philosophers on Mars Hill that the religion which he preached was not one of blindness and ignorance like that of the unreasoning multitude, but was founded on reason. "Superstition" was a word applied by three heathen writers of the Apostolic times—Tertullian, Plutarch, and Pliny—to Christianity; and as Cardinal Newman shows, they meant by it a belief in an unseen Lord who takes strict account of sinful deeds [Essay on Development, p. 229.]

Supplication.—The Litany is sometimes known by the name of the General Supplication. In the days of the early Christian Church it was appointed to be used at times of great persecution and distress. These immediate dangers no longer threaten us, but it was deemed appropriate, at the time of the compilation of the Prayer Book, to retain this ancient service on account of the many dangers and evils to which we must always be exposed in this life.

Supralapsarians [Lat. supra lapisum, "before the fall"]).—The name given to those Calvinists who hold that God, independently of the good or evil works of man, pre-ordained the fall by an absolute decree. This doctrine was held by Calvin and Beza, to whom the name Supralapsarians was given at the Synod of Dort by the Arminians, or Infra-lapsarians [q.v.]. It was excluded from all Reformed confessions, as implying that God is the author of sin.

Dr. Gill gives us the following account of Supralapsarians:—"Of these, some are of opinion that man was considered as to be created or creatable, and others as created not fallen. The former seems best, that, of the vast number of individuals which came up in the Divine mind whom His power could create, those whom He meant to bring into being He designed to glorify Himself by them in some way or other. The decree of election respecting any part of them may be distinguished into the decree of the end and the decree of the means. The decree of the end respecting some is either subordinate to their eternal happiness, or ultimate, which more properly the end, the glory of God and if both are put together, it is a state everlasting communion with God, for glorifying of the riches of His grace. The decree of the means includes the decree of create men, to permit them to fall, to receive them out of it through redemption by Christ to sanctify them by the grace of the Spirit and completely save them; and which is not to be reckoned as materially many decrees, but as making one formal decree; they are not to be considered as subordinata but as co-ordinate means, and as making one entire medium: for it is not supposed that God decreed to create man, that might permit him to fall, in order to redeem the.He decreed this that He might glorify His grace, mercy and justice. And in this way of considering the decrees of God, they think that they sufficiently obviate and remove the slanderous calumny cast upon them with respect to the other branch of Predestination, which leaves men in the same state when others are chosen and that for the glory of God. Whi calumny is that, according to them, God must man to damn him; whereas, according to their real sentiments, God decreed to make man, and make man neither to damn him nor save him, but for His own glory, which end answered in them some way or other. And they argue that the end is first in view before the means, and the decree of the end is, order of nature, before the decree of the means and what is first in intention is last in execution. Now, as the glory of God is last execution, it must be first in intention wherefore men must be considered in the decree of the end as not yet created a fallen; since the creation and permission of the sin belong to the decree of the means, while in order of nature, is after the decree of the end. And they add to this, that if God first decreed to create man, and to suffer him to fall, and then out of the fall chose some grace and glory, He must decree to create man without an end, which is to make God to do what no wise man would; for when man is about to do anything, he proposes an end, and then contrives and fixes on ways and means to bring about that end. They think also that this way of conceiving and speaking of these things best expresses the sovereignty of God in them, as declared in the 9th of Romans, where He is said to will such and such things, for no other reason but because He wills them.

"The opponents of this doctrine consider however, that it is attended with insuperable difficulties. We demand, say they, an explanation of what they mean by this principle: 'God hath made all things for His glory. If they mean that justice requires a creature to devote himself to the worship and glorifying of his Creator, we grant it; if they mean..."
hat the attributes of God are displayed in all His works, we grant this too: but if the proposition be intended to affirm that God had no other view in creating men, so to peak, than His own interests, we deny the proposition, and affirm that God created men or their own happiness, and in order to have subjects upon whom to bestow favours.

"We desire to be informed, in the next place, say they, how it can be conceived that a determination to damn millions of men can contribute to the glory of God. We easily conceive that it is for the glory of Divine justice to punish guilty men; but to resolve a damn men without the consideration of in, to create them that they might sin, to determine that they should sin in order to heir destruction, is what seems to us more likely to tarnish the glory of God than to display it.

"Again; we demand how, according to this hypothesis, it can be conceived that God is not the author of sin? In the general scheme of our Churches, God only permits men to in, and it is the abuse of liberty that plunges nan into misery; even this principle, all enified as it seems, is yet subject to a great number of difficulties; but in this scheme, God wills sin to produce the end He proposed a creating the world, and it was necessary that men should sin: God created them for hat. If this be not to make God the author of sin, we must renounce the most distinct and clear ideas.

"Again; we require them to reconcile this system with many express declarations of Scripture, which inform us that God would have all men to be saved. How doth it agree with such pressing entreaties, such cutting eproofs, such tender expostulations, as God discovers in regard to the unconverted? Matt. xxiii. 37.

"Lastly, we desire to know how is it possible to conceive a God who, being in the enjoyment of perfect happiness, incomprehensible and supreme, could determine to add this decree, though useless to His felicity, to create men without number for the purpose of confining them for ever in the chains of darkness, and burning them for ever in inquenchable flames?" [Gill's Body of Divinity, vol. i., p. 299.]

Supremacy, Papal. [PAPAL POWER, GROWTH OF.]

Surcingle. — A belt worn by some English clergy to fasten the cassock round his waist.

Sureties. — A name used for SPONSORS [i.e., We find it in the Prayer Book, both in the Baptismal Service, "Forasmuch as this child hath promised by you, his sureties, to renounce he devil and all his works," etc.; and in the Catechism, "Because they promise them both by their sureties." They are so called because they assure to the child baptised the benefit of that spiritual instruction required by the Church, preparatory to the ratification of his baptismal vows at confirmation.

Surplice [derived from the Latin word superpellicium, "over-garment"]. — It is a white garment worn by the clergy since the twelfth century at all services of the Church; and later it has been used by any actually engaged in that service. The white garment is supposed to be the emblem of the light and purity of the Gospel. In the churches of Denmark and Sweden it is worn only for the celebration of the Communion.

Sursum Corda ["Lift up your hearts"]. — The exhortation to the priest to the people in the Eucharistic office, which is followed by the response, "We lift them up unto the Lord." It is the opening sentence of what is called "The Preface," a portion of the office which is found almost word for word in all the Liturgies which have come down to us.

Susanna, Sr. — St. Susanna is said to have been the niece of Pope Caius. The emperor Diocletian wished her to marry his son, but she had made a vow of virginity, and refused to marry: so he ordered that she should be immediately executed. She is supposed to have suffered in the year 295. Her festival is August 11th. A famous church in Rome has borne her name since the fifth century, and gives a title to a cardinal-priest.

Suspension. — A clergyman, being judged guilty of any crime, is liable to suspension either of office or salary, according to the decision of the bishop. We find notices of the practice in the history of early Christian times, and it has lasted with various modifications to our own day.

Sutton, Christopher [b. in Hampshire in 1565, d. in 1629]. — He was educated first at Hart Hall, Oxford, and afterwards at Lincoln College, where he graduated in 1589. After holding several livings he was made Prebendary of Westminster, and afterwards of Lincoln. His chief works were: Disce Mori, Disce Viverae, and Godly Meditations upon the most Holy Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

Swabia, House of. [HOHENSTAUFEN.]

Sweden, Church over. — The date of the conversion of the Swedes to Christianity is uncertain, but probably it was about the year 830, through the preaching of Angar, a monk of Westphalia. At first his labours, and those of his followers, were attended with little success; but in the reign of Olaf Skottkonung, the Anglo-Saxon Siegfried and some monks came from England and converted the people, and Sweden became a Christian State in 1026. In the reign of Eric the Saint the first monasteries were founded [1150-60]. In 1163 the Archbishopric of Upsala was established. Still Paganism lingered in Sweden; in fact, the greater part of the country remained Pagan till the middle of the thirteenth century. The Roman Catholic religion took firm root in Sweden, but in 1524 the King, Gustavus I., was very desirous of setting on foot the Reformation teaching in his dominions, though possibly induced by a political rather than a religious motive. He sent to Germany for missionaries, and several returned with the embassy, the most energetic being Olaf Petri, who soon translated the Bible into the Swedish language. As soon as the new doctrines had gained firm hold on the affections of the people, the King set to work to despoil the Roman Church, and seize the revenues for himself. All the Roman Catholic clergy, who naturally objected to these proceedings, were ejected from their livings, and Lutherans put in their place. In the course of two years the whole country became Lutheran, taking as their groundwork of faith the Confession of Augsburg. [Reformation, page 878.] But it was not to be expected that the people would be willing to give up all their rites and ceremonies in an instant at the command of the King, and many Roman customs prevailed in the Lutheran service long after their disappearance in other Protestant countries. Even at the present day the clergy wear coloured vestments, and wafer bread is used at the Communion, which is commonly called hög mässa ["high mass"]. After the Peace of Westphalia the whole country seemed to sink into a state of total indifference to religion, and when an attempt was made by the Pictists of Germany to rouse the people, the movement was not only treated with contempt, but laws were actually passed [1713 and 1726] forbidding them to hold services—the clergy of Sweden, too, upholding this course adopted by the Government. There is such an intimate connection between the Church and the secular power, that Church discipline is completely overborne by civil statutes. For instance, every person who has been confirmed is obliged by law to go to the Communion once a year; every child must be baptised within eight days after its birth, without any reference to the wishes of the parents on the subject. The government differs from that of the Lutheran Church of Germany in that it is Episcopal. They have one Archbishop and eleven Bishops, but the King is always called, and looked upon, as the head of the Church. There is a bishop's court which manages everything both with regard to patronage and ritual. In some cases this court has absolute power in the appointment of benefices, in others the parishioners nominally have a voice, but the court is so arbitrary, and restricts their choice so much, that the privilege is virtually of no use. The rules concerning the ritual of the Church are also very strict. The minister may utter no extemporary prayer, and may not preach on any other text than those provided either in the Epistle or Gospel for the day, as is also the case in some parts of Germany. Religious feeling is almost dead, though of late years there has been an attempt made at revival, and in the north especially thousands have separated themselves from the Established Church. They have set up pastors, and carry on services as well as they can in face of the bitter persecution to which they are subjected. The theological students at the two Universities of Upsala and Lund have consequently greatly decreased.

Swedenborg.—Emanuel Swedenborg, the founder of the body of Christians called after his name, was born at Stockholm, 1688, and died in London, 1772. His father was Bishop of Skara, in West Gothland, and much esteemed by Charles XII. Emanuel was sent to the University of Upsala, where he distinguished himself in physics and mathematics. For some years he held the office of Assessor at the Metallic College, which he retained under Charles's successor, Ulrica Eleonora, who, recognition of his great talents, gave him patent of nobility in 1719. He still spent much time at his favourite studies, and in 1745 completed his Opera Philosophica et Mineralia 3 vols. The first volume treats of the elementary world, and the two latter of the mineral kingdom. His next work was Philosophy of the Infinite. In 1745 he gave up secular pursuits and his official duties, believing himself called in a miraculous manner to a holy office, which he thus himself describes:—"I have been called to holy office by the Lord Himself, who graciously manifested Himself before me, servant, in the year 1745, and then opened my sight into the spiritual world, and gave me to speak with spirits and angels, as if even to this day. From that time I beg to publish the many arcana which I have either seen, or which have been revealed to me, concerning heaven and hell, concerning the state of man after death, concerning true Divine worship, and concerning the spiritual sense of the Word, besides other things of the highest importance, conducive to salvation and wisdom." He says he permitted several times to enter heaven, and describes the abodes of bliss as "arranged streets and squares like earthly cities, with fields and gardens interposed." Of angels he writes:—"From all my experience which has now continued for several years I can say and affirm that angels, as to their form, are altogether men;" and elsewhere he affirms that they marry as mankind. He also gives an account of a Council of Angels:—"There was shown to me a magnificent palace, with a temple in its midst, and in the midst of the temple was a table of gold, on which lay the Word and two angels stood beside it. About the table were three rows of seats; the seats of the first row were covered with s
The writings of Swedenborg are held by his followers to contain the true exposition of Scripture as revealed to him by a special illumination from the Lord.

Amongst his chief doctrines are that the Last Judgment has already taken place (in 1757), that the "New Jerusalem" has come in the form of the "New Church," and that the power and glory of Christ as shown in this New Church is spiritually His second coming. Of the Trinity he held and expressed views resembling those of Sabellius. He rejects the doctrine of justification by faith alone, and says, "To fear God and to work righteousness is to have charity; and whoever has charity, whatever his religious sentiments may be, will be saved." The resurrection is to be that of a spiritual body only, which will pass at first into a state of purgatory, where the good will be fitted for heaven, and the bad, having rejected all truth, will be utterly lost. His system is remarkable further for the prominence and permanence which it assigns to the relation of the sexes.

The last twenty-seven years of Swedenborg's life were spent in writing and publishing his books, which were mostly printed in Amsterdam. He does not seem to have anticipated the immediate formation of a separate Church, and therefore did not discover himself from the Lutherans. He died in Great Bath Street, Coldbath Fields, on March 29th, 1772, and was buried in the Swedish Church in Ratcliffe Highway.

For the history of the sect of Swedenborgians after their founder's death see New Jerusalem Church.

Swithun, Sr., Bishop and patron saint of Winchester.—Very little is known of the early days of this saint, but that he was educated and brought up in the city of Winchester, of which See he afterwards became bishop. He was the chief adviser of King Egbert (the first King of all England), who so respected him for his learning and piety that he entrusted him with the education of his eldest son, Ethelwulf. On the death of Helmut, Bishop of Winchester, in 852, Ethelwulf appointed Swithun, who was now prior of his monastery, to be his successor, and he was consecrated by Ceolnoth, Archbishop of Canterbury. He worked day and night for the good of his diocese, affecting great simplicity of life, even journeying about from place to place on foot. In 854, at a council held at Winchester, Swithun persuaded the King, in consequence of the increasing number of the clergy, the formation of new parishes and the building of new churches, to grant the tithes, or tenth part of his land throughout the country, to the Church, free from all taxation, and Ethelwulf took this charter himself to Rome for the approval and confirmation of the Pope.
Swithin died July 2nd, 862, and was buried in the churchyard of the cathedral, according to his wish, "where the rain of heaven might fall on him." It is said that in 971 the monks of Winchester, thinking it more honour to their master that he should be buried within the walls of the building, resolved to move his body, but that when they began, July 15th (St. Swithin's Day), the rain came down in such torrents that they were obliged to wait, and that it continued raining for forty days. Hence the common saying amongst us that if rain falls on St. Swithin's Day we may expect it to continue for forty days. In 1093, when the cathedral restoration was finished by Bishop Walkelin, the relics of St. Swithin were translated with great pomp from their former resting-place to the new church.

Syllabus, The Papal.—A list of heresies condemned by Pope Pius IX. in 1864, the number of which amounts to eighty, probably in imitation of the eighty heresies mentioned by Epiphanius as existing in the first three centuries. Its name in full is A Syllabus containing the Principal Errors of our Times, which are noted in the Consistorial Allocutions, in the Enquiries, and in other Apostolical Letters of our most Holy Lord, Pope Pius IX. Many of the errors condemned are those rejected also by the Church of England and all orthodox Protestants, while other points attacked are some of the chief tenets of Anglican divinity. The syllabus is divided into ten sections, and attacks Rationalism, Pantheism, Latitudinarianism, Socialism, errors concerning the Church, society, natural and Christian ethics, marriage, the power of the Pope, and modern Liberalism. At the same time all the doctrines of Romanism are upheld, the infallibility of the Pope and of the Roman Church, and a protest is made against progress, and against any departure from established customs. The Syllabus, like all other documents put forth by the Pope, claims to be infallible, and as such has been firmly opposed by all members of Protestant communions.

Sylvester, Pope. [Popes.]

Symbol [Gr. symbolon, "that which is thrown together with "].—This word is used to denote a sign or emblem. Thus in the Christian Church, Baptism and the Lord's Supper are symbols, or visible signs of an invisible salvation. In a stricter sense of the word, the sign of the cross is a symbol. There are also symbolic attributes, by which artists distinguish the various evangelists, etc. The name "symbol" was also formerly given in the Church to creeds and confessions of faith, and particularly to the Apostles' Creed, probably because it was used in times of persecution as a watchword or mark by which Christians were distinguished from all others.

Symphorosa, Sr.—Her husband, Getulius, having suffered under Hadrian's persecution, she determined to live in retirement, and devote herself to the education of her seven sons. But before long she was disturbed. The Emperor had built a magnificent palace on the banks of the Tiber, and resolved to dedicate it solemnly to the gods, so he demanded by an oracle what was the will of the gods, and the answer was that nothing could please them so long as Symphorosa and her sons were allowed to remain Christians. He ordered that they should be brought before him, and commanded them to offer sacrifice. On their refusal, his order was that the mother should be severely beaten in the Temple of Hercules, and then hung up by her hair till she died; but as these torments failed to shake her constancy, a stone was tied to her neck and she was drowned in the Tiber. Seven posts were then erected in the same templo to which her sons were tied, and on which their limbs were stretched and dislocated, as they were despatched in various manners. The date of their martyrdom is uncertain, but it was about the year 120.

Synagogue [derived from the Greek word synagō, "to assemble"] is the name of an ordinary Jewish place of worship. Synagogues do not seem to have existed before the Captivity; till then the Tabernacle or Temple had been the only sacred buildings recognised by the Jews. This may be accounted for in various ways, but notably because in those days copies of the Law were very scarce, and it is a common saying that where there is no Law there cannot possibly be a synagogue. But after the return of Jews these places of worship increased rapidly—in fact, in the time of the Maccabees there were as many as 480 in Jerusalem. Services held in them then, as now, consisted almost entirely of the reading of the Law read first in Hebrew and then translated. The people were by an interpreter standing in the midst reading, with interspersed forms of prayer, also in Hebrew. Services are generally held on Monday evening, Friday evening, and Saturday in some places on Thursday as well, and interior arrangements of the Synagogue were very simple. The walls were whitewashed and covered with texts of Scripture. The stands in the middle, and is enclosed by rail in a space large enough to hold three or four persons, and beyond it stands the ark the covenant, which contains the copies of Law. All the congregation sit so as to face the ark. The Law may be read and expounded by any one, females alone excepted.

Synaxarion.—The name of an ecclesiastical book of the Greeks, which contains a brief collection of the lives of the saints, a short explanation of each festival and 1 day. It is printed both in the language he learned, and also in the so-called vulgar greek for the use of the common people.

Synecellus.—In the course of the history of the Church, this term has had several significations. At first it was the name given to any monk who shared a cell with another. Later on it became the custom for the bishop of a province, or the abbot of a monastery, to have one of the lower orders in constant attendance on him day and night, and this attendant was generally called the Synecellus. It is not easy to trace how the term got its next application—that of designating an ecclesiastical dignitary. Most probably at first the Synecelli were merely what we should call chaplains; but when it became the custom for none to succeed their masters, they kept their former names, and thus the highest dignities, especially of the Greek Church, were generally called Synecelli. At one time there were a great many attached to the Church of St. Sophia at Constantinople, but these were afterwards reduced to two. The rank of these, however, was one of the highest in the church, for they stood immediately below the patriarch, taking precedence of the Metropolitan Archbishops.

Syncretism.—The attempt to reconcile discordant views, particularly those relating to religion. It is supposed to take its name from the island of Crete, the inhabitants of which, says Plutarch, endeavoured to protect themselves from attacks from without by compacts between themselves—though these compacts were never respected in time of peace. At the time of the Reformation the protestant parties of all countries were called upon to unite in opposing the Roman See, and the name became applied to those who proved to sink all minor differences in this case. In the sixteenth century, when the study of ancient literature was revived in Italy, the philosophy of Plato was more favoured by some than that of Aristotle; but her scholars, such as Francis Pico and Bes-rion, although they admired Plato, were unwilling to give up entirely the study of Aristotle. These received the name of Syncretists probably in this case derived from a Greek word meaning "to mix." The word again came to general use, particularly in Germany, the beginning of the seventeenth century, when George Calixtus, professor of theology at Helmstadt, advocated the union of all religious parties; but as the two great parties that country, the Lutherans and the Reformed, have been separated since the time of Luther, and union between the two is regarded with horror by the deepest thinkers on both sides, it may be understood that Calixtus's scheme, which united not only these two, but all religious parties, was treated with contempt. From that time the name Syncretist has been one of odium.

Synergists [Gr. synergetes, "co-operation"].—A name given to some German divines of the sixteenth century, who held that the co-operation of man was needed in the work of renovation in addition to the grace of God. This was first stated by Melanchthon in opposition to Luther, who in his De Servo Arbitrio [1524] strongly maintained justification by faith alone. But before his death his views became modified, and he had partially adopted the doctrine of free-will and of good works. These views were explained by Pfeiffer, Professor of Leipzig, who, with his followers, received the name of Synergists from Amsdorff and others, who opposed them. In 1560 the "Synergistic controversy" was at its height, the leaders being Victorin Strigel, a pupil of Melanchthon, and Matthias Flacius Illyricus, both of whom were professors at Jena. The discussion took place at Weimar. The Duke of Saxony favoured Strigel, but the latter refused to sign a paper drawn up by Flacius's party, and fled to Leipzig, refusing to return to Jena in spite of all overtures of friendship. Three disciples of Melanchthon were called to Jena, but on the accession of a new duke in 1567 these were turned out, and Flacius took their place. Gradually the Synergists became absorbed in the Majorists. [Major, George.]

Synesius, Bishop of Ptolemais, or Cyrene, born about 375, formerly a disciple of the celebrated Hypatia of Alexandria, and a believer in the Platonic philosophy. He became a convert to Christianity and was baptised. In 398 he was sent to Constantinople, and was ordained priest, and in 410 chosen Bishop of Ptolemais, and consecrated by Theophilus of Alexandria. He was very unwilling to accept the post, urging that he held some views which were not orthodox, and that he was married and did not wish to be separated from his wife; but his arguments were overruled, and his wife was allowed to live with him. The date of his death is not known, but it was probably about 414. His works were edited by Dionysius Petavius, at Paris, and contain 165 epistles, a treatise De Regno, etc.

Synod.—A synod is generally understood as being the same as a Council [q.v.], but Brande gives the following distinction, that a Council is a general assembly of the episcopal, provincial, or national order, while a synod is a convention of the inferior clergy of a diocese under its bishop or archdeacon.

Synodals.—This word is used in two senses:—[1] For the constitutions made in diocesan synods, which were formerly read in the churches on Sundays; [2] for a small payment reserved by the Bishop when he settled the revenues of a church upon the incumbent. This word must be derived from synod, and it is supposed that the custom of synodals originated in a duty paid by the clergy when attending synods.
Syrian Catholics.—The name given to converts to the Roman Church from the sect of the Syrian Jacobites, the followers of Jacob, a Eutychian. The conversions began about two centuries and a half ago, when Jesuits went to Aleppo, and persuaded the Jacobite clergy to seek reunion with Rome. They secured for themselves the right to retain certain ancient characteristic observances of their own, which the Roman Church is generally ready to grant so long as submission to the Pope is unreservedly given. Their ecclesiastical chief, who was present at the Vatican Council, is the Patriarch of Antioch, who also administers the affairs of the See of Jerusalem. Under him are eleven dioceses. In 1840 the number of Catholics belonging to the Syrian rite was reckoned at 30,000, and it is said to have recently considerably increased.

Tabernacle.—Another name for Bal-dacchino [q.v.].

Taborites. [Bohemia.]

Tai-ping.—A recent sect among the Chinese, founded by Hung-sew-tscuen, a man of humble birth, who had unsuccessfully sought Government employment. Some Christian tracts which came into his hands caused him to renounce idolatry, and then he pretended to have visions from a man whom he chose to identify with Christ, who commanded him to root out the Tartars and establish a new kingdom of Tai-ping, or Universal Peace. In 1840 he gathered together a number of followers and proceeded to uproot idolatry. He took on himself the name of Heavenly Prince, and declared himself to be equal with Christ in power on the earth. His followers he called “God-worshippers,” and he made five of them princes with himself. In 1850 they fought against the Government, and succeeded in taking Nankin, and made further conquests, but they were repulsed at Shanghai, in 1860, by the English and French, and though they afterwards rebelled many times, they were finally suppressed by General Gordon. Their religion was a mixture of Chinese and Christian; polygamy was allowed, and while they adopted baptism, they rejected the Lord’s Supper.

Tait, Archibald Campbell, D.D., Archbishop of Canterbury [b. 1811, d. 1882], was the first Scotchman who ever attained that position. He was born in Clackmannanshire, educated at Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Oxford, became tutor of his college (Balliol), and did much to raise that college to the high place in the University which it has ever since occupied. He made a great mark when, in 1841, he drew up a remonstrance, in which three other tutors joined him, against the Tracts for Times, which led to the series being stopped. In 1842 he became head-master of Rugby School, and in 1849 Dean of Carlisle. During his tenure of the last-named office he was the most active member of the Oxford University Commission, appointed by the Governor of Lord J. Russell. In 1856 he was made Bishop of London, when he threw himself with his usual energy and organising power into the work of his diocese, and established the Bishop of London’s Fund for the evangelisation of the vast masses of population which had hitherto been untouched by religious influence. He preached indefatigably, and in 1866, on an outbreak of cholera visited the infected districts with his wit and carried away the orphaned children, and established them in an orphanage. In 1869 he was made Archbishop of Canterbury, at common consent was the most powerful holder of the Primatial See for many generations. It is also agreed that he did work incalculable value, and which probably no other man could have done, in preserving peace in the Church amidst controversies and movements of unusual heat and fervour. The act of his Primacy which called for the most criticism was the Public Worship Regulation Act, the opposition to while the difficulties which it caused, led him to move for a Royal Commission to consider the working of the Ecclesiastical Court. Unhappily his death occurred before the Commission could make its report. He was greatly beloved by all who knew him, those who disagreed with his opinions included. He was the author of many reviews and sermons, and of Charges, as well as of a volume, Dangers and Safeguards of Modern Theology. His logical power made him an acute and powerful controversialist, especially against scepticism and unbelief. For theology, in the stricter sense of the word, his training was not suited to “he was made for governing rather than teaching,” said his most intimate companion. His views may be termed Broad Evangelicals in politics he was a Whig, becoming more Conservative as he grew older. His only daughter died in 1878; he left three daughters.

Talmud [from the Hebrew, lamad, “has learned;” “doctrine”].—It signifies among the modern Jews an enormous collection of traditions, illustrative of their laws and usages, forming twelve folio volumes. The are two works which bear this name — the Mishna, which is the text, and the Talmud, or commentary. The Mishna, Second Law, is a collection of Rabbinical rules and precepts, made in the second century.
a somewhat coarse style, but the Mishna is much purer. The language of the Talmud is Aramaic or Chaldee, and is without vowel-points, and abounds in abbreviations. The Mishna was first printed at Naples, 1492; the Talmud of Jerusalem at Venice about 1523; the Babylonian Talmud, which is four times as large, at Venice about 1520. It has been translated into Latin, and is also published in most of the European languages.

Tanquelin or Tanchelm.—A native of the Netherlands who, in 1115, excited great commotion in Antwerp and drew after him a numerous sect. He is said to have proclaimed that he was God, and, though a layman, celebrated the Mass and held a public celebration in honour of his espousals with the Virgin Mary. He had imbibed the opinions and spirit of the Mystics; he treated with contempt the external worship of God, the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper and the rite of baptism, and held clandestine assemblies to propagate more effectually his visionary notions. But besides this, he inveighed against the clergy, and declaimed against their vices with vehemence and intrepidity, and it is quite possible that the blasphemies attributed to him were false charges by a vindictive priesthood. He stayed some time in Utrecht, and then went to Antwerp, where he was slain by a priest in 1124 or 1125. His followers maintained his doctrines for some time after his death, but were brought back to the Church by St. Norbert. Mosheim seems to consider him rather as a mystic, and it is very possible that the other charges against him may have been grossly exaggerated by the Roman clergy, as in other cases.

Taoism or Taouism.—One of the three religions of China. Its founder, Laotse, lived, according to tradition, six hundred years before Christ. Tao is a word meaning "way," and so far as the mystical teaching can now be understood, it would seem that Tao represented the course which Laotse thought a man should pursue in order to overcome evil. The whole teaching was vague and unsatisfactory; but its followers made an advance on those that had preceded them, by believing firmly that ultimately good would gain the victory over evil. The head of the body was a sort of patriarch, who had the power of transmitting his dignity and office to a member of his own family, and the descendants of the first are said to have held the office for centuries. They attributed to their Tao, whom they regarded as the first being of the universe, various qualities, such as eternity and invisibility; but they do not seem to have regarded him as being in any way able to assist or comfort his followers. All they had to do was to contemplate him and his virtues—and to strive to keep in the Way. When Buddhism [q.v.] appeared, which offered something more tangible, both Taoism and Forism [q.v.] to a great extent disappeared, though some traces of the teaching of both are still to be found in Chinese theological books.

Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople [b. about the middle of the eighth century; d. 806].—He was of patrician birth, and was made Secretary of State during the reign of Constantine and Irene; the Empress favoured him because he practised image-worship, and upon the resignation of the Patriarch Paul in 781 she appointed Tarasius his successor. He was a layman, but a general council was called which agreed to recognise him as Patriarch, and to settle at the same time the disputes which had led to the resignation of his predecessor. A synodal letter was sent to Pope Adrian to urge him to accept Tarasius, and his consent being gained, a council was held, first at Constantinople in 785, and afterwards at Nicaea in 787, by which it was decreed that image-worship should be restored in the Greek Church.

Targum.—A name given to the Chaldee paraphrases of the books of the Old Testament. They are called paraphrases because they are rather comments than literal translations. During the Babylonish exile, Chaldee became more familiar to the Jews than Hebrew, so that when the Hebrew text was read in the synagogue, it was often followed by an exposition in Chaldee. It is probable that this was the case even in the time of Ezra, since, in reading the Law to the people in the Temple, he explained it to make it understood by the people [Neh. viii. 7–9]. Though the custom of, making these explanations was a very ancient one with the Jews, they had no written Targums before the era of Onkelos and Jonathan, who lived about the time of our Saviour. Onkelos is said to have been the friend of the elder Gamaliel; his Targum is the most esteemed of all, and copies are to be found in which it is inserted verse for verse with the Hebrew; it is short and simple, and in style approaches nearly to the purity of the Chaldee as it is found in Ezra and in Daniel. It is a paraphrase of the Pentateuch only. There are two other Targums on the Pentateuch, one by Jonathan ben Uzzziel, and the Targum Jerusalmi; but they are both recensions of that by Onkelos. Another Jonathan wrote a Targum on the greater and lesser prophets, and he is much more diffuse than Onkelos, running often into an allegorical style. The Targum of the Rabbi Joseph the Blind is upon the Hagiographa [q.v.]. He has written on the Psalms, Job, the Prophets, the Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, and Esther; his style is a corrupt Chaldee, with a mixture of words from foreign languages, and therefore his Targum is the least esteemed. The Targum Jerusalmi seems to be merely a fragment of some ancient paraphrase now lost; even the Pentateuch is not complete. The only Targum on Daniel is a Persian version supposed to belong to the twelfth century. These Targums were first printed at the close of the fifteenth century. They were published in Buxtorf's Hebrew Bible at Basle in 1610.

Tate, Nahum [b. in Dublin, 1652; d. in London, 1715], a poet and dramatist. He became Poet-Laureate in 1690. He was improvident and intemperate, and too sanctimonious as a debtor in the precincts of the Mint, at Southwark, where he died. We mention him here as the joint composer, with Dr. Nicholas Brady, of the Metrical Version of the Psalms, which till recently was bound up with the Common Prayer Book in place of the older version by Sternhold and Hopkins. The first twenty Psalms were published in 1685, and followed by a New Version of the Psalms of David, Fitted to the Tunes used in the Churches, by N. Tate and N. Brad [London, 1698].

Tatian.—A heresiarch of the second century, a Syrian and disciple of Justi Martyr. He was at first looked on as a model of eminent piety and great learning, while he used in the service of Christianity. But after the death of Justin he left Rome and returned to the East, where he opened a school in Mesopotamia; here he fell into the errors of the Marcionites and Valentinians. He afterwards became the leader of the Encratites. He wrote an apology for Christianity, entitled an Address to the Greeks, which usually printed with Justin's works; and besides this he composed a harmony of the four Gospels, called Diatessaron [q.v.], from which he omitted the proofs of Christ's humanity.

Tauler, John [b. 1290, d. 1361], a famous German mystical divine, was born and died at Strasburg. He entered the Dominical Order about 1308, and distinguished himself in the study of scholastic philosophy, especially of mystical divinity; he was called the "Illuminated Divine." He studied for a time in Paris, and on his return to Strasburg took to preaching. He was possessed of great eloquence, and was esteemed one of the best preachers of his age; his sermons were written in Latin, but delivered in German. He harangued against the vices of the time with plainness and zeal, and thus incurred the displeasure of the monks. He did not spare the Pope, and though he had done good work amongst the sufferers whilst the Black Death was raging, his bishop forbade his preaching, and he had to remove to Cologne. Little more is known of his life; he returned to his native city to die. He was a man of great integrity and purity of life. The most celebrated of his devotional works is Nachfolge des armen Lebens Christi. Two sermons have been translated into modern German, and some editions of them were printed in 1498 and 1580. His early sermons are more metaphysical, the later ones simp...
Taylor, Isaac [b. at Lavenham, Suffolk, 157; d. at Stamford Rivers, Essex, 1665].—An amiable lay religious essayist and controversialist, the son of an Independent minister of the same name, brother of Charles Taylor, he edited Calmet’s Dictionary of the Bible, and of Jane Taylor, the author of Hymns for Infant Minds and Contributions of Q. Q.
For a time Isaac Taylor followed his father’s vocation of engraver and artist, and he invented a machine for engraving illustrations and for printing patterns on calico from rollers. But he soon adopted a literary career, his first publication being a translation of Herodotus. Among his works are Natural History of Enthusiasm, Natural History of Anarchism, and Spiritual Despotism, three popular and original works; History of a Transmission of Ancient Books to Modern Times; The Process of Historical Proof; The Physical Theory of Another Life; The Restoration of Belief, etc. When the Tractarian movement began at Oxford, he wrote a book warning the unlearned against trusting too much to the practices and authority of the early Church; this he called Ancient Christian and the Doctrines of the Oxford Sects for the Times; it shows considerable learning and power of argument. In his later years he joined the Church of England, and at this period wrote a reply to Olenso, called Considerations on the Tenets; also Wesley and Methodism, Loyola and Spiritism, many essays, reviews, etc., etc.

Taylor, Jeremy.—One of the greatest divines in the Anglican Church, and perhaps greatest preacher [b. at Cambridge, 1613; d. 1667]. He was the son of a barber. His education was commenced at Perse’s Grammar School at Cambridge; in his fourteenth year he entered Caius College as a sizar, and when more than twenty years of age took his M.A., and was admitted to holy orders. He attracted the notice of Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, before whom he preached at ambeth, and by whose influence he obtained Fellowship at All Souls’, Oxford, in 1636. About the same time he was made Chaplain Ordinary to the King, and in 1638 Junxon, Bishop of London, presented him to the rectory of Uppingham. Soon after he formed, together with Laud, the acquaintance of Francis à Sancta Clara, a learned Franciscan friar, and is exposed him to the accusation of being at heart attached to the Roman Church, a charge which his love of splendid ceremonial and poetic turn of mind lent plausibility; he, however, at a later period solemnly denied the truth of the assertion. Taylor’s first notable publication, Episcopacy Asserted, gained for him D.D. in 1642; during the next three years he accompanied the Royal army in the Civil Wars, but his living being sequestrated by the Parliament after the defeat of the Royalists, he retired to Newton in Carmarthenshire, where, with Wyatt of St. John’s College (afterwards Prebendary of Lincoln) and Nicholson (afterwards Bishop of Gloucester), he opened a school. The Earl of Carbery, who lived in the same county, appointed Taylor his domestic chaplain. During the next thirteen years his greatest works appeared; in 1647 he published his Discourse of the Liberty of Prophecying, with its just Limits and Temper; showing the unreasonableness of prescribing to other men’s faith, and the iniquity of persecuting differing opinions; in 1650 the Life of Christ and The Rule and Exercises of Holy Living; in 1651 The Rule and Exercises of Holy Dying, some sermons, and the Discourse of the Divine Institution, Necessity and Sacredness of the Office Ministerial; in 1652 a Discourse on Baptism, its Institution and Efficacy upon all Believers; in 1653 some additional sermons; in 1654 The Real Presence and Spiritual of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament; in 1655 the Guide of Infant Devotion, or the Golden Grove, and the Unam Necessarium, or the Doctrine and Practice of Repentance; in 1657 a Collection of Polemical and Moral Discourses, etc.; and in 1660 his famous Insector Dubitarianum, or the Rule of Conscience in all her General Measures. He went to London for the purpose of publishing this last, and there signed the declaration of the Royalists on April 24th, and was thus brought under the favourable notice of Charles II., who at the close of the year made him Bishop of Down and Connor. He was consecrated in January, 1661, and a month later made a member of the Irish Privy Council; the following month the small See of Dromore was also entrusted to him, and before the end of the year he was elected Vice-Chancellor of the University of Dublin. Taylor was not happy in his preferments, which were attended by great and peculiar difficulties, owing to the revolution thorough which religion had passed. The Protestant or Episcopal religion was very unpopular in Ireland: the services were in English, which the native population could not understand, and though the bishop laboured zealously he met with little success. He was attacked by fever at Lisburn, and died on Aug. 13th, 1667, at the age of fifty-five. Jeremy Taylor has sometimes been called the modern Chrysostom, on account of his golden eloquence. The character of his mind fitted him to write with the greatest success on devotional subjects, and of this power Bishop Heber thus speaks:—

“Whether he describes the duties, or dangers, or hopes of man, or the mercy, power, and justice of the Most High; whether he exhorts or instructs his brethren, or offers up his supplications in their behalf to the common Father of all, his conceptions and his expressions belong to the loftiest and most sacred description of poetry, of which they only want what they cannot be said to need—the name and the metrical arrangement.

Taylor, Rowland.—One of the martyrs of the Reformation in Queen Mary's reign. He was Chaplain to Archbishop Cranmer, who made him Vicar of Hadleigh in Suffolk; in the reign of Edward VI. he introduced the use of the new Prayer Book and abolished the Mass. He was commanded by Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, to restore the performance of Mass, and on his refusal was in 1553 summoned to appear in London before him. He was kept in the King's Bench prison for nearly two years, and then called to answer certain other charges that were brought against him, particularly that of having married. He defended the right of priests to marry so well, and brought so many convincing passages from the Bible to support his argument, that the judge was unable to give sentence of divorce, but deprived him of his living, and a few weeks later he was sentenced to death. He was taken back to Suffolk, and burnt at the stake at Aldham Common, near Hadleigh, Feb. 8th, 1555. He is said to have been an ancestor of Jeremy Taylor.

"Teaching of the Twelve Apostles;" or, "The Teaching of the Lord by the Twelve Apostles to the Gentiles."—For the work has a double title—is the name of part of a Greek MS., containing also other Christian writings, discovered in the year 1877 by Philotheus Bryennius, Metropolitan of Nicomedia, in the Library of the Most Holy Sepulchre, belonging to the Patriarchate of Jerusalem. This volume is dated 1056. Bryennius edited and published the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles in 1883.

It has been supposed, with much probability, that the writer or compiler of this work—who is quite unknown—lived in Egypt, and from internal evidence a date must be assigned to the original, of which this MS. is a copy, not later than the first quarter of the second century [80-110 A.D.]. It may thus possibly be the oldest Christian writing after the books of the New Testament—perhaps even earlier than some of them. The subject—matter of this short treatise is the simplest of practical teaching, such as may well have been current in similar forms; and being taught orally and then committed to memory by those who had to teach others, was written down by some teacher in the form which we have in the Teaching. The work contains moral precepts, some rules as to Prayer, Fasting, Baptism, and the Eucharist, and the teachers of the Church, and ends with a solemn reference to the coming of the Lord and the Resurrection.

There is no sign of any Canon of the New Testament; only the "Gospel" or the "Commandment of the Lord" is referred to, most often according to St. Matthew, sometimes St. Luke, seldom quite word for word; sometimes there is a text agreeing with neither. There are no clear references to the writings of St. Paul, nor any signs of the influence of some special points of his teaching. The mention of the Twelve Apostles in the second title points to a time when, as in the body of the writing, the title Apostles was not confined to those subsequently called "The Twelve."

One of the precepts for Sunday will give idea of the style of the Teaching:—"And the Day of the Lord come together a break bread, and give thanks after confessing your transgressions, that your sacrifice may be pure."

Te Deum Laudamus.—This hymn the Church has always been sung at least once a week throughout the Western Church, and it has always held a prominent place at coronation enthroneings, and public thanksgivings. The authorship is unknown. It is called in the Roman Catholic Breviaries Hymnus SS. Apostoli et Augustini, and the tradition is that it was composed by these Fathers on the consecration of the latter. But there is no trustworthy evidence to support this tradition, and it does not find little acceptance. Another tradition that St. Hilary of Poictiers is the author of the hymn. The oldest notice of the hymn's existence is in the "rules of Cassarius of Arles who was consecrated bishop in 502, and said to have drawn up these rules before elevation. In these the hymn is named with other hymns which are to be sung at morning service, and its mention there along with the Psalms of David implies that it had a recognised position, and was well known. We therefore have proof that it cannot later than the middle of the fifth century, learned writer in the Church Quarterly Review having subjected the hymn to a minst analysis, shows that of its twenty-nine verses a quarter are directly taken from Holy Scripture, the rest are traceable to liturgy and hymns of the Western Church. And as Scriptural quotations are from the Vulgate version, which is the work of St. Jerome, the writer is enabled to fix the date between the life of this father and the year 490.

There seems no doubt that one of the verses which we are so familiar is an incorrect, owing to the mistake of a copy. Nearly all the ancient copies read verse thus: Tua liberandum mundum suscep- hominem; non hortusti virginis uerum, i.e. "Thou for the deliverance of the world didst give manhood; thou didst not abhor." The copyist inadvertently left out mundum and the suscepisti being afterwards found had altered to suscepturn, and so the son became as we have it, "When thou tookest etc. Another variation is sedens for sedes verse 18, which will make the meaning of the two verses, "Thou who sittest at the ri and of God, we believe that thou shalt," etc. And once more, all ancient MSS. have "numero," and not "numero," in verse 21, "Make them to be rewarded," etc. "The hymn contains," says Dean Comber, "first, an act of praise offered to God by us, and by all features, as well as in earth as in heaven; secondly, a confession of faith; declaring [1] he general consent unto it, [2] the particulars of it, concerning every Person in the Trinity, and much largely concerning the Son, as to his divinity, his humanity, and particularly his incarnation, his death, his present glory, and his return to judgment; thirdly, a supplication grounded upon it: [1] for all his people, that they may be preserved here and hereafter; [2] for ourselves, who daily praise him, that we may be kept from future sin, and be pardoned for what is past, because we rust in him."

Teetotalism.—A teetotaler is a total abstainer from alcoholic drinks. The word "te-total" is an emphasised form of total. It originated with Richard Turner, of Preston, who, at a temperance meeting in 1833, asserted that "nothing but the te-te-total will do."

Abstinence from strong drink, though with the objects than the promotion of temperance, dates from very early times. The Rechabite take a vow, either for a certain number of days or for life (as Samson and John the Baptist), to take no strong drink, and we have the Rechabites [Jer. xxxvi. 6], a tribe of hereditary teetotalers. But the Rechabite vow was essentially a sacrifice of the person to the Lord [Num. vi. 2], and in the case of the Rechabites was a sign of filial obedience. It was double a protection, as well as a silent protest, against drunkenness, but these were not its primary objects, as they are with the various modern temperance societies. The Jewish sect of the Essenes also joined strict temperance in matters of drink. The Manichean heretics of the third century rejected the use of wine, calling it "the gall of the Prince of darkness," and earlier still the Ebionites and the Gnostic sect of the cerinatica refused wine, and even communicated with water. In these cases wine was refused as a form of matter over which evil beings had special power. Later still, Mahomet absolutely forbade all intoxicating liquors to his followers.

Teetotalism originated at Preston, in Lancashire, chiefly—to their great honour—with a working men. Seven persons signed the first total abstinence pledge, the name of Joseph Livesey being one of them, on Sept. 1st, 1832. Earlier pledges had allowed the use in moderation, of wine and beer, spirits being always excluded, but from this time onwards teetotalism became the mark of all temperance societies.

The teetotal movement spread from Preston, and numerous other societies were formed, and in 1834 the British Temperance Association or League was founded. At the present time there are several large temperance societies based on total abstinence. One of the most important, the Church of England Temperance Society, has its origin in various parochial associations, and was formally originated in 1862, being accepted by Convocation, and sanctioned by the two Archbishops in 1873. It has the praiseworthy feature of a double platform, its "General" members, who only pledge themselves to promote temperance in all ways open to them, and its "Abstaining" members, who are pledged to total abstinence. The former section includes those who feel strongly on the subject of temperance, but do not see their way to professing abstinence, whilst the latter section includes those who need the support of a solemn promise, and those who desire especially to influence others by their example. The pledge in this society is discharged on surrender of the card of membership.

It has been objected to teetotalers that they despise a good gift of God, and impose a needless vow, since every baptised person is pledged already to fight against "the world, the flesh, and the devil," in all forms, intemperance included. But it may be replied that to use the strong force of mutual association for the purpose of resisting this special temptation, is quite in accordance with the spirit of the Christian promise, and for the strong to deny themselves for the sake of the weak, is but to obey the spirit of St. Paul's injunction, "We then that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves" [Rom. xiv. 21, xv. 1]. Those who know most of the horrors of drunkenness will be the first to overlook the teetotalers' errors of expression, and will be the readiest to give all the help they can to temperance associations until a great change has been brought about in the drinking habits of the working class, similar to that which has taken place in the habits of the classes above them—a change from widespread drunkenness to comparative sobriety.

One extreme into which many teetotalers have run is so serious as to require notice; the insistence upon some unfermented juice or syrup instead of wine at the Holy Communion. Although it may be conceded that the name wine was sometimes given anciently to a kind of unfermented grape jelly, or grape syrup, there is not the slightest reason for supposing that our Lord used anything but wine, i.e. the fermented juice of the grape, at the institution of the Eucharist, and such has been the practice of the Church ever since. It is therefore deplorable to bring discredit on the good cause of temperance by importing into it an error like that of the Manichean sect of the Aquarians or Hydro-parastate, who pretended to celebrate the Eucharist with water. The plea for this practice is that there are some reclaimed drunkards in whom the mere taste of wine rouses an uncontrollable desire for strong drink. It is surely possible, however, to select some natural wine which, diluted with water, will not recall the forbidden taste.

Telemachus.—A monk of the fifth century, who lived in the reign of Honorius and Arcadius. He left his convent to come to Rome, where one day, seeing some gladiators in the arena, he interfered to part them, and was stoned to death by the spectators, who took pleasure in that pastime. But his "works followed him," for in consequence of his murder the Emperor Honorius put a stop to the barbarous gladiatorial exhibitions.

Teleology [from the Gr. telos, "an end"] is the doctrine of ends, or the reasoning concerning the Divine purpose of all the created universe, and is applied to the argument from design in proof of the existence of God. Aristotle was the first to bring the word into philosophical discussion.

Tellier, Michel Le [1643-1719], a distinguished Jesuit, confessor to Louis XIV., and a bitter enemy of the Jansenists, was the chief promoter of the demolition of the celebrated house of Port Royal. He then forced upon the nation the bull Unigenitus [q.v.]. His violence was the cause of much of the odium which the Jesuits afterwards experienced, and paved the way for the abolition of their society.

Templars.—The first ecclesiastical order of knighthood: formed under Hugh de Payens at Jerusalem in 1119. They afterwards moved westwards, and lived chiefly in Paris. [MILITARY ORDERS.]

Temporalities.—In the office of institution to a parish it is said, "We authorise you to claim and enjoy all the accustomed temporalities appertaining to your cure," by which is meant the emoluments and property belonging to the church.

Ten Commandments.—The eighty-second Canon of the Church of England orders that "the Ten Commandments be set up on the east end of every church and chapel, where the people may best see and read the same." Queen Elizabeth in 1560 and 1561 ordered the displaying of the Commandments "at the east end of the chancel," and they should be fixed "on the wall over the common board." In 1564, in the Book of Advertisements, it is ordered "to sett the Tenne Commandments upon the easte walle over the said Table." At the present time there is a great variety of practice in this respect. Many churches are without them, the argument being used that, as every one possesses a Prayer Book and Bible, there is no longer the need which there was when these books were scarce to set them up publicly. But the defenders of the old practice reply that there is a true symbolism in the retention—namely the declaration of Christian morals as a Christian faith as the basis of the Church.

Tenison, Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury [b. at Cottenham in Cambridgeshire 1636; d. at Lambeth, 1715].—He was educated at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, an after taking his degree in 1657, he for a time studied medicine, but took orders in 1658 and after several other preferments, Charles I. presented him to the living of St. Martin's-in-the-Fields. In 1689 William III. made him Archdeacon of London, and in 1691 Bishop of Lincoln, and on the death of Tillotson, in 1694, Archbishop of Canterbury. He did much for the diocese of Lincoln, which has been greatly neglected. While at St. Martin he endowed a free school, and built and furnished a library. He is also regarded as the founder of the library in St. Paul's Cathedral. He bequeathed large sums for charitable objects, and is said to have been a pious and most exemplary man in every station that he filled.

Tenth. [TITHES.]

Terminism.—A doctrine which occasioned a controversy at Leipzig in the seventeenth century, the chief movers in which were Reichenberg, who upheld the doctrine and Ittig, who denied it. It is the belief that there is a term in each man's life, which only occurs once, after which he is no longer capable of receiving grace or pardon for his sins.

Terrier [from the Latin terra, the land and particulars of all real property belonging to a benefice].—It is ordered by the eighth Canon that a written survey of lands, houses, etc., belonging to any benefice shall be taken and lodged in the bishop's registry, where it may be referred to at any time; it is, however, usual to keep a copy of this document in the parish chest also.

Tersanctus, Trisagion, or Seraphic Hymn.—The hymn in the Communion Service which begins "Therefore with angels and archangels," etc., where the word Sanct or holy is thrice repeated. This anthem is very early origin in the Church, Chrysostom and Cyril of Jerusalem mention it as used in the liturgy in the fourth century, but it probably even earlier. The translation the original Greek form of the Trisagion: "O Holy God, O Holy Mighty One, O Holy Immortal, have mercy upon us." The preface to the hymn is recited by the priest alone and then the choir and people join in the Sanctus. Originally it ended with the word "Hosanna in the highest, blessed is He the ometh in the name of the Lord, Hosanna in the highest," but in 1552 this was altered to a present form, "Glory be to Thee, O God."

Tersteegen, Gerhard, a German poet, with some tendency towards Mysticism, well known as the author of many German hymns, some of which are favourites in English. He was born Nov. 23, 1697, his parents being tradespeople, and made such progress in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, that his father was advised to devote him to study; but being unable to afford this, he was apprenticed to his brother-in-law, a merchant in Fulhelm. Here, at sixteen years of age, he received his first religious impressions, which weakened so strong a desire for private meditation that at the close of his apprenticeship he learnt the more solitary business of ribbon-weaving, supporting himself thus with the greatest self-denial, until the pressing demand of his religious services induced him to accept the pecuniary assistance of a few select friends. All his life he suffered extremely from pain, illness, and extreme weakness, and is public exhortations and preaching were almost literally forced upon him. The spiritual power of his preaching was very great, the predominating doctrines of his teaching being the free grace of God in Christ, the experimental knowledge of Divine love in the soul, and practical union with the will of God. He translated the works of Madame Guyon, and other French mystics, and published several original works. Many of his letters and some of his discourses (from notes taken down) have been preserved, and a wrote many hymns; of these the one beginning:

"Lo, God is here! let us adore,
And own how awful is this place;"

and that commencing

"Thou hidden love of God, whose height And depth unfathomed, no man knows," retranslations by Wesley. He died in 1769. His life and various remains have been published in English.

Tertullian, Quintus Septimius Flav-rens, was the first of the ecclesiastical writers who wrote in Latin, and is therefore called by Milman "the father of Latin Christianity." He lived at the end of the second and beginning of the third century, under the Emperors Severus and Caracalla. The son of a centurion, he was born at Carthage, and brought up in the religion of his heathen parents, but was afterwards converted to Christianity, and became a priest at Carthage or Rome. It is known that he was married, from the fact that he addressed certain books to his wife; and it is hence inferred that the celibacy of the clergy was not yet customary. In middle age he joined the sect of Montanus, the asceticism and rigorous discipline of the Montanists being probably peculiarly attractive to a man of his austere character and vehement temper. Of his after life nothing certain is known, but it is said that he lived to a venerable age.

Tertullian was a voluminous author. His style is harsh, but vigorous and powerful. He seems to have been educated for the law (though he is not to be confounded with a namesake who was a jurisconsult about this time), and the effect of his training is apparent in his works. He treats Christianity, it has been said, as a client for whose defence he is retained, and does not scruple to make use of any argument. Some of his chief works are:

1. His Apology, addressed to the governors of Proconsular Africa, under Severus. It contains a complaint that the mere name of Christian was made a test by judges; that Christians were not allowed to state their opinions; that they were frequently confounded with the Jews; and that ignorance and prejudice were the cause of the feeling against them. It also shows that Christians could not be suspected of disaffection, as they never attempted to avenge their wrongs, but offered supplications for the Emperors, and readily paid their taxes.

2. On the Prescription of Heretics. Prescription is a legal term, signifying the exception taken by a man when an attempt was made to dispossess him of his property, that the case should not be heard, on the ground that he has been in undisturbed possession for a number of years. Tertullian's book is an application of this principle, maintaining that it is unnecessary to argue with heretics on the merits of the case, for they are excluded from a hearing on account of their novelty.

3. Five books against the heresy of Marcellinus.

4. On Baptism, showing the necessity of the sacrament, and refuting the opinion that faith alone is sufficient for salvation.
Tertullian also wrote on Penitence, on Patience, on Martyrdom, on the Soul; besides books against Praxedis and Valentine, and numerous other works. The work on the Trinity, sometimes ascribed to him, is not now considered genuine.

Test Act.—An Act passed in 1673, in the reign of Charles II., designed to protect the Established Church from the dangers it might be exposed to from Romanists and from Nonconformists of every denomination. It required all officers, whether military or civil, to take the oaths, and make the declaration against transubstantiation to the proper authorities within six months after their appointment.

Tetratla.—A celebrated work of Origen [circa 1450-1519], comprising the four versions of the Old Testament in Greek, namely, those of Aquila, Symmachus, the Septuagint, and Theodotion, in parallel columns, to which he added two more, the original Hebrew in its own characters and in Greek type. It is sometimes also called the Hexapla.

Tetzel, John [circa 1450-1519], a notorious vendor of indulgences, was born at Leipzig, where he studied theology, and in 1489 entered the Order of Dominicans and received permission to go into the world and preach. In 1502 he was chosen by the Teutonic Knights to preach the indulgences which they had gained in the Muscovite War, and he carried on for fifteen years a lucrative trade in them, practising shameful delusions upon the people. His life was so corrupt that at Innspruck he was condemned to be drowned in a sack for the breach of the seventh commandment; in consequence of powerful intercession, the sentence was mitigated to perpetual imprisonment. Being also released from this, he travelled to Rome, was absolved by Pope Leo X. in 1516, and even appointed apostolic commissary, and the Archbishop of Mainz made him an Inquisitor. He now carried on the sale of indulgences with still greater effrontery, and travelled through Saxony in a waggon, provided with two large boxes, one of which contained the letters of indulgence, while the other was destined for the money obtained for them, a great part of which was for building St. Peter's at Rome. The latter chest had the inscription:—

Sobald das Geld im Kasten klingt, sobald die Seele gen Himmel springt.

"Soon as the chest the money rings, so soon the soul to heaven springs."

He is said to have received ninety gold gilders a month, besides his expenses. He offered absolution for every sort of crime, not excepting murder, adultery, and perjury. It was in opposition to Tetzel's teaching that Luther, in 1517, nailed to the church door of Wittenberg his celebrated theses, being ninety-five propositions, whereof many were against the power of the Pope, the treasure of the Church, and the worth of indulgences. They were answered by Tetzel, and the student of Wittenberg burned the answers in the marketplace. Tetzel received a severe rebuke for having exceeded his authority from the Papal Chamberlain, Karl von Millitz, who was sent to settle the dispute. This caused him so much chagrin that he retired to the Dominican convent in Leipzig, where he died of the plague.

Thanksgiving, The General, so calls to distinguish it from the special ones who follow it. It was compiled by Bishop Rainold or Reynolds [q. v.] in 1661, and, says Cane Daniel, "appears to have been adapted for a thanksgiving composed by Queen Elizabeth after one of her progresses, which commence as follows:—'I render unto Thee, O merciful and heavenly Father, most humble and hearty thanks for Thy manifold mercies abundantly bestowed upon me, as well for Thy creation, preservation, regeneration, and other of Thy benefits and great mercies exhibited in Christ Jesus.'" It is half thanksgiving and half prayer; a prayer for the spirit of thankfulness, and for grace express that spirit both in word and deed. There is no authority for the repeating of the by the whole congregation, and the custom which exists of doing so in some church probably arises from a mistaken idea of the word "general."

Theatines.—A religious order of regular priests, founded in 1524 by St. Cajetan, Thiene, and the Bishop of Chieti (ancient Theate), afterwards Pope Paul IV. They bound themselves, besides the usual monastic vow to preach against heretics, to take upon themselves the cure of souls, to attend the sick, criminals, and to trust entirely to Providence owning no property, and not even collecting alms, but waiting for the voluntary gifts the charitable. In Italy, specially in Naples, the Order was numerous and influential; it spread into Germany, Spain, and Poland, never in great numbers.

Theism.—Theists are those who believe in the existence of God, as distinguished from Atheists, but the name includes various degrees and phases of that belief. Theism really the same as Deism (the former coming from the Greek, the latter from the Latin word for God), and was first used by some writers in the seventeenth century instead of it. Deism—the chief form of anti-Christian thought in the last century—was a theory which implied the existence of a Person God as a conclusion of the natural reason but denied the need for, and the possibility any revelation besides the work of Nature that God had made the world once for all, and interfered no further in its concerns.
ame fell into discredit, and similar opinions re now held under the term Theism. But as infidelity has, in the present day, become more open in its opposition to God, Theists have come to be ranged on the side of Belief, and the term now includes not only those holding the old Deistic opinions, but all who believe in a Personal God who is possessed of power, wisdom, and goodness; all, in short, who confess the God of Abraham. Indeed, Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans—as against Atheists of all kinds, as well Materialists as Pantheists—are properly called Theists. It follows from this that in using the word some further explanation is required to the manner in which belief in God is held, since the man who believes in a special revelation and in miracles, and the man who believes in neither, may both be Theists.

The title has been adopted by the Rev. Charles Voysey, once a clergyman of the church of England, who, having published sermons and other works opinions which were held to deny the doctrine of the Trinity and its Articles of the Faith of the Church, was prosecuted by his diocesan in the Court of Chancery, and sentenced to deprivation in 1871. He then began to hold religious services in London, and gathered a congregation around him who called themselves "the Theistic church." Mr. Voysey, in his account of the movement, contends that the principles which he holds are found in the Hebrew Psalms and prophecies, and in less abundance in the devout words of Brahmins, Parsees, Greeks, Romans, the Rig Vedas and Zendavesta. He declares that it was necessary to take a distinctive title, since he desired not to be confounded with Materialists, Agnostics, Pantheists, Socialists. Why not, then, be classed with Unitarians? "Because," replied Mr. Voysey, "the majority of Unitarians, by their teaching and by their worship, put both the Bible and Jesus into what Theists regard as a false position, going so far as to use only the Bible for reading the Lessons, and using the name of Christ very much, if not at all, in the light of a mediator, and not un- Theodicea [from Thos., "God;" and dikaiō, "I acknowledge as right," or "vindicate"].—A vindication of the Deity in respect of the organisation of the world, and the freedom of human will. The term theodicea is applied to a defence of Theism against Atheism, which Leibnitz first undertook on a broad scale, by publishing in French, in 1710, his Essai de Théodicée, respecting the goodness of God, the liberty of man, and the origin of the Bible. In this work he maintains the notion that God had chosen, among all possible worlds, the most perfect. This was called optimism, and gave rise to much discussion until the latter part of the eighteenth century. Voltaire attacks it in his Candide.

Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury from 668 to 690.—He was a Cilician monk, born at Tarsus, and made Archbishop of Canterbury by Pope Vitalianus. His first concern was to improve the state of religion, and to make the government and discipline of the Church more regular and uniform; and his next business was to revive and encourage learning, and for this purpose he got together a considerable library of Greek and Latin authors. He was the first to enjoin the acquirement of Greek from candidates for the ministry. The churches in England at this time were engaged in the controversy regarding the keeping of Easter, and Theodore succeeded in getting them to agree to the Roman custom. He held a synod at Hertford in 673, where the duties of bishops, clergy, and laity were defined, and the Canons of the Roman Church were ordered to be observed in the English. In 680 he convened a Council at Heathfield in Kent. At this assembly the Eutychian and Monothelite heresies were considered, and the Church warned against them; and the English Church, as a proof of orthodoxy, accepted the five General Councils. At this council was present a celebrated singer, named John, who taught the Gregorian mode of chanting. Theodore restored the discipline of penance, and published a Penitential, hitherto unknown to the Latin world, by which the clergy were taught to distinguish sins into various classes, according as they were more or less heinous, private or public; and to determine the degrees of their guilt by their nature and consequences, the intention of the offender, the time and place in which they were committed, and the circumstances with which they were attended. This book also contained the mode of proceeding with respect to offenders; pointed out what penalties were suitable to the various classes of transgressions; prescribed the forms of consolation, exhortation, and absolution; and described fully the duties and obligations of those who were to receive the confessions of the penitent. This new discipline passed shortly from Britain to other countries, and became the model of all other penitentials; but in the eighth century its influence began to fail, and was at length supplanted by the new canon of Indulgenes. Theodore subdivided the bishoprics of East Anglia and Mercia, forming new dioceses for Worcester and Leicester, and a difference arose between him and Wilfrid, Archbishop of York, about the division of that See. He died in his eighty-eighth year, a period which he declared a dream had told him that he should reach, but not exceed. He was buried at St. Augustine's, Canterbury.

Theodore of Mopsuestia.—So called from a city in Cilicia, of which he was made bishop in 394. He was educated in a monastery, and ordained priest. The famous Nestorius, Theodoret, and John of Antioch were amongst his pupils. Though accused after his death of great errors, he was one of the most learned men of his time, and wrote many works, of which the only ones extant are a commentary on the Psalms, one on the twelve minor prophets, and some fragments which are to be found in Photius. He wrote a book against Origen, concerning allegory and history, censuring his fanciful interpretations of Scripture, and did not hesitate to apply most of his predictions to various events in ancient history. His orthodoxy was challenged at the fifth General Council in 553, in the dispute known as the Theodore Chapters [q.v.]. He is said to put forth his writings the heresies concerning the doctrines of the nature and person of Christ which afterwards were developed by Nestorius; but during his lifetime he was much valued.

Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus or Cyriaca, a town of Syria, lived in the fifth century and was a disciple of St. John Chrysostom and of Theodoret of Mopsuestia. He was made Bishop of Cyrus about 420, and was munificent to his city in building aqueducts and public baths, and in such favour with the Empress Pulcheria, that his diocese was left unburdened by new taxes. He sided with his Primate, John of Antioch, in the belief that the Council of Ephesus had been too hasty in condemning and deposing Nestorius, and they held a separate synod, which they deposed St. Cyril. Theodoret also attacked St. Cyril's twelve anathemas published in a Synod of Alexandria against Nestorius, but afterwards he was reconciled to Cyril, and sided with him against Nestorius. The Eutychians deposed him the Robber Council of Ephesus, but was re-established at the General Council of Chalcedon in 451. There is mention made of him after this time, a some say that he died in 457, while oth say ten years later. He was concerned in the Theodore of Mopsuestia in the business of the Three Chapters. His works show that he was a man of great learning. He wrote an Exposition on the Epistles of St. Paul; five books of Ecclesiastical History, beginning with the heresy of Arius [323], and ending with the time of Theodosius the Young [423]; also a work on the philosophy of the divinity of the ancients, called The Knowledge of the Evangelical Truth by the Philosophy of the Gentiles.

Theodosians.—A sect of Russian heretics from the Established Church, under Theodosius, accepted Protestant teaching in 1552. The chief supporters of the movement were three monks who travelled in place to place condemning the worship of images; but their teaching does not seem to have taken great root. They built a Church at Vitebsk.

Theodosius I., the Great, Emperor of Rome, was a native of Spain. His valor exploits and good conduct, and the services he had already rendered to the Empire, induced Gratian to admit Theodosius to an equal share of the government with himself. He received the purple in 379. Theodosius was possessed of remarkable powers of mind, and a noble character. He defeated the Goths at Thrace, and, falling ill at Thessalonica, he was baptised. He then went to Constantinople, whence he expelled the Arians, and gave th churches to the orthodox Christians, making Gregory Nazianzen Archbishop. In 381 he called together the second General Council, at which 150 bishops were present; they confirmed the Nicene Creed, and published several edicts for the punishment of heretics. He exercised also a religious influence over the West after the overthrow of Maximus and the establishment of Valentinian. In 389 he came to Rome to receive the honour of a triumph, and abolished whatever traces of idolatry remained there. One blot on his character was an act of cruel vengeance exercised on the people of Thessalonica, who, in 390, had in a tumult killed Botheric, the commander of the garrison, and dragged his dead body through the streets. This atrocious deed was reported to Theodosius in exaggerated colours by his minister Rufinus, wherein he immediately gave orders for a terrible tribulation. A body of his soldiers entered the town and murdered 7,000 of its inhabitants. This act he afterwards deeply regretted, and submitted to the sentence of his friend Ambrose of Milan, which required him to do penance for eight months, during which time he was not admitted to partake of the Eucharist. In 392 Valentinian was murdered in Gaul by Arbogastes, who chose a rhetorician Eugenius as Emperor, on condition that he would tolerate idolatry. Theodosius defeated him, and became sole emperor, but early in 395 he died of dropsy.

H. was certainly a remarkable man, and his death was deplored alike by Christians and heathen. Under his rule, paganism may be said to have received its death-blow.

Theodotians.—A sect which arose in the third century. Theodotus, a tanner of Antioch, apostatized during a Roman persecution [192], and afterwards, to palliate guilt, said that Christ, though of eminent race and born of a virgin by the operation of the Holy Spirit, was only a man, and that before he had denied man, but not God. For a heresy so excommunicated. One of his disciples, Theodotus, a banker, organised a sect of Theodotians in 210, which was attacked by a book called The Labyrinth. Theodotus himself held that Christ, though born of a man, came God at His baptism; but some of his followers thought He never became so, and were not till after His Resurrection. Artemai, a few years later, began to preach the same doctrines as Theodotus, and his followers were called Artemonites. The followers of Theodotus and the banker are called Melchisedekian, because he held that Melchisedek was not a man, but a heavenly power, uncreated, superior to Christ in that he is glorior for angels, whereas Christ only precedes for men.

Theodotion, an Ebionite of Ephesus, lived about the end of the second century, was a disciple of Tatian, and follower of Marcion. He afterwards became a Jew, and translated the Old Testament into Greek in the reign of Commodus. Origen observes that this is a free translation, in which important things are added and others are omitted. His version of Daniel was substituted by the ancient Church for that in the Septuagint.

Theologia Germanica.—The name of a book written in the fourteenth century by an unknown German author, the arguments of which are based on the doctrine of mysticism. As a devotional book it was placed by Luther next to the Bible, excepting only the writings of St. Augustine. It was written at a time of the wildest confusion—the time of the Papal schism, when the Church itself was, outwardly at least, a mass of corruption, and when the whole of Europe was devastated by war, pestilence, and famine. At such a period its calmness of tone is the more remarkable, and proves the strength of the writer's convictions. His object is to answer the questions which he has himself put forward, of the nature of goodness and sin, and of the end and aim of religion. He answers that goodness is in simple submission to, and oneness with, God's will, and sin is independence; therefore, goodness can only be reached by a complete denial of self, and by such entire surrender to the Spirit of God that a man has no power over himself, and as it were abandons his own existence, his own desires, and the good works which he has done, and lies passive in God's hands to be disposed of according as He wills.

Theology [Theos, "God," and logos, "doctrine"], the doctrine which God has given concerning Himself, the science which treats of the existence and character of God, and the relations in which we stand to Him. The word "theology" was in use among the heathens, who applied it to the works of those who speculated on the nature and worship of the gods, and therefore Hesiod and Plato were both regarded as theologians. Eusebius and Varro (as quoted by Augustine in his De Civitate) distinguished the heathen theology into three sorts: the fabulous (that of the poet), the natural (that taught in the philosophical schools), and the political (that of the priests and common people). The two former were open to the will of the professors to alter as they pleased, but the last was settled by authority, and could not be altered without national consent. The Roman Law was very strict on this point [Cic., De Legibus]. The state theology of the heathens consisted in the solemn service of the gods, and in attendance on the oracles and divinations.

The word theology is not used in the Bible. Its nearest equivalent is found in such phrases as "the mysteries of God," "the form of sound words," "sound doctrine" [1 Cor. ii. 7;
Theology that there is no shame in lowness and Aristippus that theft and adultery were admissible if the pleasure consequent upon them could be insured without after evil; this teaching tended to the moral degradation of mankind. Hence heathenism involves a general depravity of manners, which tended not to the lower and uncultivated classes only, but to the better informed, even to the religious teachers themselves. The poetry of Horace and Ovid, beautiful as it is, gives terrible proof that the awfulest of heathen morals given in the fifth chapter of the Romans is not overdrawn.

Supernatural Theology was revealed to men by divers portions and in divers manner. From the few particulars of the ancient world which Moses gives us we could hardly tell whether they knew of a general judgment to come. There was evidently a gradation of development, an evolution, an increase light from the faint dawn till the splendid noonday in Christ.

When we come to separate the Science of Theology into different provinces, the following divisions will perhaps be regarded as covering the field. There is the theology of the Fathers, the grounds on which we believe in our religion to be true. Such evidences are partly inward, partly outward. Men believe in God because He speaks to them. But they also have to weigh the evidences on which the Old and New Testament claim to be regarded as authoritative, that they are genuine and authentic. Then there is the theology of the Fathers, which is to interpret and explain the Scripture. And this is the bringing out of the meaning. If Revelation is the source of Theology, I plain that we cannot overrate the importance of the accurate knowledge of what the inspired writers said and meant. The study of the literal Exegesis, or Hermeneutics, as it is sometimes called (from Hermeneuo, "to interpret"), is one which has received more attention of late years than it formerly did; and this is one of the happiest signs of the time. Dogmatic Theology is that which gathers up and exhibits the results of exegetical theology by stating doctrines in a systematic manner and showing what their proofs and whence derived. Polemical Theology (from polemos, "war") has for its province to refute, or defend the doctrines of a system or dogmatic theology. The epistle is said to have been first given by Friedman Beckmann, a theologian of Jena, in the seventeenth century. Many hold it great disrespect the ground that sophistical arguments unhallowed acts have been used in its service and that the odium theologiæm generates religious strife has been an enemy to Christian charity. But it cannot be denied that peace of the Church is dearly bought if price be the sacrifice of truth. It behooves us, then, to cast forth from our armoury every weapon which God does notapprove; but the t must not be left undefended nor error unassailed. The establishment of sound principles of criticism will be the surest method of terminating theological warfare. Practical Theology has its way prepared by all the departments of theological science that we have named; it depends on them, and at the same time is the crown of them all. It exhibits the precepts of religion and the motives which should guide us. There are those who declare that this department alone of theology is of importance, that all else is mere trifling. Thus Pope writes:

"For modes of faith let senseless bigots fight,
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right."

But the answer to this is that the mode of faith was revealed by God in order that men might be guided by it to better living, and therefore it cannot be lightly regarded. An opposite error is that which reserves all its admiration for the mysteries of faith. Religion is barren when it is cherished merely as a system of abstract truth, and it is weakness and inefficiency itself when regarded merely as a system of injunctions and prohibitions. Though it is a system of doctrines, it uniformly contemplates practical results, while the rules depend for all their power on the doctrines upon which they are based. Casuistry, the part of practical theology which applies itself to cases of conscience, decides difficulties as to what a man may or may not do in the way of duty.

When we survey the history of Theology from the beginning of Christianity until now, we discern the following divisions:

1. The Apostolic Period.—One distinctive feature of Christianity has been the consistency of individual peculiarities with the presence of the Spirit. The records of the Lord's life and character in the four Gospels exhibit this feature in a remarkable manner. Though attuned by one and the selfsame spirit, the individuality of each writer is never lost. The genuineness of their narratives is tested by the fact, which grows upon us the more attentively we peruse them, that the scarred object of the revelation sent from heaven accorded altogether with the effect upon the first hearers. Each of the authors of the Epistles, too, possessed his distinctive peculiarities. The last of the Apostles died; the age of the Twelve Apostles was contemporaneous with that of the twelve Caesars—the beginning of the Kingdom of Christ and the ungodly Empire which it was to overrow—and the first age of the Church theology was closed.

2. The Apostolic Fathers.—This name is given the writers who succeeded the Apostles and evangelists. Five writers have usually been reckoned under this head: CLEMEnT, Bishop of Rome; IGNATIUS, POLycARP, BARNABAS, and SMAS. Accounts of them will be found under their respective names. The transition has been truly said to furnish a striking proof of Biblical inspiration. The men who succeeded the sacred writers were men of holiness and piety; most, if not all, were martyrs; yet no one who reads their writings can fail to see the marked inferiority to those of the New Testament.

3. The Apologists are the next class of theologians; those writers who came forth to lay at the feet of princes their protest against the charges of insubordination and immorality which were hurled against the Christians. [APOLOGIES FOR CHRISTIANITY.] The last of the Apologists anterior to the Middle Ages was Salvin.

4. The Early Heresies must be reckoned as a class of theological writings, arising from a falsification of the doctrines of the Gospel by admixture, now of Jewish doctrines and precepts, now of Oriental. The chief of these were the Gnostics and Manichaean. The anti-Trinitarian heretics came somewhat later: Praxeas, Noctus, Sabellius. Thus, while Christian Theology was at first occupied in preserving the Faith from corruption through mingling with heathen fables, its subsequent aim was to reduce the inequalities attendant on the assumption by Christianity of its dogmatic form to the standard of Catholic Faith.

5. Largely instrumental in this great work was the famous Alexandria School of Theology, which, with all its faults, furnishes a beautiful chapter of ecclesiastical history. The works of its first great teacher, Pantæenus, are lost, but his fame was excelled by that of his successor, CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, and still more by that of ORIGEN, the father of Christian philosophy. The first condition of Theology was plain, simple, artificial. It might be summed up in the belief that there is one God, whose Son came from heaven to bring remission of sins. But it was impossible that the world should accept this simple faith without inquiring into the reasons and meanings of these doctrines, and Origen's philosophical acuteness did much towards the reduction to greater precision of many dogmas which had been hitherto unquestioned. Neander, in his estimate of Alexandrian divinity, while he deals out high praise and admiration, yet discovers in some of its signs of the cold, unsocial selfishness of the later Platonism, and a deficiency of the sense of the still adherent, inveterate sinfulness of man, and of his littleness and insignificance. Another serious defect was the habit, characteristic of the Platonist atmosphere of the Alexandrian lecture-rooms, of allegorising the Old Testament narrative, still their plain meaning was oftentimes lost sight of. But when it is remembered that the piety of these men, their self-devotion, their great learning, were the human means of producing that great school of which Athenæus, the father of Christian orthodoxy, was the great flower, it will be acknowledged that the gratitude of the Church for the Alexandrian divines must be real and deep.

6. In contrast to this, but not without its use in the economy of Providence, was the Theology of Antioch, founded by Lucian, who died in 311. While the Alexandrian sometimes lost sight of the letter in pursuance of the spirit, the divines of Antioch followed a track which, in its bare literalness, landed some in Rationalism. Two of the greatest and noblest names in the history of theology are Jerome and Chrysostom, men who showed that their training in the one school did not prevent their admiration and good-will towards the other. Jerome was brought up in the principles of the Origenists, but made the fullest use of Antiochene writers. Chrysostom was brought up in the latter, but was far from giving a blind adherence to it. Few have exercised a wider influence than these two great men.

7. The Trinitarian Theology, i.e. the writings which arose out of the controversies concerning the Holy Trinity, is owing to the great conflict of the Church, first with the Arians, then with the Macedonians. "Macedonius," says Hooker, "transferred unto God's most Holy Spirit the same blasphemy wherewith Arius had already dishonoured His co-eternally begotten Son. And Apollinaris began to pare away from Christ's humanity." In closest connection with this controversy were those of Nestorius and Eutyches, and out of them all came the theology of the first four General Councils. With this period we connect the great names of Cyril of Alexandria and Pope Leo the Great.

8. Western Theology.—A difference is by this time clearly discernible between the theology of the East and the West. The former was essentially speculative, occupied with discussions on the Trinity and the Person of Christ. In the West the questions arose of ecclesiastical relations, and the great questions of Grace, Predestination, and the Justification of Man, were the paramount topics. By far the greatest theologian of the Western Church—of the whole Church, in truth—was Augustine of Hippo. His influence brings us down to the beginning of the Middle Ages.

9. The Scholastic Theology, which occupies so great a space in the history of religious opinion, has been considered in its place. Its cause was the desire of supporting by philosophical proof and evidence the system of faith which the Church had already adopted.

10. The Apogee of Mediaevalism.—The dogmatic system of the Roman Church was built up at irregular intervals, according to the suggestions of interest or the impulse of fanaticism. The Popes did not interfere unless the interests of the hierarchy seemed to be threatened. Consequently many questions of the deepest importance were left unsettled and controversy grew loud long before the Reformation. Questions about the Immaculate Conception, about purgatory, the source of infallibility, supremacy over princes, Trans substantiation itself, were hotly agitated, whilst the Popes made no sign. At length the crisis came, and it was largely owing to the School men. Questions which they had debated about Predestination and Free-will, about Faith and Mercy, and the Propitiation of Christ, had not appeared to threaten the position of the Popes; and even when the Council of Trent met, it was hardly anticipated that the differences which had hitherto only disturbed the peace of the Church, or at least of its fabric would be the real cause of a great divergence and the division of Christendom. Had the possibilities of human civilisation been limited to that of the Middle Ages, the division might not have come. But it was seen that there were other factors in this great problem of human history, which the Papal system could not meet.

11. Roman Theology since Trent. — The Tridentine decrees extinguished the hope of reunion with the Roman Church while many had hitherto entertained, and extin pated the seeds of much that was evangelical and spiritual in the bosom of Rome itself. Doctrines hitherto regarded as indifferent were now made the subjects of sharp definition, while some were shrouded in language purposely obscure in the hope of obviating further controversy. From this monastic began the influence of the Jesuits upon Roman theology, and the revulsion from it, the Jansenists. The decrees of the Vatican Council in 1870 led to a fresh departure in the separation of the Old Catholics.

12. Protestant Theology.—Naturally, the writings of the Reformers were devoted a most entirely to making good the ground they had taken, especially on the subject of Justification. The first dogmatic statement of the Lutheran Church is found in the Loci Theologici of Melanchthon, but by far the most important was the Form of Conoc in 1550. The Heidelberg Catechism, and the decrees of the Synod of Dort, are landmark of the great struggle respecting particular points of theology, inevitable at a time when mediaevalism was making way for the movements of the modern world. To great questions in controversy between the Lutheran and the Reformed Churches were Justification and the Eucharist.

Calvin's Institutes of the Christian Religion was the earliest dogmatic work of the Reformed Church, which has achieved a permanent reputation. Yet greater is the merit of his Biblical commentaries, especially on the Epistles of St. Paul.

Of the theology of the Pietists and of Rationalists we have spoken in their place.

13. Anglican Theology.—The first great
Theological treatise of the Reformed Church of England was Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity. It may be truly said to have set a stamp on the Church which will never be effaced. From his time the great doctrines of the all-sufficiency of Christ, and of freedom of access to Him, were fully impressed upon Anglican Divinity, while the respect for Patristic antiquity and precedent, and the absence of the unhistorical and subjective element, became also a marked feature of it. Then controversies arose about the ministerial commission and about forms, which unapplied became connected with the political struggle between the early Stuarts and their subjects. When the wars had ceased, and once returned, those writers arose who are the greatest masters in Anglican theology. A connecting link between the old and the new schools were Overall, Hook, and Ussher; he last named endowed with learning which as rarely, if ever, been surpassed; the second wonderful for his tender and pathetic eloquence. First among the great names of the seventeenth century are JEREMY TAYLOR, the "English Chrysostom," and ISAAC BARROW. Almost contemporary with these were the leaders of the Nonconformists, Owen, Baxter, Howe, Manton, and Bates. Connecting links between these good men and the leaders of the Church party were Holt and Reynolds, who taught within the Church with all the warmth and unction of the best Nonconformists. The bad and good qualities of the Latitudinarians and Nonjurors lie on the surface. The comprehensive views of Tillotson and Burnet caused them to many to appear cold and vague; yet they were men of deep piety, and possessed with a strong sense of ministerial responsibility. Those who believe the Nonjurors mistaken in their views, cannot refuse love and admiration for their consistency and self-sacrifice. The eighteenth century was a unique time, as in Europe generally, so in England. Yet Wake, Seeker, Wilson, and Cutler, will never cease to be honoured names in English theology.

Wesley and Whitfield were hardly theologians, though filled with missionary zeal and resistless eloquence. But the Tracts for Times brought in a new school of theology, learned, pious, and earnest; perhaps should rather say it revived the theology of the seventeenth century. It has been the prevalent Anglican school since; but most contemporaneously with it arose the School of Theology, as expounded by Maurice, Kingsley, and others, which has so had a profound influence. The Church Christ has profited from the teaching of; and perhaps the most modern movement, in the best hope of the future, is an earnest endeavour to ascertain and absorb the real truth taught by able men of the most diverse views. It is becoming felt that each school has had its mission and its share of truth, and there never probably was a time when the Catholic Faith in its essentials was upheld by a nobler array of writers in every branch of the Church, and in every school of thought.

Theophanes of Byzantium, Abbot and Confessor [6. about 758. d. 816], educated at the court of the Emperor Constantine Copronymus. He assisted in 787 at the Council of Nicae. He built two monasteries in Asia, one of which, at Ager, he governed himself, training his monks and living himself in the greatest austerity. In 814 the Emperor Leo the Armenian renewed the persecution against the Church, and attacked the use of images, of the worship of which Theophanes was a staunch supporter. Being unable to conciliate him, Leo caused him to be thrown into a dungeon for two years, and afterwards banished him to the island of Samothrace, where he died immediately after his arrival. He wrote a Chronographia, an account of the events between the reigns of Diocletian and Leo the Armenian.

Theophany, or Theophaneia. Another name for the Epiphany.

Theo-philanthropists [Greek, Theoos, "God"; philos, "friend"; and anthrôpos, "man"; "friends of God and man"][The title assumed by a religious society formed at Paris during the French Revolution. The object of its founders was to revive public religious ceremonies [which had altogether ceased during the Reign of Terror] without returning to those doctrines and rites of Christianity which were incompatible with the Deism which they professed. In 1796 five heads of families—Chemin, Mareau, Janes, Haïy, and Mandar—associated themselves, and in December held their first meeting at a house in the Rue St. Denis for the purposes of Divine worship and moral instruction, according to the dictates of natural religion. Their services consisted of moral discourses, singing, and prayer. One of their number was Revellière-Lépaux, a member of the Directory, who allowed them the use of the ten parish churches of Paris, which they fitted up and adorned with religious and moral inscriptions, an ancient altar, a basket of flowers as an offering to the Supreme Being, a pulpit, and allegorical paintings and banners. Their services were at first performed every tenth day, but afterwards every Sunday at noon; they had no peculiar spiritual order, but the officers of the society were an overseer, a president of the temple, a reader and an orator, who wore a long white robe over a blue dress, with a sash or girdle of various colours, but who had no privileges nor payment. Their dogmas consisted solely of a belief in the existence of God, and in the immortality of the soul; in fact, pure Deism and practical morality. They implored the pardon of sins from God, but Jesus Christ was looked on as merely a man of extraordinary wisdom. Their chief writer was Chemin, who dwelt principally on moral duties. The festivals of nature, of love of country, of conjugal fidelity, etc., were scrupulously observed. Instead of baptism, a sort of consecration or initiation by exhortations to the parents and godparents was solemnised; for confirmation was substituted a reception into the society with vows, and in place of marriage a symbolical union with rings and bands round the hands of the couple; these were the only ceremonies. Schools were established for the instruction of youth in theo-philanthropism. But the revival of the Catholic religion, and particularly the Concordat of Pius VII., caused the decline of the society, and in 1802 Napoleon I. forbade them to hold their meetings in the churches, and after this time they no longer appear as a body.

Theophilus, Bishop of Alexandria, succeeded Timotheus about 385, and was so much valued for his learning that the Council of Capua in 389 chose him to decide the difference between Evagrius and Flavian, who had both been ordained bishops of Antioch. He reconciled St. Jerome and Rufinus, and in 399, hearing that the monks of Nitria were infected with the doctrines of Origen, he convened a synod, in which they were condemned as heretics, and expelled both from Alexandria and Egypt. He afterwards quarrelled with St. Chrysostom, who wanted to heal the breach between him and the monks, and went so far as to depose him in 403. He died in 412, having been bishop for twenty-seven years. He wrote a treatise against Origen, and also against the Anthropomorphites, and about the right day for celebrating Easter.

Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, was consecrated in 168 or 170, and ruled the diocese for about thirteen years. He was a convert from Paganism, and a vigorous opponent of heresy; he wrote against Marcion and Hermogenes, and in refuting their errors quotes several passages from the Revelation. He wrote a commentary on that book and on the four Gospels, which have been lost; but there are extant of his, three books in defence of Christianity, addressed to a learned heathen named Autolycon, in reply to his vindication of his own religion. He is said to have been the first person to apply the term Trinity to express the three Persons in the Godhead.

Theophylact, Archbishop of Acheiropia in Bulgaria, lived in the eleventh century, and was born at Constantinople. He was considered to be one of the most learned men of his time. He wrote Commentaries upon the four Evangelists, the Acts of the Apostles, the Epistles of St. Paul, and upon Habakkuk, Jonah, Nahum, and Hosea, in which he makes great use of St. Chrysostom's works. The exact year of his death is not known, only that it was after 1071, and that he lived at the same time with Pope Gregory VII.

Theosophy, Theosophists. — In a wide sense Theosophy is the name for the speculations as to God, the mystery of being, and of creation generally. In a more restricted sense, it is the term applied to the speculations of those mystics who adhere to the idea of an internal and supernatural illumination rather than by revelation, they are admitted to a knowledge of those mysteries; firstly of the side of nature, secondly on the side of religion. Theosophists themselves define it as "Divine wisdom." Some of the earlier Theosophists were chemists and physicists—as we should call them now—and obtained the title of fire-philosophers, since, according to the own account, they were enabled by a miraculous intuition of the properties of the so-called element of fire to provide a solution, not only for every difficulty of physics, but also for every doubtful problem in the spiritual world. Traces of such claims are to be found throughout the history of philosophy, but the movement to which the name Theosophy is applied was started by Paracelsus [A.D. 1493-1541], Swiss physician, and the discoverer, to a large extent, of the medicinal properties of opium and mercury. He converted Robert Fludd an English physician [1574-1637], to views, who became an ardent advocate of the Rosicrucians [q.v.], the name adopted by a large section of the Theosophists of the early part of the seventeenth century. Contemporary with Fludd was Jacob Bohm or Behmen, a shoemaker in Gorlitz, a mystic philosopher and the greatest of the Theosophists. Led away by the eloquence of Fludd he came to consider his speculations on Deity and the origin of things as given to him by internal illumination. According to Behmen the Deity is to be contemplated first in its own existence as "the Eternal One, the One Nothing, the Temperamentum," The Divinity is itself a Trinity. Nature or creation proceeds therefrom, and is called "co- trarity." But the proceeding of creation from God is at the same time the ingoing of God into creature: "the silent nothing comes something by entering into dualism. The power of seeing this duality in things spiritual-mindedness. Behmen's Theosophy however, was at the bottom thorough Christian, and William Law [1686-1761], a author of A Serious Call to a Devout Life, his declining years adopted his opinions, and became himself the translator of his works. This phase of Theosophy may therefore be considered a development of Christian mysticism.

The Theosophical Society was founded 1875, at New York, by Mr., or as he is called Indin, Colonel, Olcott, with the object of obtaining "knowledge of all the laws of nature. Colonel Olcott says that by the study of Asia cultism as a science, we are enabled to find dwelling in fire, air, earth, and water, sub-man orders of beings, some inimical, some wearable to man." By their means, the phenomena of Spiritualism are accounted for in a manner so superior to the supposed gency of departed friends or relatives, that through Theosophists and Spiritualists both believe in the reality of the spiritualistic phe-omena, and the existence of the psychic force, they are here obliged to part company.
But for this, modern Theosophy would apparently be only a form of Spiritualism, though its programme is a more ambitious one, since it "covers the whole range of natural phenomena, and everything that concerns mankind and its environments." Like Theosophy appears now as decidedly anti-christian; and there is more or less of sheer arbitrariness connected with it, very unjust exposures connected with a certain adame Blavatsky having shown something of the method by which the system is bolered up and imposed upon ignorant dupes.

Therapeuts, or Worshippers, of both Philo the Jew makes mention in his essay concerning Contemplative Life, are by one supposed to be a branch of the Essenes at this is not certain; they were undoubtedly Jews. Their sect arose at the close of the 2nd century. They gave themselves up en-corey to contemplation of the Deity, lived solitary places, performing none of the uses of active life. They quitted their tates, relations, and country, and spent their me in prayer, and reading the Scriptures
and the writings of their learned predecessors;
ev sang hymns in their religious worship;
ev met every Saturday, which they kept as great holiday; they lived a life of frugality and discipline; at the end of their meal they dleavened bread and hyssop sprinkled with it in honour of the shewbread of the people; the men and women were ranged in do divisions, and moved somewhat in the use of a dance; in the morning they ited the rising of the sun, and with uplifted ands begged that God Almighty would send em a happy day, and after these devotions
ev went to their respective seminaries orells, and spent their time in their customary specations. This is Philo's account of them, and odinently considered them to be Jews.
usebius supposes them to be Christians, but his practices do not accord with this view.
thers have thought them to be Egyptian
oks. In fact, there is a great diversity of ion as to the religion of the sect.

Theresa, Sr., a religious enthusiast, born Avila in Spain, in 1615. At an early age perusal of the Lives of the Saints inspired her with a desire for martyrdom; and she ed from her home to seek death at the hands the Moors. Being brought back, she ected a hermitage in her father's garden for retirement and devotion, and became a pronessed Carmelite nun at twenty-one years of age. Being dissatisfied with the laxity of discipline amongst her Order, she undertook to restore its original severity, and established an Order which she called the Reformed Carmelites, who had their first convent at Avila in 1562. In 1568 she founded a monastery at Sorvello, where originated the Barefooted Carmelites, or Discalceati. At her death she left thirty monasteries—sixteen for women and fourteen for men, all founded by herself. She compiled ten books either concerning her Order or on godly subjects.

1. Her Life, written by herself. 2. The Way to Perfection. 3. The Foundations. 4. The Manner of Visiting Numeries. These four, by order of Philip II. of Spain, were sent in manuscript to the library of the famous monastery of the Escurial. 5. The Mansion, or Castle of the Soul. 6. Divine Love. 7.
Exclamation. 8. Spiritual Advices. 9. Preparations for Confession. 10. Additions to her Life. She died at Alba, October, 1582, and was canonised by Gregory XV. in 1622.

Thirlwall, Conno, D.D., Bishop of St.
David's [6. 1797, d. 1875]. He was educated at Charterhouse and Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he was elected a Fellow. He was called to the Bar in 1825, but changed his profession and took orders in 1828, and became rector of Kirby Underdale, Yorkshire. He was for several years examiner for the classical tripos at Cambridge, and also classical examiner in the University of London. In 1840 he was appointed Bishop of St. David's, and resigned his See in 1874.
His principal work was his History of Greece,
published 1835-40, and he was with Arch-dean Hare joint translator of Niebuhr's Roman History. Whilst Oxford, under the guidance of Newman and his friends, was silently bringing forth that vigorous revival of ecclesiastical life and thought which soon became so potent, there existed more particularly at Cambridge a school of what might be called "the new learning," attracted by the brilliant light which German scholars were throwing over ancient history and literature, and not less by the broader human foundations on which they were seeking, with whatever errors, to base the life and truth of Christianity. Bishop Thirlwall and Arch-dean Hare were two of the principal actors in this movement, and Dr. Thirlwall brought the notice of English theologians one of the more important German criticisms on the Gospel history, which he published in 1825—namely, Schleiermacher's Critical Essay on the Gospel of St. Luke, to which Thirlwall prefixed a very learned and valuable introduction reviewing the state of Critical Controversy up to that date. As a bishop, he was probably more of a controversialist and general diviner than administrator of his See. His charges, dealing with some of the most important questions of the day—e.g., the Colenso case, the Roman controversy, etc.—were, unlike the productions of many of his brethren, not mere ephemeral productions, but contributions to the solution of the great problem which will hold a place of permanent value. He was an active member of the Committee for the Revision of the Old Testament. On the question of the Disestablishment of the Irish Church, he stood alone among his episcopal brethren in voting for it. His Charges, Letters, and Sermons [3 vols.] were published after his death under the editorship of Dean Stanley.

Thirty-nine Articles. [Articles of Religion.]

Thirty Years' War.—A great religious war that raged from 1618–48, and was ended by the Peace of Westphalia. The cause was nominally religion, but in reality it was the ambition of the house of Austria. It began in Bohemia, where the intolerance of the Emperor (Ferdinand II.) produced a revolt, and the old animosities of the Hussite wars were all revived. Their cause was taken up by the Protestant princes, and soon all Central Europe was aflame. The war divided itself into three distinct periods. In the first Austria, under the famous General Wallenstein, was completely victorious, and threatened to subdue all Germany. In the second, owing to the military genius of Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, who became their leader, the Protestants carried all before them; and in the third, victory was more uncertain and more equally divided. France took an active part on the Protestant side under Turenne and Condé. The great French Minister, Cardinal Richelieu, though he oppressed the Protestants in France, helped those of Germany, in pursuance of his policy of French rivalry of German greatness. The chief provisions of the Peace of Westphalia [1648] were:

1. Austria lost Alsace, which became a possession of France, and also Lusace, by which she had bought the help of the Elector of Saxony.
2. Sweden acquired Bremen, Verden, part of Pomerania, Stettin, Rügen, and Wismar, which made her a member of the German Federation.
3. Brandenburg obtained Magdeburg, Halberstadt, Minden, and Camin.

This was, therefore, to inflict a blow upon Germany which she had to wait until the present generation to recover. Not only were Alsace and other territories lost, but the right of France to the Lotharingian bishoprics was conceded; and Switzerland and the United Provinces, which had practically ceased for some time to belong to the Empire, were formally cut off. But the mischief to Germany was far greater than loss of territory. While France became united and compact as she pushed her boundaries to the Rhine, Germany was exhausted and prostrate through the long struggle for which she had formed the field. The authority of the Empire and the freedom of the people seemed to have perished together, and the once powerful empire was dissolved into a mere lax confederation of petty despotisms and oligarchies. The State of Brandenburg, which, as we have seen received additions, began to lay the foundations of that monarchy which, under the name of Prussia, became, after a while, the leading State in the Confederation, and is now the absorbing power of the German Empire.

Tholuck, Friedrich Auguste, one of the greatest German divines of this century, was born at Breslau in 1799; died Halle, 1877. He was of humble birth, and as a young man was apprenticed by his father to a jeweller in Silesia. He, however, so thoroughly devoted to study and so anxious to be able to attend go classes, that some of his friends raised a subscription large enough to send him to gymnasium in Berlin. He studied with great zeal day and night, and by so doing permanently ruined his eyesight. For many years he was a sceptic, and in his farewell speech before leaving college announced his conviction that Mohammedanism was a religion of equal dignity and bear with Christianity. But just at this time he became acquainted with several good learned men, amongst them Neander; and their influence he was induced to study the Bible carefully, and was soon fully won over to the cause of Christianity. He has written several books describing the various conflicts that wag in his mind during this critical period of his life—Sin and Redemption, or True Consecration of the Sceptic, and others. He lived chiefly in Berlin, superintendent of an orphan asylum which he had founded, taking a special interest in young men studying for orders. This may be called his special work in life, for he had peculiarly happy way of dealing with doubts and difficulties of young men, knew exactly how best to encourage the. But he also gave much time to the critical study of the Bible, and in 1826, on the death of Dr. Knapp, was appointed Professor of Dogmatics and Exegesis at the University of Halle. He was obliged to resign after a year from ill-health. He went to Rome three years, and came back so far restored that he was able to undertake the professorship duties, and remained in the same position until his death. His chief commentaries on the Epistles to the Romans and Hebrews, Sermon on the Mount, the Gospel of St. John, and the Psalms. Another book which has been translated into most modern languages, is The Credibility of the Gospel History, a very able answer to Strauss's Leben Jesu.
Thomas, St., Christians of.—Origen tells us that Parthia was the province assigned to the labours of the Apostle St. Thomas, after which Sophronius says he preached to the Medes, Persians, and Bactrians, and legend says that he met with the Magi who brought gifts to the Infant Saviour, and that they joined him in preaching the Gospel. It is said that he visited India, and travelled to Sumatra; and Chrysostom intimates his preaching in Ethiopia. The Portuguese say that he came first to Copta, in the Arabian Sea, and thence to Cranganor, where, having converted many, he travelled further into the East; and having successfully preached the Gospel, returned to the Coromandel coast, where he built a church at Malabar, and converted the prince of the country, but the Brahmins, being hostile to Christianity, had him put to death by running him through with a lance while at his prayers.

At Cranganor, now called St. Thomas, there was a body who call themselves Christians of St. Thomas. They are in some measure Nestrians and Nestorians, and live under the jurisdiction of the Patriarch of the Nestorians, who resides at Babylon. In 1546 John de Albuquerque, a Franciscan, and first Archbishop of Goa, erected a college at Cranganor for the conversion of these Christians to the church of Rome; the Jesuits established another, and in 1599 the Archbishop Meneses brought them into some sort of connection with Rome; but in 1653 most of the converts turned to their original faith.

Their liturgy is in the Syriac language. Their doctrines may be gathered from a letter published in the Guardian in 1884, showing the difficulty of a proposed union of these Christians with other Protestant bodies of southern India:—"One who is imbued with the doctrine and discipline of primitive antiquity would find that the difficulty of uniting these Christians consists, not in their adoption of deacons at the age of fourteen, or in their offering prayers for the departed, or in ignorance of theology on the part of the laity; but in the rejection, on the part of this Church and its rulers, of the Fourth General Council. This is a real difficulty, or although the Jacobites undoubtedly and wrongly hold that our Lord is Perfect God and Perfect Man, yet they refuse to admit that these two natures are united in the One Person of our Lord; they hold that in the incarnation, the Two Natures were so united to become one Nature;"

Thomas Aquinas. [Aquinas, Thomas.]

Thomas à Kempis. [Kempis, Thomas.]

Thomassin, Lewis, born at Aix, in Provence, in 1619; died in Paris in 1695, was a priest of the Oratory, and lectured a humanity and philosophy in their congregation at Lyons; was afterwards divinity professor at Saumur. He was indefatigable in his studies, and wrote many books. In his youth he joined the Jansenists for a time, but afterwards made a public retracation, and wrote against them. His chief works are: Dissertations upon the Councils in Latin; Ancienne et Nouvelle Discipline de l'Église touchant les Bénéfices et les Bénéficiaires; various dogmatical tracts; a Method for Studying Philosophy, Profane History, and Poetry; a Universal Hebrew Glossary, etc.

Thomists.—The followers of Thomas Aquinas [q.v.]. They were called Thomists in opposition to the Scotists, or followers of Duns Scotus. The two sects were at variance as to the nature of the Divine co-operation with the human will, the measure of Divine grace that is necessary to salvation, the unity of form in man, or personal identity, and other abstruse and minute questions. The Thomists leaned in philosophy to Nominalism [q.v.], although they held the abstract form to be the essence of things; they followed the doctrines of Augustine as to grace, and disputed the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin Mary. They belonged mostly to the Dominican Order, while the Scotists were Franciscans.

Thoresby, John, of, Archbishop of York.

—He was brought up as a lawyer, and in 1341 became Master of the Rolls. In 1347 he was made Bishop of St. David's, whence he was promoted in 1349 to Worcester, and became Lord Chancellor of England. In 1352 he was translated to York. He found his diocese in by no means a satisfactory condition, and set to work to remedy the existing evils. The clergy as well as the people were grossly ignorant, and Thoresby drew up for them a catechism in Latin containing an exposition of the Ten Commandments and other essentials, which he had translated into English that they might be frequently read to the people. In his time the jealousies between Canterbury and York were settled. He died at Thorpe in 1373. He rebuilt the choir of his cathedral, and was buried in the Lady Chapel.

Thorn, The Conference of, was one of many assemblies, the object of which was to reconcile the various branches of the Christian Church. It was held in 1645 by the express order of Ladislaus IV., King of Poland, and the conference was between several eminent doctors of the Roman, Lutheran, and Reformed Churches; it was designed to heal the divisions which existed among them, and to find out some means of reconciling their differences, and bringing about reunion. It was called The Charitable Conference; it lasted for three months, but terminated without any results.

Thorn, William.—A Benedictine of St. Augustine's at Canterbury. He lived in the latter part of the fourteenth century, and wrote a history of his monastery, for which he is much commended by Leland, on account of its exactness and the great industry it displayed.

Thorndike, Herbert [d. 1672].—One of the most learned and able advocates of the Laudian theology of the seventeenth century. He held several preferments, among them the Mastership of Sidney College, Cambridge, from all of which he was ejected in the Great Revolution, but received a stall at Westminster at the Restoration. He took part in the Savoy Conference, and gave much assistance to Walton in his Polyglot, being a very accurate Oriental scholar.

Thorndike's works have been republished in the Anglo-Catholic Library, in 6 vols.; the most eminent of them is the Epiloge to the Tragedy of the Church of England [1659], an earnest assertion of the grace of the sacraments.

Three Chapters.—A controversy concerning certain writings, known as the Three Chapters, caused much bitterness in the Church in the sixth century. The pieces distinguished by this appellation were:

[2] The book which Theodoret of Cyrus wrote against the twelve anathemas which Cyril had published against the Nestorians.
[3] The letter which Ibas of Edessa had written to one Maris, a Persian, concerning the Council of Ephesus, and the condemnation of Nestorius. These writings were supposed to favour the Nestorian doctrine, and such, indeed, was their tendency. It is, however, to be observed that Theodore of Mopsuestia lived before the time of Nestorius, and died not only in the communion of the Church, but also in the highest reputation for his sanctity; nor were the writings of the other two either condemned or censured by the Council of Chalcedon; rather, the faith of Theodoret and Ibas was there declared entirely orthodox. The Emperor Justinian was bent upon extirpating that violent branch of the Monophysites known as the Acæphali, and consulted on this matter Theodore, Bishop of Cesaarea, who was a Monophysite, and at the same time extremely attached to the doctrine of Origen. Theodore hoped to gain repose for the Origenists by casting a reproach on the Council of Chalcedon. He therefore suggested to the Emperor that those acts of the Council which had declared the writers of the Three Chapters to be orthodox should be effaced, and the writings condemned and prohibited. Justinian accordingly published an edict to that effect in 554, without any prejudice, however, to the authority of the Council of Chalcedon. This edict was warmly opposed by the African and Western bishops, and particularly by Vigilius, the Roman Pontiff, who considered it as highly injurious, not only to the authority of the council, but also to the memory of those good men whose writings and character it covered with reproach. Upon this, Justinian ordered Vigilius to come to Constantinople, thinking that once in his power he could persuade him to acquiesce in the edict, and reject the Three Chapters, as he was right; Vigilius yielded, and the council of seventy bishops condemned the writings. But the opposition of the Bishops of Africa and Illyricum obliged Vigilius to retract his sentence, for they separated from communion with him, and treated him as an apostate till he reasserted his former judgment. The effect of this retraction doubled the zeal and violence of Justinian, who, by a second edict in 551, condemned anew the Three Chapters. It was final thought best to assemble a General Council to decide the matter, and accordingly this was summoned by Justinian in 553, and is known as the Fifth Oecumenical, or General, Council.

At this it was decided by the Eastern prelates (very few Western bishops being present) that the Three Chapters were heretical and pernicious.

Three Hours' Service.—A servi adopted of late years in many churches. Good Friday, and though in nowise provided for in the Prayer Book, it is render legal under the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act (1872), which permits addition services, consisting of any prayers from the Liturgy or Bibliæ, with address or sermons and hymns. The Three Hours' Service begins at noon, and ends at three, the hour our Lord's death; and from a little book published at Rome in 1866, and entitled Origine Progresi della Direzione delle tre Ore Agenzia di nostro Signore Gesù Cristo, the following particulars are gathered. The idea originated with a Jesuit, Father Alfonso Messia, of Lima, who died in 1732. He introduced this devotion on Good Friday his own church, and it spread first in Peru and Chili, and afterwards through Central America. From Mexico it passed to Spain and reached Rome in 1738. At the first church in which it was used there, attracted crowds, and was soon generally adopted. In about the year 1865 it was used in English churches. It consists, in cases, of hymns, collects, or litanies, and addresses, generally on "the seven words from the cross," though this last feature is sometimes varied by meditations on other defects of the Passion. The service is a very popular one, judging by the crowds which generate frequent it. Thus St. Paul's Cathedral always filled from end to end at this servi. It should be noted as a possibility, that mistake may be occasioned as to the length our Lord's sufferings. St. Mark's language leaves no doubt that the Crucifixion lasted for six hours. The darkness lasted for three of them, during which apparently the Div sufferer was silent. And an error on such a subject is to be deprecated.

Three Kings, The.—The Magi spoken of in the New Testament as offering gifts to Christ; this is celebrated in the Feast of Epiphany. [Epiphany.] They are called kings by the Catholic Church, and Cologne boasts of possessing their bones in her cathedral, where their monument is shown in a chapel built by the Elector Maximilian, whence they are styled "The Three Kings of Cologne." Legend relates that their names were Caspar, Melchior, and Balthazar; that they were bapsed on their return to their own country, at 300 years afterwards their bodies were moved to Constantinople by the Empress Helena, thence by Eustathius to Milan, and finally by Renatus to Cologne.

Throne.—The name applied to the special seat for an archbishop, or bishop, in his cathedral. It is usually placed in the choir and decorated with a canopy.

Thundering Legion. [Legion, Hunderino.]

Thuribulum, or Thurible.—The center in which incense is burned; it is usually a silver or gold vessel with perforations in its top, through which the fumes rise; long handles are attached to it by which it is swung backwards and forwards by the chalice.

Tiara.—A name given to the crown worn by the Pope; a kind of round high cap, circled with three golden crowns, set with jewels in three rows one over the other, adorning a point that supports a globe with cross over it. At first the papal crown was similar to that of an ordinary bishop, but Nicholas I., chosen Pope in 868, added a golden circle as a sign of his civil authority. Simeon VII. added a second about 1294, and Urban V. a third about 1365.

Tiberius Caesar.—Emperor of Rome next to Augustus, from A.D. 15 to 37. In the fifteenth year of his reign, John the Baptizer commenced his ministry, and three years after our Blessed Lord was crucified, under a Roman Governor Pontius Pilate.

Tiburius, Sr., a Christian martyr, was a son of Chromatius, who, according to several writers of that time, was Governor Rome under Carinus, and his successor, Iac tintian. Chromatius was converted to Christianity by St. Sebastian, and Tranquillin, a father of two brothers whom he had continued to death. [See Marcus and Marcellanus.] Tiberius was baptised immediately, but Chromatius waited for a season; then he signed his offices in the State, and opened a house, which was at some distance from Rome, for the reception of those Christians who were in need of help. Tiberius was, from the first, eager to suffer martyrdom for the sake of his religion, and therefore refused to leave the city. He was imprisoned to Fabian, who had succeeded Chromatius, and was told that he must either offer incense to idols, or walk barefoot over hot coals. Tradition says that he chose the latter, and escaped without the slightest injury. Fabian was so angry at seeing his victim escape that he ordered him to be executed immediately. He was beheaded in 286, and the 11th of August is kept in his memory.

Tide.—The Saxon word for hour, time, and sometimes for a festival, as Easter-tide, Whitsun-tide, etc.

Tierce.—One of the hours of prayer. [Canonical Hours.]

Tillemont, Louis Sebas
tien le Nain de [born in Paris, 1637; died there 1698], was a celebrated ecclesiastical historian. He was educated at Port Royal, and ordained priest in 1676, on the persuasion of his friend and spiritual adviser, Le Maistre de Sacy. His whole time was devoted to the study of Church history, and holding that profane history should be interwoven with that of the Church, he first published, in 1690, a History of the Emperiors, etc., and then followed it in 1694 by Notes to serve for an Ecclesiastical History of the first Six Centuries. The Memoirs are in sixteen volumes, the history in six. The history consists of the lives of saints, of famous men, of emperors, of the history of heresies, ranged under distinct titles, and interwoven with passages from the Fathers, and from more modern authors; he has subjoined critical notes at the end of each volume, which are remarkably exact and judicious. His works have been serviceable to many persons since who have published new editions of St. Cyprian, St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, St. Augustine, etc.

Tillotson, John, Archbishop of Canterbury, was the son of a clothier, and was born in Halifax in 1630. He was educated first in the Grammar School of his native town, and afterwards entered Clare Hall, Cambridge, as a pensioner. His parents were Puritans, firmly attached to the Independent party, and as that party was decidedly in the ascendant at Cambridge at the time Tillotson was there, it might appear likely that he would firmly adopt their opinions. He was attracted, however, by the writings of Chillingworth, and became one of the followers of his school, which taught a middle way between Catholicism on one side, and Calvinism on the other. The Low Churchmen of that day were sometimes called Latitudinarians, and Tillotson's sermons show that he adopted the teaching of that school. Before his ordination he was tutor in a family related in some way to Cromwell, and he afterwards married a niece of the Protector. The date and place of his ordination are quite unknown, and there seems a great probability that it was solemnised in a private manner for some reason or other. On his elevation to the primacy some of his enemies questioned whether he had ever been ordained, and some went so far as to say that he had never been baptised. There is, however, no doubt that this was mere ill-natured slander. His promotion was rapid. His first curacy was that of St. Lawrence Jewry, in the City of London, and when he had the living of Ketton in Suffolk, later, he was appointed Tuesday Lecturer in the same church, and was thus able to keep up his old connection. After the Restoration in 1660 he was successively a prebendary of Canterbury, Dean of Canterbury, Canon of St. Paul's, and, after the accession of William III., dean of that cathedral. On Sancroft's refusal to take the oath of allegiance to the new Government, Tillotson was made Archbishop of Canterbury. The state of morals at the Court of Charles II., and the indifference and even contempt with which religion was treated, caused the clergy to have many enemies, especially when, as Tillotson did, they openly reproved those in authority for their looseness of life. But he had gained the esteem and confidence of the King. He died in 1694, having been Archbishop only three years. He left his widow nothing but the copyright of his books; these, however, are said to have realised £2,500. In addition to this the King granted her a pension of £400 for life. Tillotson's sermons are still read and valued, both for the principles set forth and for the telling literary style. We may regard him and Burnet as the two chief divines of the Latitudinarian school.

Timotheans.—A sect of Alexandrian Monophysites, founded by Timotheus Ælurus, who strongly opposed the rules laid down by the Council of Chalcedon. He established his sect in Alexandria, one of the necessaries for admission being that his followers should promise not to yield obedience to the Patriarch, the rightful authority. He used to climb up stealthily to the cells of the monks at night in order to persuade them to rebel against their bishop, and in consequence was nicknamed "The Cat." He persuaded two exiled bishops to consecrate him, and on the death of the reigning Emperor, Marcian, caused the Patriarch Proterius to be murdered, and usurped his office. He held it for three years, but was then banished. In 470, however, on a change of government, he was recalled, making his entry into Constantinople after the manner of Our Lord's entry into Jerusalem. A second decree of banishment was passed, but he died before it was carried out. His opinions were the same as those of the Eutychians [q.v.].

Tindal, Matthew, LL.D.—A Deistical writer, born at Beer-Ferrers in Devonshire, about 1657; died 1733. He was educated Lincoln College, Oxford, became Fellow All Souls, and in 1685 Doctor of Law. the commencement of James II.'s reign joined the Roman Catholic Church, but in it returned to the Church of England, or rather to Rationalism. Having concurred in the Revolution, he was admitted an advocate, a seat as a judge in the Court of Delegates. Published several political and theological pieces, among which were a Letter to the Clergy of the Two Universities, on the Trinity a Athanasian Creed, and a treatise called Rig of the Christian Church. This work excited great sensation among the High Church clergy, who attacked it with much animosity and Tindal published two defences. About the same time he wrote another pamphlet called New High Church turned Old Presby terian, an exposure of Sacheverell [q. and his party. This and the Rights of Church, together with the Defences, were ordered by the House of Commons to be burnt by the hangman in the same fire with Sacheverell's sermon, thus treating the def mitants on each side in the same manner. 1730 he published Christianity as old as Creation, or The Gospel a Republiication of a Religion of Nature, in which his objects were to show that there neither has been, nor can be, any revelation distinct from what the term internal revelation of the law nature in the hearts of mankind. He left a manuscript a second volume of Christianity old as the Creation, but its publication was withheld by Gibson, Bishop of London, whom he had entrusted it.

Tithes [an abbreviation of the Saxon tax-things, or Tithing, which is a transliteration of the Latin decuria], the tenth part of the profits of land and stock, allotted to the clergy for their maintenance. The custom of paying tithes is very ancient. In Gen. xiv. 18, Abraham pays tithes to Melchizedek, as they were legally enjoined by Moses. In the first days of the Christian Church, tithes were exacted of the clergy, and paid to them in kind or in cash. The contributions of believers [Matt. x. 9, 11; Cor. ix. 12; Gal. vi. 6, 7; 1 Tim. v. 17; and tithes (decima) were also known to the Roman law—a rent-charge paid to the Sta by any one who obtained any portion of public land, and called by the publicans, decimans. In the middle of the third century when the first zeal of converts had grown colder, we have St. Cyprian writing to his flock at Carthage that he has design Aurelius and Celerinus to the dignity of Presbyteries that they may be honoured with such allowances (sportulitias) as Presbyte have, and receive equal shares in the month dividends. After the conversion of Constantine rich converts settled large lands on the who converted them, and the first public recognised churches were built on land the
The adoption of tithes as a system is probably a transfer from the Roman stem already referred to, harmonising as it with the custom of the Jewish Church. Golden quotes passages from the ancient thers to prove that the Christian Church, even in the days of persecution, claimed tithes due "jure Divino," but there is no clear evidence how far this right was acknowledged till the establishment of Christianity as the official religion. Nor is it entirely clear whether the tithe paid under the Roman stem was for a civil or religious purpose, it appears probable that the Emperors laid it on them as holding the office of Chief ifex. At the Synod of Cullen in 356 aces are spoken of as "God's rents." Jerome and Augustine use the same language, and in the sixth century the Synod of Macon declared those who did not pay them excommunicate. Harleamgne established tithes all through the empire, even on the newly converted Saxons. As regards England, Coke [Litt. nures, lib. I, c. 9.] declares that "it appeared the laws and ordinances of ancient kings, especially of King Alfred, that the first tithage of this realm had all the lands of England in demesne, and les grandes manors and royalties they reserved to themselves, and with the remnant they for the defence of the realm cenved the Barons of the Realm with such jurisdiction as the Court Baron wath. And at this time, when all the lands of England were the king's demesnes, helwolf, the son of that Egbert who brought a Heptarchy under one sole prince, concided the tithes of all the kingdom upon him Royal Charter." Selden notes many laws of the Saxon kings for the payment of tithes, as their gift, and among the dictum of Ethelred, "Nemo ausserat a se, quod ad Deum pertinet et praeecessores nostri recession." Then the payment of tithes is for hundreds of years payable by custom, as recognised as a duty before Parliaments began. When land changed hands the charge was transferred with it, and as a matter of fact there is nowhere any Parliamentary State document decreeing the payment of tithes. The earliest statutes which mention them assume the obligation [1 ch. II. cap. 14; 5 Henry IV. cap, 11; 27 Henry VIII. cap. 20], The Acts which were issued were to make clear points which had come doubtful or obscure. According to the original idea of the Church establishment the whole bishopric was in a large sense The parish, and the income of it was the common stock of the clergy of the diocese, and Selden attains that before the Lateral Council under Innocent III. every man might have even his tithes to what church he would within his own diocese, or might pay them to the hands of the bishop to be distributed by his discretion. But with the development of the parochial system the tithes of each parish were allotted to its own particular minister, first by common consent, and afterwards by the law of the land. Nevertheless "arbitrary consecrations," as the power of choice was called, again came into use, and became common till the reign of John. This was largely owing to the intrigues of the regular clergy or monks, and will account for the number and richness of the monasteries founded at that period. But in process of years the income of the laborious parochial clergy being reduced to a pittance, the Synod of Canterbury, enjoining the payment of tithes to the parsons of the respective parishes in which each man dwelt.

The composite nature of English institutions partly accounts for the different kinds of tithes; some are secular, some ecclesiastical: there are lay tithes and clerical. The tithes allotted to the ministry are divided into: [1] Predial, those arising from the fruits of the ground, as corn, hay, hemp, underwood, or of trees—apples, cherries. [2] Personal, those arising from the profits of labour and industry. [3] Mixed, such as arise from the beasts, such as cheese, wool, milk, fowls, etc. Predial tithes again are divided into great—those of corn, hay, wood; and small—flax, etc., as well as the mixed tithe. No tithe is to be paid on such things as do not increase and renew year by year. The transfer to a layman of the revenues of a benefice with the obligation to provide for the spiritual duties was known as Impropriation, and according to Spellman the name is intended to indicate that such a transfer was an impropriety, and ought never to have been made. However, it was made before the Reformation, as well as the kindred habit of Appropriation—i.e. the transfer of the benefice to a monastery or a hospital. On the suppression of the monasteries the rights belonging to them were freely transferred by the Crown to laymen, and hence to their heirs descend not only the right to tithes, but in many cases the entire property of rectories. The spiritual duties of such rectories are performed by a clergyman who is called a vicar, who receives the small tithes with the parsonage and glebe. Tithes are no longer, as formerly, paid in kind, but are commuted for a money payment.

Under the Act 6 and 7 William IV. cap. 71, commutation may be effected through the Tithes Commissioners either by a voluntary parochial agreement, or by a compulsory award. In the latter case the basis of commutation is the clear average value for seven years of the tithes of the parish.

Title.—A name importing the sphere of spiritual work to which a clergyman is ordained. From a very early time there has been a rule that bishops shall not ordain a person unless he has some definite work in view, so that every candidate must, prior to his ordination, obtain a title.

The Thirty-third Canon of the Church of England says thus:—"It hath been long since provided by many decrees of the ancient Fathers, that none should be admitted, either deacon or priest, who hath not first some certain place where he might use his function. According to which examples, we do ordain, that henceforth no person shall be admitted in Sacred Orders, except he shall at that time exhibit to the bishop, of whom he desireth imposition of hands, a presentation of himself to some ecclesiastical preferment then void in that diocese."

Titular.—A term applied to a person who has merely a title to a benefice, not having yet entered on its privileges.

Toland, John.—A Deistical writer, born at Redcastle, in Ireland, 1669; d. 1722. He discarded the Roman faith, in which he had been brought up, before he was sixteen, and was educated at Glasgow and Edinburgh. From thence he went to Leyden, where he studied with a view to becoming a Nonconformist minister. One of his masters here was Spanheim [q.v.]. Here also he made the acquaintance of Leibnitz, and on his return to England he commenced the work which he published in 1696 under the title Christianity not Mysterious, in which he avowed his sceptical principles. It made a great sensation, and was censured by Convocation. To escape obloquy he revisited his native country, where he was assailed with even greater violence than in England; the Irish Parliament not only voted his book to be burnt by the hangman, but ordered its author to be prosecuted by the Attorney-General. He was therefore obliged to return to England, and soon after his arrival in London he published a life of Milton and a treatise entitled Amyntor, in which he attacked the authenticity of the received canon of Scripture. He afterwards went to reside in Hanover, and while there published, in 1702, Vindiciae Liberi, a defence of himself against the judgment of Convocation, and in 1705 he openly avowed himself a Pantheist. In 1718 appeared his work entitled Nazarens, or Jewish Gentile, or Mahometan Christianity, in which he stated his own views of primitive Christianity. This was followed in 1720 by a Latin tract called Pantheisticæ, which subjected him to the charge of atheism; and by Tetradygnus, in four parts, the second of which, on the exoteric and esoteric philosophy of the ancients, is deemed one of his most learned and valuable productions; in the conclusion of this work he professed his preference of the Christian religion, pure and unmixed, to all others. His posthumous works were published in 2 vols. 8vo in 1726, and again in 1747, with an account of his life and writings by Des Maizieux. In his latter years he suffered both from literary and pecuniary struggles. An account of the forms one of the chapters in Disraeli's Cata ties of Authors.

Toledo, Councils of.—Toledo is a famous old city in Spain, and is still the seat of archbishopric. Many Church Synods were held there. About the date of the first council there is much difference of opinion but it was probably called about 400. Patrons, Bishop of Toledo, in the pontificate of Anastasius, to pass decrees against the Priscillianists. Another was called for the same purpose in 447 by Leo the Great.

That, however, known as the Seco Council of Toledo was held in 531, under the presidency of the Archbishop Montanus, a few Canons were passed concerning ecclesiastical discipline, which had much relaxed under the Arian princes.

The Third Council of Toledo was held after the conversion of the Goths from Arianism in order to fortify the people in their creed and bring the discipline of the Church in better form. It was held in 589, and Leander, Bishop of Seville; there were six great three prelates present, besides five proconsul for those who were absent. King Reccared, who had been converted that year, ordered fast of three days to be kept before the opening of the assembly; three-and-twenty important Canons were passed against Arianism and the same number on matters of Church. The second Council enjoined repeating the Creed before receiving the Communion and the eleventh regulated Penance. The Synod was closed with an eloquent address by Leander on the conversion of the Goths. Two smaller Synods were held in 597 to guard the sobriety of priests, and in 610 settle the primacy upon the See of Toledo.

The Fourth Council of Toledo was held in 633, under the presidency of St. Isidore; discussed both discipline and doctrine, a seventy-five Canons were made regarding the rights of the king. It was attended by seventy-two bishops.

The Fifth Council was convened in 6 under Eugenius of Toledo; twenty bishops were present, and nine Canons were passed confirming the decrees of the last assembly.

The Sixth Council, in 638, met to secure the orthodox faith, and amongst other thing, a Canon was made that none but Catholic should be allowed to live in Spain. Sylv Archibishop of Narbonne, was president, at fifty-two bishops attended.

The Seventh Council was in 646; the eighth in 653, when measures were taken against Jews and heretics; the ninth, in 65; the tenth, in 656; the eleventh, in 675, settled the better partition of the diocese, and denounced the licentiousness of the priests; the twelfth, in 681, consisted of thirty-five prelates, presided over by Julian, Archbishop of Toledo; it confirmed King Erwig's title.
it over not only theological but political writings. In Queen Elizabeth's reign the right of printing was confined to the few presses in London, Cambridge, and Oxford which held royal licences, and in 1637 a decree of the Star Chamber limited the number of printers in the whole country to twenty, and of typefounders to four, and the work of these was subject to the strictest supervision. The danger to life and liberty into which a dissector from Roman doctrine ran in the days of Queen Mary was transferred to Roman Catholics themselves under Queen Elizabeth. Not only so, but the animosities which divided Protestant from Protestant were no better. Barnes, a Lutheran, who himself had been imprisoned for heresy, impeached Lambert for heresy concerning the Sacrament in the days of Henry VIII., and procured his burning, and no sect recognised any shadow of divisions from its own standards. While the Romanist regarded all outside his dominion as outcasts from grace, the Anglican could only extend the terms of salvation to those who took the Sacraments from the Apostolically ordained minister, Lutherans anathematised those who denied the Real Presence, Calvin burned the Unitarian Servetus, and the Unitarians were uncompromising against those who denied the inspiration of the Scriptures. When the Star Chamber was abolished in 1640 the right which it had exercised was claimed by the Parliament, which pursued the same policy by an ordinance for the regulation of printing. When the Westminster Assembly met in 1643, the Independents proposed that all sects should be tolerated, but the Presbyterians successfully opposed them, and the Westminster Confession [c. 28] asserts the duty of the magistrate to promote the true religion, and to restrain and punish heresy. That the Independents themselves had not learned to practise the principles of religious freedom is evident from the history of their proceedings in New England. "From the Reformation to the Commonwealth," says Bishop Heber, "there is abundant proof that, much as every religious party in its turn had suffered from persecution, and loudly and bitterly as each had, in its own particular instance, complained of the severities exercised against its members, no party had yet been found to perceive the great wickedness of persecution in the abstract, or the moral unfitness of temporal punishment as an engine of religious controversy. Even the sects who were themselves under oppression exclaimed against their rulers, not as being persecutors at all, but as persecuting those who professed the truth; and each sect as it obtained the power to wield the secular weapon, esteemed it also a duty as well as a privilege not to bear the sword in vain." The first home of religious liberty was Holland, where the keen discussions that went on opened the eyes of religious men to the Toleration.—The liberty allowed in countries which have an established religion, to persons holding other views or opinions, to such publicly their own tenets, and to worship in the mode of their own choice, or not at all. Such liberty is so entirely taken for granted in the conditions under which we live, that it is difficult to realise how different was the state of things in former times. It is fair to the Church of Rome to reckon intolerance as her special monopoly, though it may fairly be claimed for the Reformation and Toleration only became possible under...

It was no cruelty on the part of the authorities of the Church previously which led them to punish with fine, imprisonment, and death those who challenged the received doctrines. For as a State claims to itself the right to imprison thieves and hang murderers, so it was believed that there was a like duty to punish those who depraved morals and ruined the souls of men. A man who wilfully poisons soul was as sinful as he who wilfully poisons body. And the Church of Rome, holding self to be infallible, and its doctrines to be necessary to salvation, proclaimed it her duty to visit with the heaviest penalties those who fall into heresy concerning the faith delivered to the Church. It also appears possible that the mode of execution by burning, so constantly adopted, had in it originally some idea of expiating, by burning on earth, sins which it was held deserved eternal torment in the same kind in a most literal sense. It does not, therefore, surprise us that some of the gentlest of men were uncompromising persecutors;" such men were St. Francis de Sales and Sir Thomas More. It was the dislike with which men came to regard this claim to infallibility, which led them to deny the right of any man, or body of men, to be regarded as an authority over consciences. We can therefore do justice to men like St. Dominic, and some of the promoters of the Inquisition, whilst we thank God that their day of persecution is over.

But the rejection of Roman infallibility was by no means the signal for general toleration. When Henry VIII. destroyed the Pope's authority in England he took it to himself, continued the censorship of books, and extended...
sacredness of the conscience. But the greatest apostle of toleration in England was John Milton, whose Areopagitica: a Defence of the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing, published in November, 1644, is perhaps the noblest pamphlet in our language. "The principle for which he contended," writes Professor Morley, "is that upon which all healthy growth and national prosperity, in its true sense, must depend. He took for his model an oration written to be read, which was addressed by Isocrates to the Areopagus, the great Council of Athens. Isocrates called on the Parliament of Athens to undo acts of its own; Milton was making a like call on the Areopagus of England." [Preface to Famous Pamphlets]. The first, however, to lay down unflinchingly this great principle was Roger Williams [q.v.]; and other works which have promoted the cause of the slowly learned lesson of Toleration have been Bishop Jeremy Taylor's Liberty of Prophesying, Barclay's Apology for the Quakers, Locke's Treatise on Toleration, Sydney Smith's Peter Pymule's Letters, Dr. Martin's Rationale of Religious Enquiry, and John Stuart Mill's Essay on Liberty. The result may be summed up in the language of Mr. Froude:—"An enlarged experience of one another has taught believers of all sects that their differences need not be pressed into mortal hatred; and we have been led forward unconsciously into a recognition of a broader Christianity than as yet we are able to profess, in the respectful acknowledgment of excellence wherever excellence is found. Where we see piety, contention, courage, self-forgetfulness, there, or not far off, we know is the Spirit of the Almighty; and, as we look around us among our living contemporaries, or look back with open eyes into the history of the past, we see that God is no respecter of denominations any more than He is a respecter of persons. His highest gifts are shed abroad with an even hand among the sects of Christendom, and petty distinctions of opinion melt away and become invisible in the fulness of a larger truth."

The question of Toleration came under discussion in 1883, when a ribald publication was sold in the streets of London assailing in grossly indecent fashion the life and works of Christ. The Incanteration, the Sermon on the Mount, the Crucifixion, were all used as subjects of hideous and brutal caricatures. The consequence was a prosecution for blasphemy, and the defence was that the doctrines assailed had been called in question and denied by many eminent men without their right being disputed. The judge, in summing up to the jury, laid down the principle that religious liberty gives no permission to violate the rights of others, or to infringe laws designed for the protection of decency, morality, and good order. The jury found the authors guilty, and they were sentenced to imprisonment, and the Times newspaper next day commented in the following words which may be taken as expressing the general opinion of thoughtful men of all religion denominations:—"What we really punish is the law of blasphemous libel is an offence against public decency, and until we have other means of dealing with that nuisance we need not be alarmed by outcries about danger to free speech. We allow a man to differ from any other person, public or private, as he pleases; but we do not allow him to lay his opinions couched in offensive language on the ears of passers-by. We do not punish man for having a foul and prurient imagination, but we do punish him at once if he produces indecent pictures upon our notice in the street. Liberty of clothing is as complete a liberty of speech, but if a man wishes to dispense with clothing altogether we compell him to gratify his taste in private. So respect of religion, there is no conceivable latitude of view in which a man may not indulge un molested, so long as he does not wantonly outrage the feelings of others, whose rights are as much entitled to consideration as his own. The law of blasphemy as laid down by Mr. Justice North, and as practically applied in this country during the present century, is a law for the protection of liberty."

Toleration Act.—This Act was passed on May 24th, 1689. Its object was to exempt all Protestants dissenting from the Church of England from the penalties of the Act of Uniformity, the Conventicle, and Five Mile Acts. The Nonconformists, on taking the oaths to the Government, were permitted to free exercise of their religious opinions, and those already convicted under the Acts were set at liberty. No meeting was, however, to be held with closed doors. Papists, and those denying the doctrines of the Trinity were to derive no benefit from the Act. The places of worship were to be registered at the Bishop's or Archdeacon's Court, and the certificates were to be granted for opening these places of meeting.

Tongues, Gift of.—There are two main explanations which have been given of the wonderful Gift of Tongues on the Day of Pentecost as recorded in Acts ii. The one is that the diversities of tongues was given to the Apostles to enable them to preach the Gospel in various languages all over the world, and this is the view taken by the late Bishop Wordsworth. But this is not state in Scripture, and will hardly harmonise with 1 Cor. xiv. 1-16, where St. Paul says tongue are for a sign only. As a matter of fact, the Greek language, from the time of Alexander's conquests, was understood all over the civilised world, and it will be remembered that the Epistles of the New Testament to the Romans and Asians, as well as to the Greeks.
all written in that language. There is no need of such a gift, and certainly there is no evidence that the early mission-aries ever received it. The second view is that the Tongues were for a sign, not for permanent use. They seem to have been not speeches, but short outpourings of praise, the Spirit gave them utterance." The text of speech is that which distinguishes it. Supernatural speech was therefore a dge of a new life and power in men. It is a sign of gifts of utterance, of knowledge and spiritual insight, a pledge of the fulfilment of the Lord's promise that His Spirit would ch them without help of men. Though tongues were not an entire fulfilment of that promise, they were a sign of it. If Apostles could speak with other tongues, you might believe that they could speak with erhuman wisdom. Most of all, the tongues were used as a means of praising God [Acts ii. iv.

For this was the highest work God witted to the tongue [Ps. civ. 1], and when the Spirit had descended upon humed man, to this work it was first applied. The view of the matter is well set forth in the non by the late Rev. F. W. Robertson on subject; and it is also apparent from the stle to the Corinthians that the gift was lia to excess, and when so indulged was likely caud to injurious reflections. Paul, therefor to place the gift of tongues in a very ordary rank compared with that of intelletial "prophesying," and it is well to bear a distinction in mind. For the alleged term revival of this gift, see Irvingites.

Tonsure [corona clericalis].—A shaved head has been from very ancient date one of the specific distinctions of the clergy of Roman Catholic and Greek Churches. Early Christian teachers, however, did not yet the practice, in order to distinguish themselves from the heathen priests. It was till the sixth century that the fashion of shaving the head, with many other peculiarities of the monks, was adopted by seculars. A difference was then made between shaved forehead, which was called tonsure of Apostle Paul, and a shaved crown, called corona of the Apostle Peter; the former being common with the Greeks, Britons, and h; the latter in the Roman Church and the countries under its influence. At the held in Toledo in 633 the latter mode formally prescribed, and called corona calia; since then the Roman tonsure has ained common to the secular clergy and in the West of Europe, and furnishes means to distinguish the higher from the er clergy, as the extent of tonsure in-

Tonsure is a necessary preliminary to entering the clerical state, whether secular or religious; in the former case it is conferred by the bishop of the diocese, in the latter by the head of the religious house. It invests the receiver with all the privileges of a cleric.

Toplady, Augustus Montague [b. in 1740 at Farnham in Surrey; d. in London, 1778].—He was educated first at Westminster and then at Dublin University. Very early in life he took up decided religious views, and wrote some sacred poetry. In 1762 he was ordained, and became Vicar of Broad Hembury in Devonshire in 1768, where most of his hymns were composed. He was practically a Calvinistic Methodist, and on this point got into hot controversy with John Wesley, in which he used very bitter and unbecoming language. He was a very weakly man, and under medical advice he removed to London in 1775; here he preached for three years in a private chapel with some success till his death. Most of his hymns were published whilst in London. He was the author of the well-known hymn, "Rock of Ages, cleft for me;" it was first published in 1776, in the Gospel Magazine, of which Toplady was at that time the editor. Another of his hymns is "Your harps, ye trembling saints, Down from the willows take." A complete edition of his verses was published by D. Sedgwick in 1860.

Torquemada, Juan de A Spaniard [b. 1388, d. 1468].—He was present at the Council of Basel. He is the author of a book on The Conception of Mary the Mother of God. He was made a Cardinal in 1439.

Torquemada, Thomas de [b. 1420, d. 1498].—A Dominican who became famous by establishing the Inquisition in Spain in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabella. He was made Grand Inquisitor in 1483, an office he held for fifteen years. He was an extremely cruel man; it is said that during his tenure of office nearly 9,000 victims were burnt at the stake. He was instrumental in procuring the banishment of the Jews from Spain to the number of 100,000.

Tractarian Movement.—The name given to the religious revival which commenced in Oxford in 1833. Two influences were at work in causing it. One was the tendency to Rationalism brought about by the study of German theologians; the other, the perfunctory way in which the clergy performed their clerical duties. Pluralists abounded, and there was a general spirit of money-getting abroad amongst the clergy. The rubrics were not carried out; there was no daily service, except in the cathedrals: the Holy Communion was administered only at long intervals, and, altogether, Church life was at a very low ebb.
The Reform Bill of 1831, with its political Liberalism, had made a deep impression, especially on some of the clergy of Oxford, and roused them up to a defence of the Established Church. The leaders of the movement were two celebrated Fellows of Oriel—John Keble and John Henry Newman, with whom were joined Richard Hurrell Froude, Arthur Philip Perceval, Frederick William Faber, William Palmer of Magdalen and William Palmer of Worcester, Edward Bouverie Pusey, and Isaac Williams. To these must be added one great Cambridge name, that of HUGH JAMES ROSE [q.v.].

Keble, by the publication in 1827 of the Christian Year, had exercised an immense influence. His was a singularly beautiful personal character, and to him the Church of England was the only possible Church. Newman, till the age of twenty-one, had been brought up under Calvinistic influences. Richard Hurrell Froude was a man of versatile genius, but of no real depth, very impetuous, the "knight-errant" of his party, and he undoubtedly led Newman towards Rome. These three men had, between 1828 and 1833, been gradually approaching towards a definite plan of action. On July 14th, 1833, Keble preached an assize sermon, entitled National Apostasy, which so moved Newman that a meeting was at once agreed on, at which the method of action should be decided. This meeting took place at Hadleigh, where Hugh James Rose was the rector, and at which all those named above were present except Faber, Pusey, and Williams. They had previously published a book called The Church's Manual, in which they had prominently brought forward the significance of the Sacraments and the importance of the priesthood; this manual they now revised, and as a means for further teaching Newman started the idea of Tracts for the Times, which were to be backed by higher pulpit teaching. Newman is called the Tractarian par excellence. Of the ninety which were published in the course of eight years he wrote twenty-eight. In 1835 Pusey, who at first had held aloof from the movement, came into the ranks with his tract on Baptism; he was a man of higher standing than the rest, being Hebrew Professor, a D.D., and a Canon of Christchurch. His accession gave the movement name and force, and originated the term Puseyite, which was so long the epithet of a High Churchman. In 1838 the Bishop of Oxford animadverted on the Tracts, but he did not oppose their publication; but the opposition waxed louder year by year, especially on the publication, in 1839, by Newman and Keble, of R. H. Froude's Remains (he having died in 1836). This book contained words of the strongest character against the Reformation, and opened the eyes of many who had hitherto doubted as to the tendency of the movement. In 1841 came the celebrated Tract 90, from the pen of Newman which was said to teach that a man must subscribe the Thirty-nine Articles even if he held the doctrines of the Church of Rome. This raised a tremendous storm in Oxford. Four Tutors published a protest against it, it was censured by the Heads of Houses. It was the last of the Tracts. The Bishop of Oxford, Dr. Bagot, wrote to Newman qusting that the series might cease, Newman immediately yielded. Though their publication made so much noise at the time, the Tracts are now but little read, those who do read them wonder that they should have caused so much excitement.

Tradition. — Something handed down from one generation to another. In the Church the term includes customs, forms, rites and ceremonies which have been transmitted by oral communication. The Jews say that, besides their written law contained in the Old Testament, Moses delivered an oral law which was conveyed from father to son, and at length embodied in the Talmud; the Roman Catholics hold particular doctrines, supposed to have descended in like manner from Apostolic times, and they quote in support of this 2 Thess. ii. 15 and 1 Cor. xi. 2, where the word "ordinances" might be more strictly translated "traditions." The Thirty-fourth Article lays down the Church's opinion regarding traditions; it does not mean that we may vary our doctrines or adopt fresh ones as matters of faith, but by its "traditions and ceremonies" is obviously meant those customs which, though not actually named in the Scriptures, nor in the written law or rubrics of the Church, have by long-established use become settled facts. Among these we may mention the custom of bowing in the Creed at the name of Jesus, the postures customary in various church offices, the use of a doxology and collects after the sermon, the pouring of water on the head at baptism, the saying or singing of the Psalms, and other matters of long usage, which, though unwritten, are held to be obligatory as standing customs of the Church.

Traditors. — Those who, in time of persecution—notably under Diocletian—to avoid martyrdom delivered up their Bibles or any of the ornaments and utensils of the Church to their persecutors. They were generally timorous priests, and were punished by the Church with dismissal from office. The Donatists considered the Traditors on a level with the worst heretics, and separated from the Catholic Church on the ground that it tolerated them.

Traducians [Lat. traduco, "I transmit"][1].—A name which the Pelagians gave to the orthodox Christians because they held original sin ex traduce, or conveyed from the parents to the children. The term is also applied to those who hold that souls are also transmitted to children by their parents. This opinion was first put forward by Tertullian and opposed by the Creationists, who teach God's agency in the origin of each human soul.

Trajan, Persecution of.—Trajan reigned from A.D. 98 to A.D. 117. He was not actively hostile to the Church, as is evident from his celebrated correspondence with Pliny, and indeed he was too much occupied with wars and conquests to give much attention to an obscure body like the Christians; but though no persecuting edict was issued, there was during his reign a great amount of persecution. Even when there were no laws in force against Christians, governors in search of popularity might easily satisfy the clamours of the people, and convict them of disaffection to the Government when they refused to swear by the name of Caesar or sacrifice to his image, more especially as they were often known to speak of the kingdom of Christ. The hatred of the people, sedulously kept up by their priests, broke out frequently on occasions of excitement, such as the public games, and caused numerous martyrdoms.

About the year 111, Trajan received from Pliny, Governor of Bithynia, a letter inquiring how he wished the Christians to be dealt with. The Emperor's reply, though not altogether unfavourable, certainly did not check the spread of persecution. He answered that Christians were not to be sought for, nor condemned on anonymous charges, but if brought before the Governor and convicted they were to suffer death.

The two most eminent martyrs of this reign were Simeon, Bishop of Jerusalem, and St. Ignatius [q.v.], Bishop of Antioch. Simeon was the brother and successor of James the Less, and venerated by his people for his relationship to our Lord. In the year 104 he was denounced to Atticus, Governor of Syria, by the Gnostic heretics, as a Christian and a descendant of David. The firmness with which the old man, now 120 years of age, endured several days of torture, filled the Governor with astonishment, but did not move him to pity; he was condemned to suffer death by crucifixion.

It is probably to the reign of Trajan that the following story, related by Tertullian, belongs:—Arrius Antoninus, Proconsul Asia, persecuted the Christians of his province with such rigor, that at last they came in a body and gave themselves after putting a few of them to death, dismissed the rest with the words, "Misera people, if you prefer death, you may find pecipices and halter enough."

Tralles or Trallis.—A town near Ephesus, to the inhabitants of which Ignatius wrote one of his epistles.

Transfiguration, Feast of.—One of the greater festivals of the Roman Catholic Church, appointed to be kept on August 6 in memory of the glorification of Christ on Mount Tabor. The institution of the feast was very ancient, but its observance was made more solemn by Calixtus III. in 1415 when he attached to it indulgences in memory of a victory gained over the Turks.

Translation.—The term applied to the removal of a bishop from one See to another.

Transmigration of the Soul.—The doctrine of the passage of the soul from one body into another, had its foundation in the belief of the connection of all living beings and of the gradual purification of the spirit part of man, and its return to the common source and origin of all things. God, the earthly life, according to this system, is a point in the succession of states through which the soul, proceeding from God, has passed in order at last to return to its original source. Pious men—for example, Herder—have thought that many reasons were to be found for a belief in such a transmigration, which is also taught in the Talmud. The religion of the ancient people of India, which the first traces of this belief are found in, considers it partly as a decree of destitution partly as a punishment for the neglect of religious duties, in consequence of which the soul is made to pass after death through the bodies of various animals by way of purification. From the Indians this belief passed on to the doctrine of the Egyptian caste priests, who believed that the soul had to continue three thousand years after death, in the bodies of animals before it could reach the habitations of the blessed. From them the Greeks received the doctrine, and termed metempsychosis ["change of soul"], and metamorphosis ["change of body"]. Pythagoras adopted it into his philosophy as indicative of the immortality of the human soul; the later Pythagoreans taught that the mind, free from the fetters of the body, will enter the realm of the departed, there remain in an intermediate state for a longer or shorter time, and again animate other human animal bodies, until the time of its purification is finished and its return to the Fount of Life has become possible. The Greco-mysteries enveloped the doctrine of the transmigration of the soul in myths, which represent Dionysos or Bacchus as the rd and leader of the soul. In these also belief in a pre-existence is to be discovered, for they distinguish souls who are given from their ethereal or heavenly life own to earth, to appear for the first time as men, from the souls in a state of penance which were obliged to enter a human body a second and third time, and also from those souls which voluntarily come to the earth from curiosity, or delight in individuality. The Greek poets and philosophers have given various forms to these myths. Pindar, the ythagorean, lets the soul return to bliss after passing three unblemished lives on earth. Plato extends the period for the return of souls to God to ten thousand years, during which time they inhabit the bodies of men and animals. Among the Romans, Cicero and Virgil allude to this doctrine. The Rabbis maintain that God created only a certain number of Jewish souls, which therefore constantly return to earth as long as Jews are to be found here, and that as a chance they sometimes have to inhabit animals, but that on the Day of Resurrection they will all be purified and revive in the bodies of the just on the soil of the Promised land. The sect of the Manicheans also denounced the transmigration of the soul as a chance, and this belief existed among the ancient Druids and Scythians, and is still entertained by the heathens of Eastern Asia, the ascetic tribes, the savages of America, and the negroes. With the Hindoos it has led to the veneration of certain animals, and the abode of departed ancestors or friends.

There are passages in the Apocrypha which indicate that there were holders of the doctrine of Transmigration among the Jews, and a John ix. 2 it seems indicated in the disciples' question. [See Dean Plumptre's note 1 that passage in the Bible for English readers.] The doctrine has still advocates; and Charles Kingsley hints it in his well-known book The Water Babies.

Transubstantiation [Latin trans, over; and substantia, “a substance”].—The roman doctrine that in the Holy Eucharist the bread and wine, by the act of consecration, become the Body and Blood of Christ. The word itself is scholastic, and came into use in the eleventh century during the Berengarian controversy [Berengarians], and was defended by the leading schoolmen, and authoritatively adopted at the lateran Council under Innocent III. in 1215. The decree states, “The true Body and Blood of Christ are verily contained in the Sacrament of the altar under the appearances of bread and wine, so bread being transubstantiated into the Body and the wine into the Blood by Divine power.” At the thirteenth session of the Council of Trent the doctrine was categorically reaffirmed. [Trent.] But when we go back into an early period of mediaeval times there is clear evidence that the doctrine was unknown. Thus a Canon, probably of the age of Theodore [668-689], speaks of the body of Christ as being present, not substantially but spiritually; the Council of Celceth, A.D. 816, speaks of the elements as inferior in sanctity to relics, and in the Homilies of Alfric, written about 987, is the following passage: “Housel is Christ’s body, not corporally but spiritually; not the body in which He suffered, but that body of which He spoke when He blessed bread and wine for house.”

The Roman Catholics do not deny that the term “Transubstantiation” is of mediaeval origin, but they contend that the doctrine expressed thereby is implied in Holy Scripture, and was held in the primitive Church. The cardinal passages on which they rely are the words of institution [Matt. xxvi. 26-28; Mark xiv. 22-24; Luke xxii. 19-20; 1 Cor. xi. 24-25], and the discourse in the synagogue of Capernaum [John vi. 26-71]. We may quote Milner’s End of Controversy for an authoritative statement of their view:—

“Christ explained and promised this Divine mystery near one of the Paschs [John vi. 4], previous to His institution of it. He then multiplied five loaves and two fishes so as to afford a superabundant meal to five thousand men, besides women and children [Matt. xiv. 21], which was an evident sign of the future multiplication of His own person on the several altars of the world; after which He took occasion to speak of this mystery, by saying: ‘I am the living bread, which came down from heaven. If any man eat of this bread, he shall live for ever: and the bread that I will give is My flesh, for the life of the world’ [John vi. 51]. The Sacred Text goes on to inform us of the perplexity of the Jews from their understanding Christ’s words in their plain and natural sense, which He, so far from removing by a different explanation, confirms by expressing that sense in other terms still more emphatical. ‘The Jews, therefore, strove amongst themselves, saying, How can this man give us His flesh to eat? Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I said unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you. For My flesh is meat indeed, and My blood is drink indeed.’ [Ver. 52, 53, 55.] Nor was it the multitude alone who took offence at this mystery of a real and corporal reception of Christ’s person, so energetically and repeatedly expressed by Him, but also several of His own beloved disciples, whom certainly He would not have permitted to desert Him to their own destruction, if He could have removed their difficulty, by barely telling them that they were only to receive Him by faith, and to take bread and wine in remembrance of Him. Yet this merciful Saviour permitted them to go their way; and contented Himself with asking the Apostles if they would also leave Him? They were as incapable of comprehending the mystery as the others were, but they were assured that Christ is ever to be credited upon His word, and accordingly they made that generous act of faith which every true Christian will also make, who seriously and devotedly considers the Sacred Text before us. 'Many, therefore, of his disciples, when they had heard this, said: This is a hard saying: who can hear it?' From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him. Then Jesus said to the twelve: Will ye also go away? Then Simon Peter answered him: Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life.' [Ver. 60, 66, 67, 68.]

"The Apostles, thus instructed by Christ's express and repeated declaration as to the nature of this Sacrament when He promised it to them, were prepared for this sublime simplicity of His words in instituting it. For whilst they were at supper, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples and said, Take ye and eat: This is my body. And taking the chalice He gave thanks, and gave to them, saying: Drink ye all of this; for this is my blood of the New Testament, which shall be shed for many unto the remission of sins' [Matt. xxvi. 26, 27, 28]. This account of St. Matthew is repeated by St. Mark [xiv. 22-24] and nearly word for word by St. Luke [xxii. 19, 20] and by St. Paul [1 Cor. xi. 23-25], who adds, 'Wherefore whosoever shall eat this bread or drink the chalice of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord ... and eateth and drinketh judgment (the Protestant Bible says 'damnation') to himself,' [1 Cor. xi. 27, 29]. To the native evidence of these texts I shall add but two words. First, supposing it possible that Jesus Christ had deceived the Jews of Capharnaum, and even His disciples, and His very Apostles, in the solemn asseverations that He, six times over, repeated of His real and corporal presence in the Sacrament, when He promised to institute it; can any believe that He would continue the deception on His dear Apostles, in the very act of instituting it, and when He was on the point of leaving them? In short, when He was bequeathing them the legacy of His love. In the next place, what propriety is there in St. Paul's heavy denunciations of profaning Christ's person, and of damnation on the part of unworthy communicants, if they partook of it only by faith and in figure? For, after all, the paschal lamb which the people of God had by His command every year eaten since their deliverance out of Egypt, and which the Apostles themselves ate before they received the Blessed Eucharist, was, as a mere figure and an incident to faith, far more striking than eating and drinking bread and wine are: hence guilt of profaning the paschal lamb, and numerous other figures of Christ, would be less heinous than profaning the Sacrament if He were not really there."

It is clear that the doctrine of Transubstantiation implies a stupendous and continuous miracle. It is not only above reason, but contradicts the evidence of the senses. This is met by the Scholastic distinction between "substance" and "accidents." The accidents are those of bread and wine, but the substance is changed. The material is so spiritual that wherever the Mass is solemnised a miraculous change takes place, simultaneous all over the world, and Christ's whole person—body, soul, and spirit—is received by ecclesiastics and lay communicants. One of the hymns of Tho.

A sumente non concusus,
Non contractus, non divisus, Integer acceptor.

Sumit unus, sumunt mille
Quantum isti, tantum ille,
Nec sumptus consumitur.

Sumunt boni, sumunt mali,
Sorte tamen inaequali
Vitae vel interitus.

One of the most acute divines who replied to Dr. Milner was an American prelate, J. H. Hopkins, Bishop of Vermont. Rom Catholics, he contends, talk triumphantly their adherence to the very letter of Christ's words. But they cannot interpret the words without admitting a figure of speech at the outset. For when Christ said, "This is my blood, which is shed for you," the literal meaning does not agree with the question fact that His blood was actually shed until the following day. The St. Luke varies the phrase, and gives us words of institution, "This cup is the New Testament in my blood." There was no literal covenant written in blood. Consequently argument derived from the strict letter did nothing to decide the controversy. Next, Hopkins adduces nearly fifty texts from the New Testament, in which the word to be employed in a figurative and symbolical sense. He contends that the view of the Reformed Church is as high as that of the Romanist, in the true spiritual incorporation of the soul with Christ. The supposed char gives no superiority in the essential privilege of the blessed gift. He then quotes the commentary of the great St. Augustine on John against Milner:—

"Now here let us pause a little that may have the benefit of St. Augustine's commentary. And this you are perfectly aware that you are bound to respect, since your Council of Trent forbids the Scriptures to be understood except according to the unanimous sent of the Fathers. Thus, then, this prince the Fathers expounds the passage, and my readers will find it, I trust, instructive and interesting, notwithstanding that it is directly the face of the carnal literal sense for which Dr. Milner contends.

"After quoting the words of the Saviour, except ye eat my flesh and drink my blood ye have no life in you, Augustine proceeds to say: 'His disciples were offended—not all, indeed, but the greater part—saying in themselves, This is a hard saying. Who can hear? But when the Lord knew this in Himself, and heard the murmurings of their thoughts, he answered to the thinkers, who had not spoken, that they might know that they were heard, and might cease to think so. That, then, does He answer? Does this offend you? What and if you shall see the Son of Man ascending up where He was before? What does this mean by the question, Dost this offend you? do you think that I am about to divide this body which you behold into parts, and cut my members into pieces, and give them to you? that, therefore, and if you shall see the Son of an ascending up where He was before? Certainly, He who could ascend entire could not have consumed. Therefore, He gave us the literal refection of His body and blood, and solved at once the great question of His integrity. Let those eat who eat, let those drink who drink, let them hunger and thirst; let them eat life, let them drink life. Eat, that is to be renewed; but you are sooned that the source of your renewal may not be diminished. To drink this, what is it but to live? Eat life, drink life, you shall possess life, and that life is entire. Then the body and blood of Christ will be to every one of you, if that which is visibly taken in the sacrament shall be spiritually eaten and spiritually drunk in the truth itself. (Si quid in sacramento visibiliter sumitur in veritate spiritualiter manuaretur spiritualiter bibatur.)' For we have heard the Lord himself saying, It is the Spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing. The words which I have spoken unto you are spirit and life.' Here we see that Augustine applies the language of the Saviour to the sacrament, so as perfectly to destroy the idea of transubstantiation. The flesh profiteth nothing. It is the Spirit which quickeneth. And, therefore, that eating and drinking which is figural is not corporal, but spiritual. But the following passage will show his meaning yet more clearly:—"If a preceptive speech, saith his eminent Father, 'either forbids a crime, or a sin, or orders something useful or beneficial, it is not figurative. If it appears to order a crime or a sin, it is figurative. Unless you shall eat, saith our Lord, the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you. Here he seems to order a crime, an outrage, and, therefore, it is a figure, directing the communion of our Lord's passion, and that we should sweetly and usefully lay up in our memory that for us His flesh was crucified and wounded.'

"Thus we see that the sixth chapter of St. John's Gospel, instead of bearing the carnal and literal meaning which the modern Romanist puts upon it, was interpreted figuratively by the greatest light of the primitive Church in the fourth century. And the same result will be shown in reference to the next Scriptural proof which your author cites from the Gospels." [The passage from Milner is given above.]

"Now, let us see how the Fathers interpret this; whether literally, with the modern Romanist, or figuratively and spiritually, with the Church of England. Thus saith the same great Augustine: 'If the Sacraments had not a certain similitude of those things of which they are the Sacraments, they could not be Sacraments at all. But from this similitude, for the most part, they take the names of the things themselves. Therefore, according to a certain mode, the Sacrament of Christ's Body is the Body of Christ, and the Sacrament of Christ's Blood is the Blood of Christ, and, in like manner, the Sacrament of Faith' (meaning Baptism) 'is Faith. Hence, the Apostle saith, speaking of Baptism, We are buried by Baptism into death. He does not say, We have set forth the Sign of Burial, but he saith, We are buried. He calls the Sacrament of the thing by the word belonging to the thing itself.'

"Augustine, elsewhere, applies this directly as follows: 'Our Lord,' saith he, 'did not hesitate to say, This is my body, when He gave them the sign of His body.' The same interpretation precisely was given to the language of our blessed Saviour by all the other primitive witnesses. Thus, Tertullian saith: 'The Lord, in the Gospel, showed bread, calling it His Body, in order that you might thence understand Him to have given to the bread the figure of His Body.' And again: 'Our Lord,' saith he, 'taking the bread, and distributing it to His disciples, made it His body by saying, This is My Body, that is, the figure of my body.' And that you may recognize an ancient figure of blood in wine, continues Tertullian, 'Isaiah will teach you, saying, Who is this that cometh from Edom with dyed garments from Bozrah? I have trodden the winepress alone—and their blood is sprinkled upon my garments. And still more clearly in the Book of Genesis, where Jacob, in the blessing of Judah, delineates Christ: He washed His robe in wine, and His garment in the blood of the grape, indicating His flesh in the clothing, and His blood in the wine. Thus, now He consecrates His blood in wine, as then He figured wine for His blood.'

"Cyprian, the Bishop and Martyr of Carthage, gives us another plain proof of the same doctrine. It appears that some foolish innovators, in his days, had undertaken to administer the Eucharist with water only, and he rebukes them in the following terms: 'I wonder greatly from whence this novelty has arisen, in certain places, that against the Evangelical and Apostolical discipline, water is offered in the cup of the Lord, which can never, by itself, express the blood of Christ.' For the water signifies the people; as the Divine Scripture declares in the Apocalypse: 'The waters which thou sawest, upon which the harlot sat, are peoples, and tribes, and nations, and tongues.' Which thing we behold contained in the Sacrament of the cup. For as Christ carried us all by bearing our sins, we see that THE PEOPLE ARE SIGNIFIED BY THE WATER, WHILE BY THE WINE HE SHOWS THE BLOOD OF CHRIST. Therefore, when the water is mixed with the wine in the cup, the people are united with Christ, and the whole host of believers is conjoined and incorporated with Him in whom they believe. And thus it is manifest that, in consecrating the chalice or cup, water alone cannot be offered, nor yet wine alone; for if any one offers wine alone, the blood of Christ begins to be without us; but if the water be alone, the people begin to be without Christ: but when both are mixed together, then the spiritual and celestial Sacrament is perfected.'

"Nothing can be more evident, from this decisive extract, than the entire agreement of Cyprian with Tertullian and Augustine. For he applies the same figurative language to the water, as signifying the people, and to the wine, as signifying the blood of Christ. And thus it is manifest that he could not have believed in Transubstantiation in the one, any more than he believed it in the other."

The repudiation of this doctrine by the Church of England is thus expressed in the Twenty-eighth Article: "Transubstantiation (or the change of the substance of Bread and Wine), in the Supper of the Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ; but it is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthrown the nature of a Sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions." Here, then, are four assertions: [1] That the Scriptural authority alleged by the Romish Church is not borne out—"cannot be proved by Holy Writ;" [2] that other passages of Scripture go against the doctrine; [3] that it contravenes the nature of a Sacrament; and [4] that it is the parent of superstitions. The first point has been already dealt with by Bishop Hopkins, but it may be well to cite a learned divine of our own country, Dr. Turton, formerly Regius Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, afterwards Bishop of Ely. His answer, published in 1637, to Cardinal Wiseman's discourses on the Real Presence [1836] is one of the most exhaustive treatises on the subject, and is devoted exclusively to the Scriptural passages named. The following extract is a fair specimen. It follows an examination of Dr. Wiseman's concession that our Lord was speaking Faith in His doctrine when He spoke of Bread in the early part of the chapter, but that changed His subject and meant Transubstantiation in the latter portion:—

"The truth is, that our Lord, through His ministry, employed the miracles wrought, and the events which daily occur as the means of instruction in the things appertaining to an endless existence; and availed Himself of them in such a manner that, whether the figurative import of His words was more or less intelligible to His countrymen, His meaning in many instances either by additional remarks at the time in subsequent conversation with His disciple became very clear. No one, however, can read the Gospels without perceiving that there were likewise instances in which His words, although not at the time understood, were—so far as we know, without the slightest explanation—to produce their effect—whence we can easily suppose they often would produce—on reflection, and in the after-time. We have, moreover, every reason to believe that, in the degrees of Divine knowledge afforded, as well as in the working of miracl especial regard was had to the various mystical dispositions of the people. The teachers were taught, while the obstinate were left in their ignorance; and without attempting to pry into the Divine councils, there are, even to our imperfect conception, distinct intimations that, in such a method of proceeding judgment was blended with mercy.

"After the miraculous supply of food to five thousand, as recorded in the opening John vi., our Lord—aware of the anxiety of the multitudes for a similar relief of their wants, and of the disregard of that Divine power from which the supply had come—began to admonish them respecting the spirit support of which they stood in need. They were seeking after 'the meat which perisheth' but they ought to labour for that 'which is the bread which endureth unto everlasting life.' That, indeed was the meat which He was come to give unto them; the true bread from heaven which 'giveth life unto the world.' He Himself that bread—'the bread of life,' be given to those who came to Him, a believed on Him. 'This,' He said, 'is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent.' 'He that cometh to Me shall never hunger; and he that believeth on Me shall never thirst.' And this is the will of Him that sent me, that everyone which seeth the Son, and believeth on Him, may have everlasting life.' 'Verily, verily, I say unto you he that believeth on Me hath everlasting life.' 'I am the bread of life.' He who thus declared Himself to be 'the bread of life' elsewhere called by St. John [1 John i. the word of life,' and towards the end this chapter [v. 68] is acknowledged by St. Peter to have had the words of eternal life.
No extraneous learning, then, is demanded to perceive that the important truths primarily intended to be inculcated were these—that to hear and believe were the great requisites on the part of men; and that spiritual sustenance, even unto life eternal, would be the corresponding gift on the part of God. And thus, as far at least as the fifty-first verse, this discourse may be considered to be an amplification, by means of a constant allusion to the bread of life, of what had been taught on another occasion: 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life.' [John v. 24] All this is so clear, that, till we come to the fifty-first verse, Roman Catholics and Protestants, as Dr. Wiseman truly remarks, are equally agreed that our Lord's discourse refers entirely to believing in Him. The truth is, that neither the hearers of that age nor the readers of the present can be deemed much more indebted, for their intelligence of the subject, to the above-mentioned expositions of the terms food and bread, than to the opinion in the Midrash Coheleth, previously referred to by Dr. Wiseman, that, as [Moses] the first Goel [deliverer] brought down manna—'so likewise will [the Messiah] the second Goel cause manna to descend.' In the art of interpreting, as well as in other arts, the time is at hand when it will be necessary to simplify our methods of proceeding very considerably."

Dr. Turton adduces the judgment of an eminent Roman Catholic commentator, the annotator of the Rhenish New Testament, that the Jewish misconception was not what Milner and Wiseman make it, but far more gross and carnal. "This carnality of theirs [the Jews] stood in two points especially: First, that they imagined that He would kill Himself, and eat and mangle His flesh into parts, and so give it them raw or roast to be eaten among them, 'which could not be meant,' saith St. Augustine, 'for that had contained an heinous and barbarous fact; and therefore they might, and should, have been assured that He would command no such thing; but some other west sense to be of His hard, mystical, or gurative words; and to be fulfilled in a sacrament, mystery, and a marvellous Divine art, otherwise than they could comprehend. Secondly, they did err touching His flesh, in that they took it to be the flesh of a mere man, and of a dead man also, when it should come to be eaten.' [From the note on John i. 63]"

The second dictum of the article, that transubstantiation is "contrary to the plain words of Scripture," would require a close examination of many passages of St. Paul's Epistles, especially the Corinthians. We can only refer to Bishop Wordsworth's learned commentary, which deals most fully with this subject, and may be taken as the latest expression of the Anglican view—the view held by a catena of the greatest divines from the Reformation downwards. On the two remaining points we will quote the weighty and pregnant comment of Bishop Beveridge:

"The third thing is, that it 'overthrew the nature of a Sacrament,' which I need not spend many words to prove; for in a Sacrament it is required, first, that there be some outward sign representing spiritual grace: whereas if the bread be really changed into the body of Christ there is no outward sign at all in the Sacrament, there being nothing else but the body and blood of Christ, which are not signs, but the thing signified. Nay, as Augustine observes, 'The signs themselves are the Sacraments,' and, therefore, where there is no sign there can be no Sacrament. And so, by depriving this sacred ordinance of its outward signs, they degrade it from being a Sacrament, making it to have nothing of the nature of a Sacrament in it. And, therefore, if they will still hold, that by the words of consecration the bread and wine are substantially changed into the body and blood of Christ, let them cease to call that holy action any longer a Sacrament, but name it 'the body and blood of Christ.' for, according to their opinion, there is nothing in it but the body and blood of Christ. So it is plain that by this doctrine the nature of a Sacrament in general must be destroyed, or this Sacrament in particular must be expunged out of their catalogue of Sacraments.

"The fourth and last thing here objected against the doctrine of Transubstantiation is, that 'it hath given occasion to many superstitions,' which any one that ever observed their customs and practices cannot but acknowledge. For this fond opinion possessing their brains, that the bread is the real body of Christ hung upon the cross, and pierced for their sins, oh! how zealous are they in wrapping it up neatly in their handkerchiefs, laying it up in their treasures, carrying it about in their processions; yea, and, at the length, in worshipping and adoring it too!""

Trapp, John [b. 1601, d. 1669], Rector of Weston-on-Avon, and author of a Commentary on the Bible, which has been recently reprinted and finds favour with the Evangelical clergy.

Trappe, La.—An abbey of the Cistercian Order founded in 1140 by Rotrou, Count of Perche. As in many other such abbeys, the discipline became greatly relaxed, but it was reformed by the Abbot Armand Jean le Bouthillier de Rancé. He was born in 1626 and ordained a priest in 1651, and in 1662 he determined on the reformation of his abbey, which he had already held in commendam for twenty-five years, it being in those days no uncommon thing to confer these posts on children of tender years. Cardinal Richelieu had given him this and several other pieces of preferment, and having also succeeded to a large fortune, the Abbot led for a time a dissipated life in Paris; but his heart being touched by the loss of a friend, he determined to sell everything and distribute the money to the poor, and, giving up all other benefits, he retired to La Trappe. He ordained that his monks should return to the "strict observance" of the Cistercians, and in 1663 he got leave from the King to hold the abbey as a regular abbot. Having entered on a new novitiate, he succeeded by his eloquence and example in persuading his monks to consent to the increased austerities, which forbade them to take wine, meat, fish, or eggs, and to cut themselves off completely from the outer world, and devote themselves to manual labour. They even exceeded the strict rules of the Cistercians: they rose at two o'clock, and went to rest at seven in winter and eight in summer. From two till half-past four they spent in prayer and meditation, and then retired to their cells till half-past five, when they said Prime. At seven they went to labour, either out or in doors; at half-past nine was said Tierce, followed by the Mass, Sext, and None; then they dined on vegetables; at one o'clock returned to work for another two hours, and then retired to their cells till Vespers at four o'clock; this was followed by a meal of bread and water, and spiritual reading till six o'clock, when Compline was said; at seven they went to their cells and slept on pallets of straw. Absolute silence was enjoined at all times, and they had to make their wants known by signs. Their dress was a long grey cloak with wide sleeves and a black cowl; they wore their dress by night as well as by day. Rancé died in 1700. In 1790, when other monasteries were suppressed, the Trappists were turned out of France and took refuge in Switzerland, in the monastery of Val Sainte in Freiburg, under Augustin de Lestrange; but this was destroyed by the French in 1798, and they wandered about till the Bourbon restoration in 1817, when they recovered La Trappe, and Lestrange established branches in connection with it in Spain, Italy, England, Belgium, and Ireland. In 1848 a branch was established in the United States.

Traskites.—The name given to a party among the early Puritans, from their founder John Trask, a native of Somersetshire, who first preached in London in 1617. He taught many extraordinary doctrines, insisted on his followers obeying every letter of the law of Scripture, as given to the Jews, however inapplicable to Christian times. They were obliged to fast three days at a time, his authority being a passage in the prophet Hosca [Hos. vi. 1]: "After two days He will revive us, in the third day He will raise us up and we shall dwell in His sight;" and he assured his followers that if they endured to the third day they would be in all respects in a condition of saintliness. Saturday was observed as the day of rest instead of Sunday, and was kept with all the strictness of the Jewish Sabbath. Trask and his wife were called upon to appear before the Star Chamber, the latter's offence being that she refused to teach in her school on Saturday. He was put in the pillory, and she was imprisoned for fifteen years. Towards the end of the seventeenth century the Traskites began to be called Seventh-Day Baptists [q.v.].

Tremelliis, Emanuel [b. at Ferrara 1510; d. at Sedan, 1580].—He came to Germany with Peter Martyr and some other who had privately become Protestants; after some stay at Strasburg he came to England in 1547, and taught Greek at Cambridge. On the death of Edward VI. he returned to Germany, and taught in the college of Hornbach until he was called thence to be Hebrew Professor at Heidelberg and afterwards at Sedan. He turned the Syriac translation of the New Testament into Latin, and undertook a new version of the Old from the Hebrew. In this work he was assisted by Francis Junius of Bourges.

Trench, Richard Chenevix, D.D., Arch bishop of Dublin, was the second son of Mr. Richard Trench, brother of the first Lord Ashtown in the Irish peerage. His mother was thegranddaughter and heiress of D. Richard Chenevix, Bishop of Waterford [1745–1799], the friend and corresponder of Lord Chesterfield. He was born, on the 9th of September, 1807, graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1829, and was ordained to a curacy under Hugh James Rose, at Hadleigh, Suffolk. He subsequently became incumbent of Curridge, a chapelry in the extensive parish of Bishop's Waltham, Hants. Dr. Trench was a man of many literary gifts, but it was as a poet, and not as a scholar or divine, that he first attracted attention. In 1835 appeared his earliest work, The Story of Justin Martyr, and other Poems, soon to be succeeded by other works which placed him among the foremost of the young poets of the day. In 1841 Mr. Trench gave up his incumbency at Curridge and accepted a curacy under Archdeacon Wilberforce at Alverstoke. From this time forward the two men were intimately associated, and the Archdeacon received from his curate much valuable literary and other aid. The latter continue in the active discharge of his duties at Alverstoke until 1845, when Wilberforce was promoted to the Deanery of Westminster, an Trench was presented to the rectory of Itche.
Stoke by the late Lord Ashburton, to whom he had become known at Alverstoke. In 1845 and 1846 Dr. Trench was Hulsean Lecturer at Cambridge, and for a short time one of the Select Preachers. In 1841 he published his Notes on the Parables of Our Lord. When Dr. Wilberforce became Bishop of Oxford, he appointed Dr. Trench his Examining Chaplain; and a short time later he became Theological Professor and Examiner at King’s College, London. This appointment he continued to hold until he was preferred to the Deanery of Westminster, on the death of Dr. Buckland, in 1856.

Upon the death of Dr. Whately, Archbishop of Dublin, in November, 1863, Dean Trench was appointed to the archiepiscopal See. He was consecrated on the 1st of January, 1864. The Archbishop speedily won golden opinions from all classes of society. He had not long held his high appointment, however, before he was called upon to take a prominent part in the agitation caused by the proposal to disestablish the Irish Church. After Mr. Gladstone had given notice of his resolutions in the House of Commons in the session of 1868, the Archbishop defined the policy of himself and his friends as follows:—“First, to fight for everything which we possess, as believing it rightfully ours; recognising, of course, the right of Parliament to redistribute within the Church its revenues, according to the changed necessities of the present time. If this battle is lost, then, totally rejecting the process of gradual starvation to which Disraeli would submit us, to go in for instant death at the hands of Gladstone.” After the elections, which gave a great majority for Mr. Gladstone’s policy, the Archbishop admitted that establishment was hopelessly and irrevocably gone; but he pleaded for delay, hoping that Mr. Gladstone might be beaten on some of the important details of his scheme. Mr. Gladstone’s measure became law, and in the controversies that ensued in connection with the reconstruction of the Irish Church, the Archbishop took that leading part which naturally devolved upon him as the result of his authority and position.

In consequence of ill-health, Dr. Trench resigned the Archbishopsric in November, 1884. In notifying his resignation to the Synods of Dublin, Glendalough, and Kildare, which constituted the authority for the election of his successor, he stated that it was not his purpose to make any application to the representative body for the continuance of the income which he had received from them. During the reading of the Archbishop’s letter of farewell, the members of the Synod remained standing, and there were cordial demonstrations of respect at its close. The news of the Archbishop’s resignation was received with general regret throughout Ireland, and the cause of it elicited a wide-spread feeling of sympathy in England. He died March 28th, 1886.

Archbishop Trench’s works occupy no inconconsiderable place in English literature. His best-known theological works are his Notes on the Parables of our Lord, and Notes on the Miracles of our Lord; Lectures on Mediæval Church History; Lessons in Proverbs; The Sermon on the Mount illustrated from St. Augustine; St. Augustine as an Interpreter of Scripture; Synonyms of the New Testament; and The Epistles to the Seven Churches of Asia Minor. Further, Archbishop Trench was an ardent student of philology, and the work by which he is best known in literature is that entitled, On the Study of Words, consisting of five lectures addressed to the pupils of the Diocesan Training Schools, Winchester, and published in 1851. In 1855 appeared his English Past and Present, and two years later On some Deficiencies in our English Dictionaries. In 1858 Dr. Trench took up the question of the proposed revision of the Authorised Version of the new Testament; and, collaterally with this subject, it may be mentioned that some years afterwards he was selected as one of the editors of the New Commentary on the Bible, proposed by the Speaker of the House of Commons. Dean Trench was also appointed Chairman of the Literary and Historical Committee, intrusted, in conjunction with an Etymological Committee, by the Philological Society with the preparation and publication of a new English Dictionary.

Trent, Council of.—Trent, the ancient Tridentum, is a town on the confines of the Tyrol, between Italy and Germany, and is celebrated as the place where the last General Council previous to that of the Vatican in 1869 (according to the Roman Church) was held. The reformation of the Church, which had been the object of the Councils of Constance and Basle, the policy of the Popes would not suffer to be carried into execution. There was a great desire on the part of many to have another General Council, but it had been long delayed, owing to the intrigues of the party who were most interested in retaining the abuses which were profitable to them, and especially hindered by the cardinals, and even by the Popes themselves. But to such a council only could Catholic Christendom look for the accomplishment of its most earnest wishes, and in the course of the German Reformation even the Protestant princes expressed their desire for such an assemblage of the clergy. The Emperor Charles V. urged it zealously, he found it a very effectual mode of alarming the Pope and curbing the Protestant princes, and thus controlling both parties, to persevere in demanding that a council should be convoked on German soil: so he solemnly announced a Council to the States at the Diet of Augsburg in 1530. In order to prevent his summoning it there, preparations were made for it in Rome. Accordingly Clement VII. in that same year decreed it, but without fixing a time; and Paul III., his successor, appointed it to be held May 27th, 1537, at Mantua. As the conditions offered by the Duke of Mantua were not acceptable, the place was changed to Vicenza, and May 1st, 1538, was fixed upon; when, as no prelates arrived, it was again delayed till Easter, 1539, and, as neither France nor Germany consented to the place selected, it was again indefinitely postponed. Paul summoned it again for Nov. 1st, 1542, and showed his willingness to choose a German city by naming Trent. His Legates arrived there Nov. 22nd, but a war between the Emperor and the King of France once more postponed it till a more convenient time. Such a time the Pope thought he had found when Charles was making preparations against the Protestants, and he summoned the Council to meet on March 15th, 1545. The Cardinals Del Monte, Cervino della Croce, and Pole, arrived at Trent at the appointed time, as presiding Legates, but no real work was done till Dec. 13th, 1545, when the General Council of Trent was solemnly opened, 25 bishops and some other prelates being present. In the Papal Brief, the Council was designated, Sacrosanctâ aecumenica, et generalis synodus Tridentina presidetibus legatis apostolicis. It was agreed that committees of bishops and Doctors of Theology should prepare the subjects to be discussed, and that the votes should be taken, not by nations according to the practice at Constance and Basle, but by individuals, and that the questions should be settled by a majority. The committees being chosen and instructed by the Legates, thus secured a majority for the Pope, so that even Italian bishops were heard to complain that the Council was not a free one. Princes and people expected from this meeting an improvement of the Church in its head and members, such as should obviate the objections of the Protestants, and induce them to return to the bosom of the Catholic Church: the Imperial envoys urged that this ought to be made the main object, yet in the first three sessions nothing was done beyond preliminaries. From the 4th to the 8th of April, 1546, when five archbishops and 48 bishops were present, two decrees were enacted, in which the Apocrypha was declared to belong to the canonical books of Scripture, the traditions handed down by the Church from Apostolic times were to be taken as of equal authority with the Bible, and the Vulgate translation was received as authentic. The 5th session was occupied with discussion about original sin; the 6th with justification; the 7th, held March, 1547, on the Sacraments in general, i.e. concerning the number, necessity, efficacy, matter, form, and ministry of them. They were declared to be seven. To these decrees were added several anathemas against those who dissented from them. Then came the vicar of Mühlberg, which made the Emperor powerful that the Pope sought a pretext for removing the Council from German territory, and the Legates, making use of a fall of a rumour of the plague at Trent, resolved, 1547, to transfer the assembly to Bologna, a resolution which was immediately acted on by the Italian Fathers. The Emperor, however, compelled 18 bishops from his own State together with Cardinal Madruzzi, Bishop of Trent, to remain in that city, whilst the Legates, with 6 archbishops, 32 bishops, and generals of religious Orders, remained at Bologna, and contented themselves, till 9th and 10th sessions, with publishing decrees of adjournment and deciding a thing further on the subject of the Council. Neither was anything done by those left at Trent, so the Pope declared the Council adjourned in a Bull issued Sept. 17th, 1544. After his death, the Cardinal del Mel joined Pope in 1550, under the name Julius III., and formally announced, at the desire of the Emperor, the reassembling of the Council of Trent. His Legate, Marcigliano Crescentiui, came with two Nuncios to Trent and opened the Council, May 1st, 1551, with the 11th session; but there were so few theologians present that nothing important was done before the 13th session, commencing Oct. 11th, 1551. The Jesuits Lainez and Sameron, who had been sent as Papal theologians, exercised a decisive influence upon the decrees, which now, laying aside scholastic differences, were briefly and precisely drawn up. The Council concluded against the Sacramentarians, That Jesus Christ was real present in the Holy Sacrament of the Altar and against the Lutherans they decreed l. doctrines of Transubstantiation and Adoration of the Host, and the Presence of Jesus Christ, other times than at actual receiving. The refusal to define the point of Communion both kinds for the laity, and the Sacrifice of the Mass, so that the Protestant divines whom they had given a safe-conduct might have time to come up and set forth their reasons of their opinions to the Council. In the 14th session, begun Nov. 25th, 1551, the doctrines of the Church concerning Penance and Extreme Unction were declared. As Penance, they set forth its necessity, enlarged on its three branches—contrition, confession, and satisfaction; they also set forth the institution and effects of Extreme Unction. In the 15th session, begun January 1552, they granted a new safe-conduct to the Protestants, and adjourned till May 1st. Under the Imperial protection the divines of Württemberg and Upper Germany now also came to Trent, and the Saxons were allowed on their way thither under the conduct of Melanchthon. These measures were only stratagem on the part of Saxony to lull th Emperor into security, as was soon evinced by the commencement of hostilities on the part of the Elector Maurice, who forced the Emperor to fly, and the members of the Council to disperse. They resolved accordingly, on April 8th, to adjourn for two years without even having commenced negotiations with the Protestants. Amidst these circumstances, the Treaty of Passau and the religious peace of Augsburg were concluded, and two Catholic princes, King Ferdinand and the Duke of Bavaria, ventured, in defiance of the Council, to grant to their Protestant subjects the privilege of the cup. In France the power of the Protestants was so great that they talked of summoning a national convocation to settle their religious disputes, and to Plus IV., who had succeeded Paul, saw himself compelled, in 1560 and 1561, to reassemble the General Council. It was re-opened Jan. 8th, 1562, by six Legates, under the presidency of the Cardinal Hercules Gonzaga of Mantua, with 112 bishops (mostly Italian), four abbots, and four generals of religious Orders. In the 18th session, Feb. 26th, a decree was published for preparing an index of prohibited books, but in the 9th and 20th it was again resolved to delay the publication of new decrees, this being the Roman policy to avoid opposition; or, as well as the Emperor and Bavaria reiterated their desire for the reformation of the Church, the administration being both kinds to the laity, the marriage of priests, and a revision of the laws concerning forbidden meats; and, besides, all the bishops, except those from Italy, agreed in the opinion, so odious to the Pope, that the episcopal power and rights were of Divine, and not Papal origin. In consequence of the number of Italian bishops they could always get a majority in favour of the Roman Court, in the 21st and 22nd sessions, July 16th and Sept. 17th, 1562, they passed decrees respecting the celebration of the Lord's Supper and the Sacrifice of the Mass, allowing preparatory explanations in the vernacular languages; but the laity were referred to the Pope respecting their demand for the cup in the Lord's Supper. In these sessions there were present 230 prelates, besides the ambassadors of the Catholic Courts, and the number was increased on Nov. 13th by the arrival of the Cardinal of Lorraine with fourteen bishops, three abbots, and eighteen theologians from France, who not only gave new strength to the opposition, but also passed thirty-four articles of reformation, which could not but be exceedingly offensive to the Papal party. This party, therefore, resorted again to delays, and postponed the next session from one month to another. Gonzaga, who was generally esteemed for his meekness, but who was fettered in every step by the directions which he received from Rome, died on March 2nd, 1563, and in his place the new Legates, Moroni and Stavageri, presided, and so hindered work by empty formalities that both the Imperial and French Courts despaired either of getting any Church reformation or of making peace with the Protestants, who entirely rejected the Council. Moreover, the Cardinal of Lorraine was won over to the Papal party by bribery, and, at length, either wearied by long delay or influenced by intrigue, the German, Spanish, and French bishops consented to a decree concerning the consecration of priests and the hierarchy entirely in accordance with the views of the Pope, which received public confirmation in eight canons in the 23rd session, July 15th, 1563. With equal pliability they suffered in the 24th session, Nov. 11th, a decree to be passed respecting the sacrament of matrimony, in twelve canons, in which the celibacy of the clergy was enjoined; and, in the 25th and last sessions, Dec. 3rd and 4th, the hastily composed decrees respecting purgatory, the worship of saints, relics and images, the monastic vows, indulgences, fasts, prohibition of certain kinds of food, and an index of prohibited books—the last of which, together with the composition of a catechism and breviary, was left to the Pope. In the decrees of reformation published in these last five sessions, which contained mostly insignificant or self-evident ordinances, or, at least, the same repeated, only with different words, provision was made for the removal of the prevailing abuses, for the conferring and administration of spiritual offices, sainctures, etc. The most useful provision was that for founding seminaries for the education of the clergy and the examination of those to be ordained. At the close of the last session the Cardinal of Lorraine and the other prelates made the walls resound with their cry, "Cursed be all heretics!" and thus ended the Council of Trent, the decrees of which, signed by 255 prelates, perpetuated the separation of the Protestant from the Catholic Church, and acquired with the latter the authority of a symbolical book. The Pope confirmed the decrees in their whole extent, Jan. 26th, 1564. The chief object of the Council, the gaining back the Protestants to the Catholic Church, had not been attained, and the points of dissension between the Roman and the Greek Churches were marked out so distinctly as to leave no hope of any future reconciliation. By its decrees, the Catholic doctrines were more exactly determined, and many abuses remedied, though some of the most pernicious were left. The decrees were received without limitation in Italy, Portugal, and Holland; in Spain they were restricted by the statutes of the kingdom in France, Germany, and Hungary they met with an opposition which gradually resulted in a silent approbation of the doctrinal decrees on the part of the Catholics, but has always prevented the reception of the decrees as irreconcilable with many laws of the respective countries. For the explanation and interpretation of the decrees, Sixtus V., in 1588, instituted a Council of Cardinals; and many books, both in support and opposition to this Council, have been written. Calvin wrote his Antidote against the Council of Trent during its session, and when in 1560 Pius VII. ordered the reassembling of the Council, the Lutheran princes of Germany issued their Concili Tridentini Decretis opposita Gravamina. The fundamental error of this Council was that Catholics and Protestants could suppose it possible to reconcile their differences by a means which could only bring them out in stronger relief; but we can hardly blame men for wishing to restore harmony to Christendom.

Trentals.—Masses said every day for thirty days for a deceased person.

Treves, Holy Coat of.—It is alleged that the seamless coat of our Blessed Saviour is preserved in the city of Treves, it having been given to this place by the Empress Helena. The earliest mention of it is in the Gesta Trevirorum in the twelfth century. It was used at the consecration of Bishop Bruno in 1121, and translated from the choir to the high altar of the cathedral in 1196. In 1512, and several times since, it has been exposed for the veneration of the faithful; the last time was in 1844, when eleven bishops and thousands of people flocked to Treves on the occasion of the finding of an ancient ivory belonging to the cathedral, which had been lost, and which is supposed to confirm its authenticity. Many miracles were reported to have taken place at this time. Examination of the garment, however, has greatly shaken the faith of the most learned of the Roman Catholics in its genuineness, which is now pronounced not a matter of faith, but of "pious opinion."

Triers.—A commission of thirty-eight men, chosen by Cromwell in 1653 to sit at Whitehall to try candidates for the ministry; they consisted of Independent, Presbyterian, and Baptist clergy and laymen. The exercise of their power by these Triers was so arbitrary and bigoted as to cause them to be compared to the Inquisitors. In their judgment, to read the Prayer Book was evidence that a minister was destitute of "grace, knowledge, and utterance," and hence unfit for his office.

Triforium.—A gallery or open space over the aisles and choir of a church, between the pier-arches and clerestory. It was formerly used as a gallery for women, and also to let down tapestry for the decoration of the church on festivals. The derivation of the word is uncertain.

Trine Immersion is the act of dippine a person who is being baptised three times beneath the surface of the water, at naming of the Three Persons of the Holy Trinity. It was the general practice in a primitive Church, and if circumstance rendered baptism by affusion necessary, it affusion was made thrice. Some of the Fathers teach that this practice represent the three days’ burial of Christ and His resurrection on the third day; others that signified faith in the doctrine of the Trinity. St. Augustine combines the two signification and St. Jerome sees a symbolical resemblance between the three immersions and yet on one baptism, and the Three Persons of Godhead and yet but One God. The practice of Trine Immersion was, however, appealed to by some Spanish Arians in giving support to their heresy of the inequality of the Three Divine Persons, and, consequently, some of the orthodox, with the approval of Gregory the Great, had recourse to baptism by single immersion; and some following the new practice and some retaining the old, a confusion and scandal resulting from its diversity, the Council of Toledo, A.D. 633, enforced the judgment of Gregory. Still, a more ancient custom generally prevailed, being felt that the reason for the change was too slight to justify the alteration of the time honoured and symbolical practice.

Trinitarians.—A name given to the who hold the doctrine of a Trinity in one Godhead, who believe that there is only one essence of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, but a threefold division by their person operations.

Another application of the name is to monastic Order of the Trinity and Redempti of Captives, St. John of Malta and Felix Valois were its first Patriarchs in 1197; members added to the usual vows, one pledging themselves to do their utmost to redeem the Christians who were in slavery among the Infidels.

Trinity.—The doctrine of the Holy Trinity, which is held alike by the Roman Catholic, Greek, and Anglican Churches, and by a greater number of Nonconformist Communions, is thus stated in the First Article of the Church of England: "There is but One Living and True God. . . And Unity of this Godhead there be three Persons, of one substance, power, and eternity; the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost. This doctrine turns upon two points. The first is the Unity of God, a doctrine affirmed in the most express and emphatic terms both in the Old and New Testaments; Deut. vi. Is. xlv. 6; Mark xii. 29–32; Eph. iv. 6. The second is the revelation in the New Testament concerning Christ and the Holy Ghost. In the Rev. W. Jones's *Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity, the following texts a adduced and commented on in proof of the Divinity of Christ:—Is. vii. 13, 14, compared with 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8; Is. vi. 5, compared with John xii. 41; Is. xlv. 6, compared with Rev. xxii. 13; Is. xxiii. 11, compared with 2 Pet. iii. 18; Rev. xxii. 6, compared with verse 16; Luke i. 76, compared with Matt. xii. 10; Luke i. 16, 17, compared with Matt. iii. 11; Matt. xi. 10, compared with Mal. iii. 1; Ps. lxvii. 56, compared with 1 Cor. x. 9; John iii. 29, compared with Is. liv. 5; John xx. 28; Rom. ix. 5; 2 Pet. i. 1; 2 Cor. v. 19; John xiv. 11; 2 Cor. v. 20; 1 John v. 20; Col. ii. 8, 9; John i. 1; Is. ix. 6; Jer. xxiii. 6; Is. ii. 17, 18; Rev. i. 8.

He then gives one by one the texts adduced by the impugners of the doctrine, and in each case places what he holds to be the true interpretation upon them. They are the following:—Matt. xix. 17; 1 Cor. xv. 24; Acts x. 42; Acts x. 40, 41; John iii. 16; Eph. iv. 32; John vi. 38; Acts iv. 29, 30; Matt. xx. 23; 1 Cor. vii. 6; Matt. xxiii. 9; John xiv. 28; 1 Cor. xi. 3; Mark xiii. 32; John v. 18; 1 Cor. xv. 27, 28; Jude 4, 24, 25.

To the same author we are indebted for the following list of texts in proof of the Divinity of the Holy Ghost:—John iii. 6, compared with 1 John v. 4; Acts xiii. 2, compared with Heb. v. 4; Matt. ix. 38, compared with Acts xiii. 4; Luke ii. 26, 28; John xiv. 17, compared with 1 Cor. xiv. 23; 2 Tim. iii. 16, compared with 2 Pet. i. 21; John vi. 46, compared with 1 Cor. ii. 13; Acts v. 3, 4; 1 John iii. 21, compared with 24; 1 Cor. iii. 16, compared with vi. 19; Matthew iv. 1, compared with Luke xi. 24; 2 Cor. i. 3; 1 Cor. ii. 11; Acts v. 9; Gen. vi. 3; Matt. xii. 28; Ezek. vii. 1-3; Acts iv. 24, 25. And he mentions, as claimed by opponents on their side, Matt. iii. 2; Heb. ii. 4; and Rom. viii. 26.

There is no question that the texts we have named were adduced as inspired Scripture by the whole of the early Church, and the result was the Church had before it the plainest assertions [1] that there is One God; and also [2] that Christ was called God, as was also the Holy Spirit. How, then, were these truths to be combined? Some of the early heretics, no doubt, became Trinitists, and declared that the New Testament revealed three Gods. But against this stood the plain words of Scripture, and the uniform teaching of the Apostolic Church. Another doctrine was that of the Sabellians, who taught that the three names, Father, Son, Holy Spirit, were but three manifestations of the same Person under different aspects, a doctrine which involved the opinion that the Father died upon the Cross. [PATRIFPASSIAN.] The third and orthodox doctrine was that of the Trinity in Unity. The word “Trinity” is not found in Scripture, but the doctrine is held to be expressed in the words of Christ’s commission [Matt. xxviii. 19], and in the Apostolic benediction [2 Cor. xiii. 14]. The word itself was first used by Theophilus, Bishop of Antioch, in the second century. The early Fathers taught the doctrine by implication when they maintained the distinctness of the Son against the Sabellians, and the consubstantiality with the Father against the Arians; but it was the Councils of Nicea and Constantinople, which, by affirming the Divinity of Christ and of the Holy Spirit, as well as the Unity of God, declared the doctrine of the Trinity in Unity to be the doctrine of the Church. The Athanasian Creed stated it in the most clear, emphatic, and categorical terms. From that time the doctrine was never called in question except by a few obscure sects, until the revolt against passive obedience, and the assertion of the freedom of the human conscience in the sixteenth century. That momentous epoch saw the doctrine of the Trinity again impugned, and Unitarianism thus became one phase of Protestantism. It is from this point of view that the doctrine must now be considered.

The great Reformers, equally with the Catholics, received and asserted the doctrine of the Trinity on the ground that it is clearly taught by Scripture when interpreted in its simple and natural sense. So evident is its implication in Scriptural statements, indeed, that Unitarians and Theists almost universally regard Scripture itself in a very different light from orthodox Christians, and attach to it a very much lower idea of Divine revelation, destitute of any really authoritative character. This ground of acceptance, then, may fitly be termed that of Authority, and is well set forth by the Protestant writer already cited, in terms which would also be accepted by all the historical Churches. We may take a few passages from the “conclusion of his work, premising that the preceding books thereof consist of chapters upon [1] Scripture passages proving the Divinity of Christ; [2] the like proving the Divinity of the Holy Ghost; [3] texts proving the Plurality and Trinity of Persons; [4] Passages proving the Trinity in Unity. The “conclusion” first reviews the first two chapters (the texts most important to which have been above cited), and then proceeds:—

“It has appeared from the third chapter, that God is signified to us throughout the Old Testament by a name that is plural, and proved to be such from many particular instances; yet generally so restrained and qualified as to destroy the suspicion of a plurality of gods. That to this common name of God, many other plural names and expressions are added, and that an interchange of the plural and singular is frequently observed, which neither grammar nor reason can account for upon any principle, but that of a real Divine plurality. That the Persons of God are three in number, precisely distinguished on some occasions by the personal names of the Father, the Word or Son, and the Holy Spirit, and also by different offices. That the same term is not always peculiar and proper to the same Person; because the words God, Lord, Jehovah, and Father, are sometimes applied to one Person, sometimes to another; while at other times they are not personal, but general names of the Divine nature. That in the Lord of Hosts, sitting upon His throne, and speaking of Himself in the plural to the prophet Isaiah, there was not one Person only, but three; the Father, Jesus, and the Holy Ghost, all expressed under one name in the Old Testament, but personally distinguished to us by three different ones in the New, where this matter is referred to.

"In the fourth and last chapter, the passages of the Scripture have been laid together, and made to unite their beams in one common centre—the Unity of the Trinity. Which Unity is not metaphorical and figurative, but strict and real; and there can be no real Unity in God, but that of His nature, essence, or substance, all of which are synonymous terms. This Unity considered in itself is altogether incomprehensible; but it is one thing to read and to know that there is a Divine nature, and another thing to describe it. That it is proved to be a Unity of essence:—First, because the three Persons are all comprehended under the same individual and supreme appellation. They are the one Lord absolutely so called, the Creator of the World, and the God of Israel. Secondly, because they partake in common of the name Jehovah, which being interpreted, means the Divine Essence; and what it signifies in one Person it must also signify in the others, as truly as the singular name Adam, in its appellative capacity, expresses the common nature of all mankind. And this name neither is nor can be communicated, without a contradiction, to any derived or inferior nature, as well on account of its signification as its application, which is expressly restrained to one only. Thirdly, it is further proved, in that the authority, the secret mind or counsel, and the power by which all things are established and directed, is ascribed to Christ and the Spirit in common with God the Father; and that in the same exercise of it, and upon the same occasions. Fourthly, because there is a participation of such Divine attributes as cannot subsist but where they are original. Our understanding, if it be moderately instructed, will satisfy us that there can be ONE ONLY who is eternal, and possessed of holiness, truth, life, etc., in and from Himself. Yet the whole Trinity is eternal, holy, true, living, and omnipresent: therefore these three were, and will be, one God from everlasting to everlasting. Fifthly and lastly, because there is a concurrence of the whole undivided Godhead in all those acts, every one of which has in it the character of a Divine wisdom and omnipotence; and expresses such an intimate union and communion of the Holy Trinity, as the understanding of man cannot reach, and which no words can explain. For though it is and must be one God who doth all these things, yet it is the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit who gave us our being instruct and illuminate us, lead us, speak to us and are present with us; who give authority to the Church, raise the dead, sanctify the elect, and perform every Divine and Spiritual operation.

"This is the God revealed to us in the Holy Scripture; very different from the Deity so much talked of in our systematical scheme of natural divinity; which, with all its wisdom, never yet thought of a Christ, or a Holy Ghost, by whom nature, now fallen and blinded, is to be reformed, exalted, and saved. The Bible we know to be the infallible Word of God; the rule of our faith and obedience. I find this doctrine revealed in it; therefore I firmly believe and submit to it. And if the religion of Jesus Christ is to be corrected and softened till it becomes agreeable to the natural thoughts and imagination of the human heart, then in vain was it said—Blessed is he whoever shall not be offended in Me."

Yet though it is indisputably true that we are indebted solely for our knowledge of the Trinity to the teaching of Revelation, and that the doctrine could never have been dis covered by human reason unaided, some of the ablest Protestant divines have maintained that human reason is able to some extent to follow the revelation, to acquiesce in its truth, and to find it harmonise with the deepest intuitions of the soul. The intellectual objections to the doctrine are practically two: [1] that it is a contradiction in terms; and [2] that if not, it in reality amounts to Tri-theism. Neither of these will bear a moment's examination. The first objection may, indeed, be said to be itself a sheer intellectual absurdity, since it is based upon an application to the Infinite and Essential Being of God, of crude reasonings about number and distinction such as are applied to so many marbles and which every thoughtful Christian rejects ab initio as regards any relation to the Divine Being. On this ground, indeed, theologians of unimpeachable orthodoxy have objected to portions of the Athanasian Creed, as giving concrete definition, beyond what is written or can be safely affirmed of God. As Robertson points out in his sermon on the subject, "we are puzzled and perplexed by words;" and as he remarks again in reference to such objects, "though the doctrine may appear to them absurd, because they have not the proper conception of it, some of the profoundest thinkers have believed in this doctrine. Let them be assured of this, that whether the doctrine be true or false, it is not necessarily a doctrine self-contradictory. . . . that such men never could have held it unless there was latent in the doctrine a deep truth."
ingham, again, two centuries ago, protests against such divines as played into the hands of these objectors, by "affecting to represent the mystery of the Christian Trinity as a thing directly contradictory to all human reason and understanding, and that perhaps at of design to make men surrender up themselves and conscience, in a blind and implicit faith, wholly to their guidance." The Christian does not believe that God is a triinity in the same sense in which He is One; one only God in the same sense in which co-exists as Three Persons. Further reply this objection will appear in what follows concerning the second.

Any statement of the various intellectual analogies and explanations which have been forged to assist an intelligent apprehension of the Divine Trinity in Unity must necessarily be brief. Cudworth [q.v.], as we have seen, was a Platonist, and has been misrepresented on that account; but he makes clear himself, that his object was to show the wonderful providence of Almighty God, at this doctrine of a Trinity of Divine hypostases should find such admittance and entertainment in the pagan world, and be received by the wisest of their philosophers since the times of Christianity." He accordingly draws striking analogies between the Platonic Trinity, and especially that form in which the hypostases are described as finite Goodness, Infinite Wisdom, and Infinite Love and Power (these not as accidents, questions, but as all substantial), and the Christian doctrine. He implies—"an idea in vance of his own time, but far more familiar in this—that such an approximation was not without a real Divine illumination; though this breadth of view brought on him the charge (from Nelson and others) at his own views concerning the Trinity embossed those of Dr. Samuel Clarke, this is sufficiently refuted, not only by his expression that both the Son and the Holy Ghost were "co-eve and co-eternal with the other" [Intellectual System of the Universe, 342], but by the definite statement that wherever the Platonic Trinity differed in any sense, not only from Scripture, but from the cune and Constantinopolitan Councils, and a doctrine of Athanasius, it is therein utterly disclaimed and rejected" by him. [op. cit. ii. 457.]

The analogy with a quasi-philosophical term, as cited by Cudworth, is in truth striking; and his work is, moreover, usable as copiously citing within small compass the opinions and definitions of the theses concerning the true meaning of the rd homo-ousios. This, says Cudworth, was never used by Greek writers otherwise than to signify the agreement of things, numerically differing from one another in some common nature or universal essence." Hence St. Basil says that the word "plainly takes away the sameness of hypostasis [or individual person], for the same thing is not homo-ousios [co-substantial] with itself, but always one thing with another." [Epist. 300.] So Athanasius remarks [Epist. De Sent. Dicr.] that "the branches are homo-ousios with the vine, or with the root thereof." And the Council of Chalcedon affirms that the Lord Jesus Christ was homo-ousios with the Father as to His divinity, but homo-ousios with us men as to His humanity," and Athanasius himself uses the same word in relation to the Saviour and mankind in the same sense. Athanasius further says, "We do not think the Son to be really one and the same with the Father, as the Sabellians do, and to be mono-ousios and not homo-ousios: they thereby destroy the very being of the Son." [Exposition of Faith.]

Concerning the hypostases in the Trinity, Bingham [q.v.] is worth quoting, and his remarks are more noteworthy because in his own day he was charged by some with Tri-theism:

"For though the three Persons in their sense be three distinct numerical substances, yet they are neither, firstly, three Beings of a different nature, as Arius meant; nor, secondly, three Beings actually divided or separated from each other as three men and angels are, but most inseparably and eternally (yet without confusion) united into One; which union of substances is so necessary in infinite Beings, that we cannot possibly conceive them otherwise than as actually and eternally united into one; nor, thirdly, are they three parts of one whole, sharing Divine perfections amongst them, but every one is equally possessed of all (and this naturally follows from their being equal in nature, and so falls in with the first sort of Unity); nor, fourthly, are they three Beings having that Divine nature independently, every one from Himself; but the Father alone has His Being from Himself, the Son from the Father, the Holy Ghost from both; for though they all have a Divine nature, that is, a necessary existence (for necessary existence is the properest notion we can form of a Divine nature), yet they have that necessary existence three different ways: the Father necessarily exists, but of Himself alone; the Son necessarily exists, but from the Father; the Holy Ghost necessarily exists too, but from the Father and the Son; so that the Son and the Holy Ghost are not properly without original, though necessarily existing from all eternity, but are as necessary and eternal Emanations of a necessary and eternal Cause; and this way of existing is what distinguishes the Son and the Holy Ghost both from the Father and the creatures, and at once preserves the Unity of the Godhead. Fifthly, and lastly, by virtue of this original and natural subordination of the Son and the Holy Ghost to the Father, they are not three opposite principles or Providences clashing and interfering with one another, but one harmonious Providence and one undivided principle of all other things; for it is impossible to conceive three infinite beings under the economy of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, without conceiving them at the same time united in an eternal harmony and concord." [Sermon on the Trinity.] In another Sermon on the Divinity of Christ Bingham further says: "The true notion of the Christian Trinity is three Divine Persons under the relation and economy of a Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; where the Father is considered as the Fountain of the Deity, the Son and Holy Ghost as the natural and eternal Emanations of the Father's substance; agreeable to what is said in the Nicene Creed, that the Son is "God of God, Light of Light, Very God of Very God"—Deus genitus, not 'ingenitus' nor 'factus'; whereas Tri-theism asserts that the Son is another agenêton—that is, not a Son, but another distinct principle or substance, unbegotten as the Father is, and consequently a distinct God."

These older attempts at explanation have their use and value; but modern theology rather shrinks from such precise and essay-like definition concerning the holiest mysteries of Infinite and transcendent Being. In the sermon on this subject by the late Rev. F. W. Robertson, already referred to [Sermons, iii. 43], he speaks of the Trinity as the three "conscii" by which God is known to us, and declines to affirm more:—"We do not dare to limit God; we do not presume to say that there are in God only three personalities—only three consciousnesses; all that we dare presume to say is, that there are three in reference to us, and only three." This idea reappears in another sermon to be presently cited, and strictly it is true; yet the reply seems obvious that the Christian Gospel does appear to present itself as a full revelation of God; and that as redeemed man is moreover expressly affirmed to partake of the Divine nature, and to be made in the Divine image, such would seem to be required by the necessities of his manifold nature. But the sermon is chiefly remarkable as showing the modern tendency to substitute analogy or illustration for definition. Most of Robertson's illustrations do not appear to average minds very happy. That of body, soul, and spirit has often been used, but is bad ab initio, because we constantly think of the body as a mere servant of the spirit, and even of its perishing while the real man survives. But he remarks justly upon our common idea of a "Person" being that of "a being bounded by space," and how all such notions must be dissociated from the Persons of the Trinity; and then returning to the conscious human soul—which is, after all, our microcosm and datum for all things—he finds another illustration, which to many minds may be singularly helpful, in the will, the affections, and thoughts. Men's mental constitutions divide; but to most men it will probably appear, as it does to the preacher, that the really are "distinct consciousnesses" in man. It does seem to most, that what we and what thinks or reflects, and what love in some way distinct from one another and yet, on the other hand, the one terminal does also seem to be thrown into ev act of each. This seems to be Robertson's principal contribution towards an intelligible belief in the doctrine of the Trinity, and be of real value, though confined to a few lines. And perhaps it is really as close analogy or illustration as can be drawn from finite existence or consciousness, of the one in which a Trinity in Unity may co-exist, the Divine Being.

Our next extracts are from one of the more eloquent of modern preachers, the Rev. Phillips Brooks, of New York. He takes this text, "Through Him we all have access by one Spirit unto the Father" [Eph. ii. 18] and commences by remarking that the Trinity is not a dry creed to be believed in but a Gospel to be believed in, used, and lived by. He then has a passage, evidently borrowed in idea from Robertson's sermon on the same subject, disclaiming any statement of the Trinity is "all" there is of God, referring (as Robertson does) to an allegory "deep law," by which the higher any nature is, the more complex and more simple at one it becomes. The following extracts from That passage will speak for themselves: "The next thing we notice is the completeness with which this God, this part of God, is apprehended and depicted, what he says. He is describing man's salvation. It is one single thing, the saving of man. Here is the sinner in his sinfulness there is the saint in his glory. It is the same man still, and the whole act, from the beginning to the end—the act that took him in sinfulness and lifted him thence, and set him in his glory—is one single act. It stands unit among the works of God's omnipoter. It is one throbb of the all-loving heart; it is movement of the Almighty arm. And yet a simple act—salvation—is clearly distinguishable into its parts. See how clearly St. Paul discredits them. Every act is made up of a purpose, a method, and a power. And so purpose and the method and the power here. What is the purpose or the end? 'The Father we all have access,' What is the method? 'Through Christ Jesus.' What is the power? 'By the Spirit.' Throz Christ Jesus we all have access by one Spirit unto the Father. In this one total act, there is the method, and the power are distinguishable. Each stands out separate and distinct. And what is more, each is distinctly personal. A personal name is given to the designation of each element. This salvatio which is all the work of God—first, last and almost—has its divine personalities, distinct or its end, and its method, and its power.
it is a salvation to the Father, through the
and by the Spirit. The salvation is all ye: yet in it method, end, and power are recognisable. It is a three in one.

"Let us look into this a little more deeply.
The perfection of any act consists in the action and the harmony of these three elements: its end, its method, and its power.
Ike, for instance, the act of a boy’s educa-ton. It may extend over twenty years, but is capable of being considered as one act still, rom the time it begins in the nursery to the me it culminates in his profession. Now the fection of that education will depend upon the perfection of its end, its method, and its ower, and upon their being harmonious th, and suitable to, one another; each must ow worthy of the rest. For instance, if the and be low, if no high ideal of scholarship and character is set up at the first, and pt clear all along, you may give him the est books and the best teachers, you may pire him with the most eager enthusiasm,
but you turn out only a half-taught scholar, half-made man, as the result. The end was ot worthy of the method and power. Or, ain, you set the highest standard up to be imed at, and you put the purest ambitions into the boy’s nature, but you furnish only poor ans, poor schools, poor teachers, and once ore the education is imperfect. The method ot worthy of the end and the power. Or, ain, you make the ideal perfect, and you vide all the appliances of study at their est, but you put only some low or mercenary pulse into the scholar’s heart, perhaps a ere servile submission to your authority, ehaps only a selfish idea of the money he going to get out of his learning, and again
most imperfect product comes.

“This is an illustration. Instead of a boy’s ocation put a man’s salvation. That is the fect education of which all others are but
pes. And there we look for and we find the me harmony of end, method, and power.
take either unworthy of the others and the ivation is not complete. If it be not to the ther the Son’s redemption is in vain. If be not through the Son, the Father waits ad the Spirit moves for naught. If it be not the Spirit, the Father’s heart stands open ad the method of grace is perfect, but the omoved soul stands inactive and unsaved.
ese revelation comes to tell us that ad, method, and power, all are perfect, and uch must thus be worthy of the rest. The ce are one. Each is eternal, and yet, as the old creed cries, ‘There are not three ternals, but One Eternal.’ Each is God, and ‘there are not three Gods, but one God,’” eth three salvations, but one salvation, with equal end and method and power, and so the Trinity in Unity the soul is saved.

“And now, again, let us look at this more carefully in its several parts. The end of the human salvation is ‘access to the Father.’

. . . Now we are very apt to take it for granted that however we may differ in our definitions and our belief of the Deity of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, we are all at one, there can be and there is no hesitation about the Deity of the Father. God is divine; God is God. And no doubt we do all assent in words to such belief; but when we think what we mean by that word ‘God,’ when we remember what we mean by ‘Father,’ namely, the first source and the final satisfaction of a dependent nature; and then when we look around and see such multitudes of people living as if there were no higher source for their being than accidental, and no higher satisfaction for their being than selfishness, do we not feel that there is need of a continual and most earnest preaching
by word and act from every pulpit of influence to which we can mount, of the divinity of the Father? Why, take a man who is utterly absorbed in the business of the world . . .
To such a man, what is the first revelation that you want to make? Is it not the divinity of the Father? Remember that wonderful passage in the story of the Passover where Jesus, with His agony before Him, is just rising to work His homely parable of washing the disciples’ feet. And the description of the act is this: ‘Jesus knowing that He was come from God and went to God, riseth from supper and laid aside His garments, and took a towel and girded Himself.’ That was the key to all His life, the spring of every action:
‘Knowing that He came from God and went to God,’ knowing, that is, that God was His Father, the source and the satisfaction of His life. And that same knowledge which Christ had, you would want your friend to have.
Does it seem as if no man could escape it?
Does it seem as if the Divine Fatherhood were the patent fact of all creation? As if Nature uttered it in all her voices? These voices are not fancies. They are real. But the clear fact remains that multitudes of men do go through life and only in the dimmest tones hear either Nature or their own hearts proclaiming God. To such the truth must be uttered from some teaching of experience or d Doctrine. The divinity of the Father needs assertion first of all. Let men once feel it, and then Nature and their own hearts will come in with their sweet and solemn confirmations of it. But Nature and the human heart do not teach it of themselves. So we believe, and so we tempt other men to believe in God the Father . . .

“And now pass to the divinity of the method.
‘Through Jesus Christ.’ Man is separated from God. That fact, testified to by broken associations, by alienated affections, by con-fllicting wills, stands written in the whole history of our race. And equally clear is it to him who reads the Gospels and enters into sympathy with their wonderful Person, that in Him, in Jesus of Nazareth, appeared the Mediator by whom was to be the Atonement. His was the life and nature which, standing between the Godhood and the manhood, was to bridge the gulf and make the firm bright road, over which blessing and prayer might pass and repass with confident golden feet for ever. And then the question is—and when we ask it thus it becomes so much more than a dry problem of theology; it is a question for live anxious men to ask with faces full of eagerness—out of which nature came that Mediator? Out of which side of the chasm sprang the bridge leaping forth towards the other? Was it some towering man, who, growing beyond his brothers, overlooked the battlements of heaven, and saw the place in the divine heart where man belonged, and then came back and bade his brethren follow him, and led them on with him into the home of a Father who, reluctant or forgetful, sat without effort till His children found their way to Him? It is the most precious part of our belief, that it was with God that the activity began. It is the very soul of the Gospel, as I read it, that the Father's heart, sitting above us in His holiness, yearned for us as we lay down here in our sin. And when there was no man to make an intercession, He sent His Son to tell us of His love, to live with us, to die for us, to lay His life like a strong bridge out from the Divine side of existence, over which we might walk, fearfully but safely, back into the divinity where we belonged. Through Him we have access to the Father. As the end was divine, so the method is divine. As it is to God that we come, so it is God who brings us there. I can think nothing else without dishonouring the tireless, quenchless love of God... My friend says God sends Christ into the world, and therefore Christ is not God. I cannot see it so. It seems to me just otherwise. God sends Christ just because Christ is God. The ambassador, the army, is of the very most precious substance of the country that despatches it. This is the meaning of that constant title of our Master. He is the Son of God. Think of it. Does not 'Son' mean just this which the Church's faith, with the best words that it could find, has laboured to express, 'Two Persons and one Substance'? That is, the Father and the Child. Separate personality, but one nature. Unity and distinctness both, but the unity as true a fact as the distinctness. Nay, the unity the fact which made the essence of His mission, the fact which made Him the true, fit, only perfect messenger of God, and Saviour of the world.

"This is the glory of the Incarnation. It does seem to me that the great beauty of the old belief in the divinity of Christ is the faith in the capacity of manhood which it implies. It believes that man is of godlike a nature that he can hold God that God can be incarnated in him. Of sense of man's capacity is low. We do not think that God can dwell in the temple of life like ours. But was not that just what He came to teach us that He could do? I teach it to us by the rich experience of His Spirit dwelling in our spirits, but before the He taught it to us by the Word made flesh. A brute race could have seen no incarnate God could care for them and feed them, but He could not come into them, live in them. But man is better. "Because we are son God has sent the Spirit of His Son into our hearts." Because we are sons, His Son Himself could take our nature upon Him. To more truly we believe in the Incarnation Dei the more devoutly we must believe in its essential glory of humanity.

"And now turn to the point that still remains. We have spoken of the end and the method; but no true act is perfect unless the power by which it works is worthy of the method through which, and the end to which it proceeds. The power of the act of man salvation is the Holy Spirit. 'Thou, Christ Jesus we all have access by one Spirit unto the Father.' What do we mean by the Holy Spirit being the power unto salvation? I think we are often deluded and misled, carrying out too far some of the figurative forms in which the Bible and the religious experience of men express the saving of the soul. For instance, salvation is described as the lifting of the soul out of a pit, or putting it upon a pinnacle, or on a safe, his platform of grace. The figure is strong and clear. Nothing can overstate the utter dependence of the soul on God for its deliverance; but if we let the figure leave in our minds an impression of the human soul as dead, passive thing, to be lifted from one place to the other like a torpid log that makes no effort of its own either for co-operation or resistance, then the figure has missed its point. The soul is a live thing. Let there be nothing merely mechanical in the conception of the way God treats these souls of ours. I works upon them in the vitality of thought and passion, and will that He puts into them. And so when a soul comes to the Father through the Saviour, its whole essential vitality moves in the act. With these affections with which it has loved the world, it loves its Lot. With that same will with which it chose iniquity, it chooses now holiness and heaviness. It seems as if the Christian had simply chosen to love God instead of loving a business; and as he goes on and finds that this new love of God really means, he finds what it is that has happened. The city of faith and love and holiness has been taken possession of, and filled out their completeness, by the very Spirit.
holiness and love and faith which they were made to hold, but which is greater than themselves. The Divine power has taken possession of the soul's capacities, and, although it may seem at first as if the soul itself had originated this new movement to God through Christ, just as it may seem to be child at first as if his body did all these spiritual acts which the spirit does within it, yet, by-and-by, the conviction clears itself, and grows clearer and clearer constantly, that it is not the soul's simple ability to be religious that has made it religious, but that God by direct visitation has occupied that ability, and is drawing the soul to Himself.

"When this experience is reached, then see what Godhood the soul has come to recognise in the world. First, there is the Creative Deity from which it sprang, and to which it is struggling to return—the Divine End, God the Father. Then there is the Incarnate Deity, which makes that return possible by the exhibition of God's love—the Divine Method, God the Son; and then there is that abused Deity, this Divine energy in the soul itself, taking its capacities and setting them onenward to the Father—the Divine Power of Salvation, God the Holy Spirit. To the Father, through the Son, by the Spirit. . . . This appears to me the truth of the Deity as it relates to us. I say again, 'as it relates to us.' What it may be in itself; how Father, Son, and Spirit meet in the perfect Godhead; what infinite truth more there may, there must, be in that Godhood, no man can dare to guess. But, to us, God is the end, the method, and the power of salvation; so He is Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. I look at the theologies, and so often it seems as if the harmony of Father, Son, and Spirit had been lost, both by those that own and by those that disown the unity. One theology makes the Father and cruel, longing, as it were, for man's dishonour, extorting from the Son the last drop of life-blood which man's sin had incurred as penalty. Another theology makes the Son merely one of the multitude ofominous men, with somewhat bolder aspirations laying hold on a forgiveness which od might give, but which no mortal might. Still another theology can find no od in the human heart at all; merely a abstraction of human nature in this desire for God, this reaching out for immortality. The end is not worthy of the end; I do not want to come to such a father as some of the theologians have painted. The method is not worthy of the end; no end could come to a perfect God through such a Jesus as some men have described, the power is too weak for both; and all that Christ has done lies useless; and all the other's welcome waits in vain for the soul at has in it no Holy Ghost. But let each real, and each be worthy of the others, and the salvation is complete. That is our faith in the Trinity—'three Persons and one God.'" [SERMONS, New York, 1875.]

Analogies have also been drawn from the physical universe around us, as in the following passage from a work on physical science, in which it is even suggested that, beyond mere analogy, there may be some actual manifestation of this mystery of the Divine nature, as of the Divine attributes, in the physical world around us. After a brief summary of the main results of experiment and research as regards the theory of Light, the writer concludes as follows:—

"Another step further yet. The inquiry is irresistibly suggested, whether the comparison and the analogy may not go further, and afford us some revelation deeper still. That inquiry is strictly legitimate. 'If our universe be in truth an objective and conditioned manifestation of any absolute Source of all being, it should be thus: the Actual ought, in its limited measure, to reveal to us truly the Essential and Eternal. The student of nature, at all events, does hold expressly that if Nature has any Author, she must speak aright of Him if she speak at all; and as for the so-called religious man, while any book can only take a secondary place in such an inquiry as this, he also believes that it ought to be thus, since his book actually says so. The point of surpassing interest therefore is, whether as regards this question there is any definite agreement between these two, as to which Science can have anything to say, or possesses any means of judging. What then do we find? We are bound here, at least, to ask the expounders of physical science first, for every reason. We inquire, therefore, what purely physical science, and experiment, and speculation—what they at present appear to teach us?"

"[1] They tell us of an intangible, invisible Ether, which cannot be touched, or tasted, or contained, or measured, or weighed, but yet is everywhere; which contains within itself the most essential properties of Matter, fluid and solid; and yet which is not matter, though it can communicate its own motions to matter and receive motions from it. [2] They speak to us next, according to the latest and most widely-received vortex theory of Sir William Thomson, something vaguely about this Ether taking Form. They suggest to us how vortices in it may appear to us as the atoms of Matter, which we do see, and feel, and handle; and which, in this form, can be limited, and contained, and measured, and weighed; and in which the Ether may become, as it were, incarnate and embodied. [3] They tell us, in the third place, of a mysterious Energy, which also takes protean forms, but which, in one form or other, is doing all the physical work of the kosmos. Through it Ether acts upon Matter; and Matter reacts upon Ether or upon other Matter.

"And this is all; and our Light embodies them all and reveals them all. It is motion, a form of Energy; it is motion in the Ether; and it is invisible, inconceivable, unknown to us, unless Matter, to make it visible, be in its path. There are these Three and these only; each distinct and separate; and yet the three making up One, a mysterious unity which cannot be dissolved. So far the purely physical philosopher. Pondering attentively this wonderful triune splendour which he has put before us, it may seem strange that he at least should sneer at any other Trinity in Unity, seeing the kindred mystery in which he himself acknowledges that he dwells. Ether: Matter: Energy: no one of these can be conceived of, hardly; apart from the others; yet each is separate and distinct. Take away either, and what becomes of the Universe, as we know it or can conceive it? And yet this Universe, at least, is monistic—is one harmonious whole. The mystery of Nature is not only as great, but actually appears to be of the very same kind as that which theologians have taught us concerning the mystery of its Author.

"For now we are at liberty to turn to the other, and ask him. He has known nothing of all this; never even dreamt of it, since it is the last growth of the nineteenth century. But, purely from an old Book he possesses, he too has, somehow or other, and long before the other, also gathered a conception, and even framed it into a set theological formula. It will be interesting at least to see what his conception is.

"[1] He tells us, first, that he believes in an eternal, immortal, invisible, inconceivable, infinite Essence, the one Source and Father of all. [2] He believes that this first essential Being has in a mysterious way become embodied in a Second, in some inconceivable manner co-existent with and yet derived from Him; who is the brightness of His glory and the visible Image of His person,* and in whom and by whom all Things were made. [3] He affirms that these two work or act by and through a third, an equally mysterious Energy; whose operations assume many forms; who does all things, alike in matter and in spirit; who is as the wind, blowing where it listeth; and who finally brings all conscious agencies that yield to Him, into harmonious relation and equilibrium with all that surrounds them. That is the creed of the Christian, however he came by it: more particularly, indeed, it is the special creed of the Trinitarian Christian, so much derided during the last twenty years. He also says and believes, like the other, that, although he cannot explain it any more than the physical philosopher, these three are One. An strange to say, he too goes so far as to affirm that the Motions of the third originally produced that Light which we have found such fascinating study; and that to him, also, th is an express symbol and revelation of the Three!

"This is but a suggestion and inquiry, a dogmatism is not pretended from either side. But if there should be reality and if behind the belief of both parties as we have listened to them, is there not indeed be an obvious, deep, fundamental, marvellous agreement? More than this; if the should be true wisdom in what has been taught us by one of the most popular teachers of modern philosophy; if it true that 'Religion and science are, therefore necessary correlative;' if it is true that 'Force, as we know it, can be regarded as a certain conditional effect of the Unconditioned Cause, as the relative reality indicating to us an Absolute Reality, by which it is immediately produced;' if it is further that 'objective science can give no access of the world which we know as external, without regarding its changes of form as manifestations of something that continues constant under all forms;' and if it is finally true as regards Spirit and Matter, that 'the one is, no less than the other, to be regarded as but a sign of the Unknown Reality which underlies both;' if these conceptions of whom all regard as, at least, a great thinker can embody anything more than a vague dream is not this correspondence we have found precisely of the sort we ought to have expected to find?

"The comparison and the inquiry appear any case to be singularly interesting. I student of Nature, at least, will not object it; nor should we turn away repelled from the suggestion that Light may be to him Revealer such as he has longed for, lead him into sight of, though not within, the most Secret of all. And as for the other, too, may perhaps learn to hear of Matter possessing 'the promise and potency of every of life,' without resentment, and to attach the phrase a new meaning, which may chance be the basis of a great reconciliation that has been long and sorely needed, what he believes be true, he will at least be learnt in another way, that 'the invisible things of Him since the creation of the we are clearly seen, even His eternal power and Godhead, being understood by the things are made.'"

It may be said, in conclusion, that a method of regarding this great mystery of Godhead by the principal divines of our century is all characterised by the conviction that the doctrine is in unison with the high inent of our reason. It is remarkable, at least, that the doctrine of the Trinity has been accepted by many of the most profound philosophers who, leaving the old standards, have sought out independent lines of thought, and who were the last men in the world to accept a mere dry creed, or to receive anything merely upon authority under any circumstances. The deep teaching of the reign of Jacob Behmen [q.v.], obscure as one of it, has exercised a great influence on the modern philosophy. The great names of Leibnitz, Schelling, Schleiermacher, may all be adduced as those of men who have felt that there is a profound truth in the Catholic doctrine, which answers to the facts of nature and the needs of the soul, and which would be best by a rejection of all dogma but that of the Unity of God.

Trinity Sunday.—This festival is not so ancient a date as the rest of the feasts of the Church. Stephen, bishop of Liège [620], had an office drawn relating to the mystery of the Trinity which made its way into other churches,
at some time the practice was opposed on the ground that the praises of the Trinity were celebrated daily, and that it did not need a particular festival; but when the mystery was attacked by the Arians and heretics, the Church thought it right to fix a solemn day in its honour. It is said that in XXII. fixed it for the Sunday following Whitsunday; but this is questionable, as in 65 a Cardinal is found asking Benedict
III. to settle this festival; and Gerson reports that in his time the keeping of it was very much. The reason why this day was chosen as most seasonable was that after Christmas the Church received a fuller knowledge of the orions and incomprehensible Trinity than before.

Trisagion [Gr. tris, "three," and aggion,
"sacred"]—The Greek name for the TERSANTUS [Gr.].

Tritheism.—The doctrine which teaches that there are three Gods, instead of three persons in the Godhead. There was a passage of men in very early times who turned a doctrine of the Trinity into Tritheism, instead of three Divine Persons under the name of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in the midst of three collateral, co-ordinate, and originated principles, as we learn from one of the Apostolical Canons, which says: "If any bishop or presbyter baptise not according to the command of Christ, *In the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,' but in three unoriginated principles, or in three Sons, or in three Paracletes or Holy Ghosts, let him be deposed." It is supposed that this doctrine was introduced by a branch of the Gnostics.

Trithemiuss, John, Abbot of Spanheim, in the diocese of Treves [6. 1462, d. 1516].—He was transferred to a convent at Wurzburg,
where he died. The most remarkable of his works are on Church history—De illustribus Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis and Catalog. illustr.
virorum Germaniam suis ingenii et locubrationibus omnifomian exornunt. He was accused of magic and unlawful correspondence with spirits, but his character has been vindicated from this charge by several writers.

Truce of God [in the Latin of the Middle Ages, Treuga Dei (treuve or trevca, from the German word treu, "faithful") was a limitation of the right of private warfare in-trouced by the Church in order to mitigate an evil which it was unable to eradicate. It provided that hostilities should cease, at least on the holy-days, from Thursday evening to Sunday evening in each week, also during the whole seasons of Advent and Lent, and on the octaves of great festivals. This regulation was first introduced in 1017, in Aquitaine, where a bishop professed to have received command from God for its institution;
then in France and Burgundy. In 1038 the Diet of Soleure deliberated respecting its estabishment in Germany; under William the Conqueror it was introduced into England, and in 1071 into the Netherlands. It was a subject of discussion at many Councils;
at Narbonne [1064], Troyes [1083], Clermont [1065], Ronen [1066], Rheims [1136], and St. John Lateran [1139 and 1179], and was enjoined by special decrees. At a later period the truce was extended to Thursday;
excommunication was the penalty for those who engaged in private warfare on those days.
The truce was also extended to certain places,
as churches, convents, hospitals, etc., and certain persons, as clergymen, peasants in the fields, and in general all defenceless persons.
At the Council of Clermont it was made particularly to include all crusaders.

Trudpert.—A missionary trained in Ireland who started off when he heard of the work accomplished by St. Gall [q.v.], in the desire, if possible, of carrying it on after his death. He chose the Black Forest as his mission field, but when he got as far as Breisgau he was cruelly murdered by his enemies.

Trullo, Council in. [COUNCILS, par. 6.]

Trullo, Bishopric of.—Christianity was probably introduced into Cornwall in the third century. Soon after the Saxons landed in Britain, the Cornishmen purchased by an annual tribute permission from Cerdic to exercise the rites of the Christian religion. Solomon, King of Cornwall, professed Christianity in the fourth century. The See of Cornwall was founded about 614, and extended as far as the Isle of Wight. In 927, Howel, King of Cornwall, was defeated by Athelstan, who in 936 named Conan, a native Cornish bishop, to the Cornish See in the Church of St. Germans on Dec. 5th, and from that time Cornwall became an English, not a British, See. On the death of Burthwold in 1027, the See of Cornwall was added to that of Crediton, and in 1050, under Leofric, who became Bishop in 1046, the seat of the united dioceses was fixed at Exeter. The union of the Sees continued till the passing of the Truro Bishopric Act in 1876, when the parish church of St. Mary was assigned as the cathedral church. The first bishop, Edward White Benson, the present Archbishop of Canterbury, was consecrated at St. Paul's on St. Mark's Day, 1877. Through his exertions a scheme for building a new cathedral was set on foot, the architect of which is Mr. J. L. Pearson. The Prince of Wales on May 20th, 1880, laid two foundation stones of the new building.

Besides the Bishop, the cathedral chapter consists of two archdeacons and nineteen honorary canons. The diocese extends over the whole county of Cornwall and part of Devonshire, and comprises 236 parishes, including sinecures. The income of the diocese is £3,000 per annum.

Trustees for Chapels.—The Act of 1830 [13 and 14 Victoria, c. 28], known as Sir Morton Peto's Act, provides a simple method of transferring chapel property to new trustees. The chairman of the meeting at which the appointment is made signs and seals the document, which is to be attested by two or more witnesses who were present at the meeting.

Tübingen, a small town on the Neckar, eighteen miles from Stuttgart, has been for 400 years the chief nursing place of the scholars of Württemberg. Not only poets [Wieland, Uhland, etc.], but philosophers [Schelling and Hegel], Protestant theologians [as Ecolampadius, Osianer, Pfaff, Ötinger, Storr, Baur, Dorner], and Roman Catholics [Möllner, Hefele, etc.] were all graduates of Tübingen. This University, though the character of the country is deeply religious, has produced some of the most learned opponents of Christianity—Paulus the De Baer the Pantheist, Strauss the author of Life of Jesus. The theological studies though they are tinted more or less with Hegelian Pantheism, cherish with grave reverence the memory of such men as Bengel, who firmly taught Gospel doctrine during the infidel apostasy of the eleventh century and who crowed the churches. The Tübingen theologians of the last century were men by mysticism. They had a special taste for apocalyptic and millenarian topics. Thus Gottlieb Storr, their prince representative in his time [6, 1746, d. 1806] occupied a position analogous to that of eighteenth century Methodists in England. He asserted the authority of the Scriptural against the Rationalism of Kant, and especial emphasis on the evidential value of the miracles.

But a darker side of the university of Tübingen is seen in the prevalence of Hegelian philosophy. The founder of the school was F. C. Baur [4, 1792, d. 1860], whose critical investigations in the New Testament led him to the opinion that the past Epistles were the production of the sec number, that some of St. Paul's Epistles not genuine, and that a great gulf separate St. Paul from the other Apostles. In this may be regarded as the special tene the later Tübingen school. Peter and J were Jewish in their views, only distinguished from their brethren by their faith that Ch was the promised Messiah. Paul maintain a doctrine that the Crucifixion made Chr the Saviour of the world, and elaborate theory of justification which to them strange, and of religious freedom which them was abhorrent. For the sake of p they were for a while silent, but the divine broke out in the Apocalypse, which refe to St. Paul and his teaching when denoue the Nicolaitanes. The Gospel of St. Je Baur pronounced not genuine. But as grew older he modified his views great and his Christianity of the First Three Turies [1853], though it hardly rises as Unitarianism, is a more conservative an than his previous writings. He asserts pure morality of Christianity, while he its miracles. The tendency of modern critic in the Tübingen school has been to rev all this. The judgment concerning St. t and the synoptic Gospels has been to rec their historic truth, and the manifest tenableness of the theories of Strauss, was Baur's scholar, has driven the scholar a closer approximation to the ancient faith Christendom.

Tulchan Bishops.—A celebrated that belonging to the annals of the Scot Church. The Concordat of Leith [see p. 1] was appointed one of the Queen's chaplains, and used frequently to preach before her. In 1878 he was Moderator of the General Assembly. Since then he wrote some valuable theological works, the principal being Rational Theology in the Seventeenth Century, The Christian Doctrine of Sin, Facts of Religion and Life, and Movements of Religious Thought during the Nineteenth Century.

Tunkers. [Dunkers.]

Tunstall, Cuthbert, Bishop of Durham, born about 1476, at Hackforth in Hertfordshire. He was educated at Oxford and Cambridge, whence he removed to Padua, and took a Doctor's degree. He was a good scholar, being a perfect master of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and the best mathematician of his times; he was likewise a considerable civilian, canonist, and divine. He obtained the living of Stanhope in 1508, in 1515 became Archdeacon of Chester, in 1516 Rector of Harrow-on-the-Hill and Master of the Rolls, and in 1519 Dean of Salisbury. He went abroad on several embassies; amongst others he was sent by Henry VIII., in 1525, to treat with the Emperor for the release of Francis I. of France. In 1522 he was consecrated Bishop of London, in 1523 made Privy Seal, and in 1530 translated to the See of Durham. He was a decided Reformer, but without separating himself from the Church; he acknowledged the King's supremacy, and remained in favour with Henry VIII., to whom he surrendered the monastery of Durham in 1540. In 1552, not being prepared to accept Edward VI.'s sweeping measures, he was ejected from his See, but was restored again by Queen Mary, and ejected a second time by Queen Elizabeth in 1559, on declining to take the oath of supremacy, and died the same year at Lambeth, where he had been placed under a mild surveillance.

Turks.—The name in one of the Good Friday Collects under which are included in the prayers the followers of Mahomet, in whatever land they may be. In the four classes, Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics, are meant to be included all who are out of the Communion of the Church.

Turlupins.—A sect of the fourteenth century who had their chief seat in the Isle de France. They were the same as the Brethren of the Free Spirit, who were condemned by the Roman Pontiffs. There is nothing to explain the meaning of the name "Turlupin." They ran from place to place begging their bread with wild shouts, and refusing every kind of labour as a hindrance to Divine contemplation and the ascent of the soul towards God. In their excursions they were followed by women, with whom they lived in the most intimate familiarity. They distributed amongst the people books which contained the substance of their doctrine, and held nocturnal assemblies in out-of-the-way places at which, to imitate Paradise, they divested themselves of all clothing. They pretended to extraordinary spirituality and devotion. The sect was severely persecuted and did not last long.

Twisse, Dr. William, born at Speenhamland, near Newbury, in Berkshire, in 1575; died in London in 1646. He was sent from Winchester to New College, Oxford, where he studied for several years and took his D.D. He was the most celebrated Calvinist of his time, no one having managed the controversy with Arminius with more exactness and advantage. He was a man of upright life, and, as he sided with the Presbyterians at the commencement of the Civil War, he lost his preferments; but his party had a great value for him, and made him one of the Assembly of Divines, and at last elected him their Prolocutor. He wrote Of the Morality of the Fourth Commandment as still in force to bind Christians, and The Riches of God, Love unto the Vessels of Mercy, consistent with His absolute Hatred of the Vessels of Wrath, and a great number of tracts.

Tyndale, John, translator of the Bible, was born at a small village in Gloucestershire, about 1484; died, 1536. Most writers say that the name of the village was Smythbridge, but there is a certain amount of uncertainty about all the facts of his early days. The exact date of his entrance at Oxford is also unknown, but recent researches have discovered that he took his degree in 1512. A few years later he went to Cambridge, his zeal for studying the Bible probably inducing him to go and consult Erasmus, then at the height of his fame. In 1521 he became tutor to a gentleman named Welch, who lived in Gloucestershire, and it was there that he finally resolved to undertake the task of translating the Bible into English. He was much dissatisfied with the teaching and general behaviour of the clergy in the neighbourhood of Sir John Welch, and translated a pamphlet which Erasmus had written in Latin called The Manual of a Christian Soldier; this was a violent protest against the wicked lives of the clergy, and, of course, brought down a storm of abuse on Tyndale's head; he was, however, firmly supported by his master and patron. In 1523 he went to London with an introduction to Tunstall, Bishop of London, expecting to have extra facilities for carrying out the work to which he was resolved to devote himself. He found that, so far from that being the case, it was impossible to do the work there, so many impediments being thrown in his way. In the following year, therefore, he went to Hamburg, from thence to Wittenberg, where he became acquainted with Luther, and there he translated the New Testament into English. He used for text-books Erasmus's Greek Testament, Vulgate, and the German translation by Lutl. It was printed at Cologne, and it was decid that the first edition should consist of 3 copies. An enemy to the Reformation, Sebastian Cocleus, tried to prevent its being printed at all; but, failing in this, he sent word to Henry VIII. and Cardinal Wolsey to ad that all the ports should be strictly watched in order that its admission into England should be prevented. It arrived in England about the middle of the year 1526, and mediately an assembly of the Bishops called together, and they unanimously pronounced it. The Bishop of London went far as to say that any one in his diocese for being possessing a copy was to be excommunicated. Of this first edition a portion of copy only, so far, is known to exist, and this is in the British Museum. In language, exe for spelling, it is astonishingly like our Authorised Version published in 1611, which we have in use. The next few years of his were devoted to writing pamphlets on doctrine of Justification by Faith, the first which was entitled the Wicked Mammon, was condemned on all sides, Sir Tho. More going so far as to call it "a very sur and well-springs of wickedness." Tyndale was nothing daunted by this favourable reception, and in the follow year published The Obedience of a Christ Man, next to his translation the most impant work of his life. He now began translate the Old Testament, and publish the Pentateuch in 1530, of which there is perfect copy extant in the British Museum and in the same year he wrote the Practice Prelates, in which he again fiercely denouncing the customs and ways of the Roman Cath priests. All this time he was still living Germany, chiefly at Marburg; but in 16 permission was given to print the Bible England, and Tyndale intended to retu home. With that intention he went to Awerp; but his enemies, by treachery, took him and had him put into prison. He was k there for nearly two years, in spite of all efforts made in England and on the Continent and at last, in 1536, he was burnt to death at Lisbon, near Brussels, with the prayer on lips, "Lord, open the King of England's eyes.

Tzsirner, Heinrich Gottlieb, German theologian, [b. at Mittweida Saxony, 1778; d. in 1828].—He was ed cated at Leipzig, and took orders in 18 In 1803 he published the first part of History of Christian Apologetics, with preface by Reinhard, but he never finished. The same year he was appointed Profess Ordinarius in Wittenberg, and in 1809 he receive a Chair at Leipzig, where he showed himself to be a Rational Supernaturalist, adhering principles which he subsequently developed his Letters on Reinhard's Confessions [Leipz.

In 1814 he accompanied the Saxon troops, under the Grand Duke of Weimar, as chaplain. In 1815 he Corporation of Leipzig appointed him a minister in that city. In 1821 he published an Explanation of Haller's Seccession, and, in 1822, Catholicism and Protestantism in a Political Point of View, which quickly went through three editions and was translated into English, French, and Dutch; both works were occasioned by Haller's becoming a Catholic. In several publications he attacked the arrogance of Catholicism and the mysticism of Protestants. His last work was How Did it Happen that France remained Catholic? in Politz’s Annals of History and Politics. He died very suddenly.

Ubiqitarians [from Lat. ubique, “everywhere”].—A sect of Lutherans which rose and spread itself in Germany, and whose distinguishing doctrine was that the body of Jesus Christ is everywhere, or in every place. Trent, one of the early Reformers, is said to have broached this error in 1560; Andreas Flacius helped to spread it. They were heartily opposed by the Universities of Wittemberg and Leipzig. Soon after, a controversy began in the Palatinate about the real manipulation of the Body of our Lord in the Sacrament. To prevent the ill consequences of this dispute Frederick III. ordered the Heidelberg Catechism to be riven up. [Heidelberg Catechism; Ursit.] Afterwards, at the Conference at Faulbronn, 1564, they argued about the use of the words used at the receiving of the sacrament. Luther and Melanchthon both enjoined that they held the doctrine of ubiquity, at after their death the disputes were renewed, and this hypothesis was dressed up in specious and plausible form by Brentz, Chemitz, and others, who maintained the communication of the properties of Christ’s divinity to His human nature. In 1577, at the monastery of Bergen, it was recognised as a Lutheran doctrine in the Formula of Concord, though by no means all the Lutheran divines are agreed on this point. His divines of Tübingen in the seventeenth century upheld the theory in opposition to the divines of Giessen.

Ubiquity. [Ubiqitarians.]

Uckewallists.—A sect who derived their name from Uke Walles, a native of Riesland, who published his opinions in 1537. He entertained the doctrine of Universalism, and believed in the eternal salvation of Judas and the rest of Christ’s murderers. His argument was, that the period of time between the birth of Christ and the descent of the Holy Ghost was a time of deep ignorance, during which the Jews were deprived of Divine light, and that therefore their sins would not be visited with the deepest severity. His followers did not long retain his name as a badge of separation, and became merged in the Mennonites [q. v.], to whose doctrines their founder strictly adhered.

Ullmann, Karl, a great evangelical theologian, born at Epfenbach, in Baden, in 1796, died 1865. He was first educated in the schools of Morbach and Heidelberg, and afterwards in the Universities of Heidelberg and Tübingen. His first work, written while he was a private tutor, Ueber die Sündlosigkeit Christi [“On the Sinlessness of Christ”], at once gained for its author the reputation of a powerful theologian. He had been under the influence of Neander, and must be held one of his most distinguished disciples. In 1821 he was appointed Professor of Divinity at Heidelberg, and there made the acquaintance of Ummheim [q. v.], with whom he began the publication of a journal called Studien und Kritiken. It has been in existence ever since, and is one of the most able and widespread theological journals in Germany. He was always an advocate for theological discussion being utterly unrestricted, his first essay on the subject being published at Halle in 1830, whither he had recently been invited to become professor. He soon, however, returned to Heidelberg, where he was made Director of the highest ecclesiastical council [Oberkirchenrath], a position of great trust and dignity. Here he wrote several articles against Strauss’s Life of Christ. Some years later, in 1858, he was elected to the office of Bishop, so called, in the duchy of Baden, and went to live at Carlshaus, where he stayed till his death. His greatest work is of an historical nature, and raises Ullmann to the rank of one of the chief historians of this century. Its title is Reformers before the Reformation. He strenuously maintains that the Reformers based their teaching on that of the Bible, while the Roman Catholics ignored the Bible altogether. He worked hard, but not successfully, to unite the different Protestant sects that existed in Baden, and also to raise and improve the social position of the Lutheran clergy.

Ulphilas.—The most interesting figure in the history of early Teutonic Christianity. All nations of Germanic descent may be said to owe to him the beginning of their religion and literature. The knowledge we possess of the working of the Church in the fourth century is very scanty, but the life of Ulphilas, the Apostle to the Goths, as he is called, is a striking exception. He was born in the year 318, during the reign of the Emperor Constantine, and while still young was appointed chaplain to the Emperor, and came to Constantinople a young man just as the Arian reaction was beginning, and believed what he was told, namely, that the Arian doctrine was the true doctrine of the Catholic Church. When the tide turned against the Arians, Ulphilas led a great migration of them across the Danube, his zeal quickened by his sense of the persecution of his faith, and he set himself eagerly to convert the Goths in the valleys of Mæsia to Christianity. He did not confine himself to religious instruction, but devoted himself also to the secular education of the people. As a necessary preliminary he invented an alphabet for them, their own, if they ever had one, having been lost during their wanderings. He translated the Bible into the Gothic language, omitting, however, the Books of Kings, as he feared the influence such writings might have on the bold, warlike spirits of his flock. He made great progress, having from the first won their confidence by his frank and cheerful disposition, and persuaded them to cultivate their lands, to make their homes comfortable, and to live at peace with their neighbours. But about the year 374 the little settlement was disturbed by an invasion of the Huns, and it was agreed that they should ask to be allowed to make a settlement within the boundaries of the Roman Empire—thinking that they would be safe from intrusion. Gibbon describes in his stately periods the great movement across the Danube which followed the permission. A million of them are said to have crossed, and they gradually spread themselves over the countries of Southern Europe, and mixed with the native inhabitants. Ulphilas was engaged with them until the year 388, when he died.

The translation of the Scriptures made by Ulphilas has for us this surpassing interest: that it is the first writing we possess in our own mother tongue. The discovery of the Codex Argenteus (so called because it was written with silver letters) in a Westphalian monastery in the eleventh century gave the Teutonic race the first example of their language written down. Up to the days of Ulphilas it had been only a spoken, barbarous tongue. His reduction of it to writing by means of his new alphabet was no less than the beginning of Teutonic literature. The version has been printed by the Clarendon Press, and the student of his mother tongue will, after a very brief apprenticeship, be able to trace out in it the roots of the language in which Englishmen still read the Bible. The Codex Argenteus is now in the Royal Library at Upsala.

The following is Ulphilas's version of Matt. vii. 26, with the corresponding modern English:

Ulrich or Udalric, Sr., Bishop of Augsburg, the son of a powerful German nobleman, was born in 893. At seven years old he was sent to the monastery of St. Ca for his education, and the members all became so attached to him on account of his goodness and learning that they tried to persuade him to take the habit and devote his life to the monastery. He asked time to consider the proposal, and asked the advice of a nun, Guiborate, who lived the life of a recluse. She said she was sure that he was destined to lead an active, not a contemplative, life, so he went to Augsburg as Chambein to Adalberon, the Bishop, and, when he was old enough, took orders. He made pilgrimage to Rome, and while he was the friend and patron, Adalberon, died. Ulrich did not like the successor, Hiltin, so much, b performed his duties in the cathedral well and faithfully. In 924 Hiltin died, and Ulrich was appointed his successor by Henry I Fowler. From his early boyhood he had regarded with horror the secular duties imposed upon the Bishops, especially the being obliged to raise and often lead an army; but as long as Henry lived, he refrained from expressing his dislike to the custom. On his death, however, he immediately applied to his successor Otho I, for permission to send his nephew to fulfil all his temporal duties and attend at Court pageants, etc., thus securing more time for attending to the spiritual cares of the diocese. He visited all parts of it at least on a year, and held meetings and synods for clergy twice—allowing them to come for his advice at all times, if they wished. During the civil war that broke out between Otho I. and his son Luitolf, Ulrich stoutly upheld the rights of the Emperor, and succeed at last in effectually reconciling them. City and cathedral were completely devastated by an invasion of Hungarians, but Ulrich and his nephew drove them back. The cathedral was quickly rebuilt, though not without great trouble to get the necessary funds together. It was dedicated to St. Afra, a favourite saint of Augsburg. As soon as the cathedral was finished, Ulrich much wished to retire into a monastery for the remaini years of his life, being old and worn out with work and constant fasting. But his people were so attached to him that they could not bear the idea of losing him, and begged him to remain, which he did. He died July 4th, 973, and was buried in his cathedral, which has since been named after him. He was canonised by Pope John XV., in a Bull dated Feb. 998; his canonisation is remarkable as being the first ordered to be considered general. Up to that time the saints were only revered in their own diocese or province. [Canonisation.]

Ultramontanism [from ultra montes, "the other side of the mountains"—i.e. the Alps].—As the nations north of the Alps—France, Germany, etc.—have been opposed to the Papal assumption of absolute power, they have termed the endeavours of the Roman Curia to extend the papal authority and destroy the consequence of the national Churches, such as the Gallican Church, ultramontanism. Those who explain the Canon Law on ultramontane principles are called Curialists. [CURIA ROMANA.] Ultramontanism may be briefly described as the endeavour to render the Catholic Churches of the various countries more subservient to the Pope than is compatible with the existing ecclesiastical laws of the various countries, with the rights of the bishops and Sovereigns, with the independence and intellectual freedom of each country, and with various elements of Catholicism itself. Its principles are decidedly in the spirit of GREGory VII. [q.v.]. Among the books that have been written on the subject are Count Montlosier’s work against the sovereignty of priests; Mémoire à consulter sur un Système religieux et politique tendant à renouer la Religion, la Société, et le Trône [Paris, 1826]. Its most eloquent defender was the Abbé de Lamennais, whose work—De la Religion considérée dans ses Rapports avec l’Ordre politique et civil—defends the supremacy of ecclesiastical powers over the secular in all States; declares all Protestants, and even the Jansenists, atheists, and affixes the same stigma to the Government, because the charter of France allows freedom of religious worship.

Umbreit, Friedrich Wilhelm Karl, Protestant theologian, was born at Sonneborn, in the duchy of Saxo-Gotha, in 1795; died, 1860. At the University of Göttingen he made the acquaintance of Eichhorn, who inspired him with that love of Oriental languages which is to be discovered all through his works. These, almost entirely, are devoted to the study and explanation of the Old Testament. He considered that part of the Bible to be neglected in Germany, as it still is in some parts, and therefore wrote to show the depth and power to be found in the writings of the Prophets. He was professor at Heidelberg between the years 1823 and 1829, and was engaged with ULLMANN [q.v.] in the editorship of Studien und Kritiken. His principal works were: Lied des Liedes, das älteste und schönste aus dem Morgenlande ("The Song of Songs, the oldest and most beautiful from the East"); Übersetzung und Auslegung des Buch Hiob ("Version of the Book of Job"); Grundtöne des alten Testaments ("Fundamental Principles of the Old Testament"), etc., etc.

Unam Sanctam.—The name given to a Bull, published in 1302 by Boniface VIII., which fully defined the powers claimed by the Pope. It asserted the unity of the Catholic Church under St. Peter and his successors, and declared that those who denied this doctrine denied their own Christianity. "There are two swords, the spiritual and the temporal: our Lord said not of these two swords, 'It is too much,' but 'It is enough.' Both are in the power of the Church: the one the spiritual, to be used by the Church, the other the material, for the Church; the former that of priests, the latter that of kings and soldiers, to be wielded at the command and by the sufferance of the priest. One sword must be under the other, the temporal under the spiritual. . . . The spiritual instituted the temporal power, and judges whether that power is well exercised. If the temporal power errs, it is judged by the spiritual. To deny this is to assert, with the heretical Manicheans, two co-equal principles. We therefore assert, define, and pronounce that it is necessary to salvation to believe that every human being is subject to the Pontiff of Rome." This Bull was revoked by Clement V. in 1305, under pressure from Philip the Fair of France.

Unhallowed Uses.—When a church or chapel is consecrated the building is said to be henceforth separated "from all unhallowed, ordinary, and common uses." By this is meant such as have not been made sacred or consecrated to holy purposes.

Uniformity, Acts of.—Acts which secure in every congregation of the Church of England the same form of public prayer, administration of Sacraments and other rites. The first was passed in 1559, which confirmed the Revised Prayer Book of Edward VI., and inflicted severe penalties on those who should have any other form used in church: for the first offence they were to forfeit their goods; for the second, to be imprisoned a year; for the third, life imprisonment. All who absented themselves from church on Sundays and Holy Days, without just cause, were to be fined a shilling.

The second and by far the most important Act of Uniformity was passed in 1662, by which all ministers were required to give their assent to the Book of Common Prayer, and to read the Morning and Evening Services from it, on pain of being deprived of their benefits. They were ordered to make a declaration that it was unlawful on any pretext to bear arms against the king and to deny the binding force of the Solemn League and Covenant. Episcopal Ordination was also declared to be indispensable to the retaining of a benefice. In consequence of this Act some 2,000 clergy resigned their livings. This Act was set aside by the Act of Toleration under William and Mary. [TOLERATION, ACT OF.]

In 1872 was published the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act. With exception of the introductory portion of the Act, the definition of terms used, and the Schedule, we give the Act verbatim:

The shortened Order for Morning Prayer or for Evening Prayer, specified in the schedule to this Act, may, on any day except Sunday, Christmas Day, Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, and Ascension Day, be used, if in a cathedral in addition to, and if it be church for the Order for Morning Prayer or for Evening Prayer respectively prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer.

Upon any special occasion approved by the ordination as used in any cathedral or church a special form of service may be used by any ordinary, so that there be not introduced into such service anything, except anthems or hymns, which does not form part of the Holy Scriptures or Book of Common Prayer.

An additional form of service varying from any form prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer may be used at any hour on any Sunday or holy-day in any cathedral or church in which there are duly read, said, or sung as required on such Sunday or holy-day at some other hour or hours the Order for Morning Prayer, the Litany, such part of the Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion as is required to be read on Sundays and holy-days if there be no Communion, and the Order for Evening Prayer, so that there be not introduced into such additional service any part of the Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion, or thing, except anthems or hymns, which does not form part of the Holy Scriptures or Book of Common Prayer, and so that such form of service and the mode in which it is used, is, for the time being, approved by the ordinary; provided that nothing in this section shall affect the use of any portion of the Book of Common Prayer as otherwise authorised by the Act of Uniformity or this Act.

Whereas doubts have arisen as to whether the following forms of service, that is to say, the Order for Morning Prayer, the Litany, and the Order for the Administration of the Lord's Supper or Holy Communion, may be used as separate services, and it is expedient to remove such doubts: Be therefor enacted and declared that any of such forms of service may be used together or in varying order as separate services, or that the Litany may be said after the prayer or service in the Order for Evening Prayer, either in lieu of or in addition to the use of the Litany in the Order for Morning Prayer, without prejudice nevertheless to any legal powers vested in the ordinary; and any of the said forms of service may be used with or without the reading of a sermon or lecture, or the reading of a homily.

Whereas doubts have arisen as to whether a sermon or lecture may be preached without the common prayers and services appointed by the Book of Common Prayer for the time of day being previously read, and it is expedient to remove such doubts: Be it therefore enacted and declared, that a sermon or lecture may be preached without the common prayers or services appointed by the Book of Common Prayer being read before it is preached, so that such sermon or lecture be preceded by any service authorised by this Act, or by the Biddings, or by a collect taken from the Book of Common Prayer, with or without the Lord's Prayer.

Nothing in this Act shall affect the provisions with respect to the chapels of colleges in the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham, which is contained in Section Six of the Universities Act, 1871.

The schedule to this Act, and the notes thereunder and directions therein, shall be construed and have effect as part of this Act.

"This Act may be cited as 'The Act of Uniformity Amendment Act, 1872.'"

Unigenitus Dei Filius, etc.—The are the opening words of a Bull issued by Clement XI. in 1713, which, under the name of Constitution of Unigenitus, has acquired celebrity dangerous to the Papal authority and the peace of the Catholic Church. Th Bull condemns one hundred and one propositions drawn from the work of Pasquale Quesnel [q.v.], priest of the Oratory, entitled Le Nouveau Testament traduit en François, or des Réflexions Morales. These condemned propositions were taken, almost literally, either from the Bible or other acknowledged authorities of the Catholic Church, and included those which insisted upon purity of motive, the necessity of true religious love of virtue, reconciliation with God, the general use of the Bible, and the correction of the morals of the clergy. [JANSENISM.]

Union, Hypostatical. [HYPOSTATIC UNION.]

Unitarians.—A religious body who believe in the personal Unity of God, in opposition to the Trinitarians, who believe in three Persons in one God. They are sometimes called Socinians, from Faustus Socinus, who with Laelius, in the sixteenth century originated a fresh form of Anti-Trinitarian doctrine in Poland.

Unitarianism in England dates almost as far back as the earliest translation of the Bible. Strype alludes to it in his Memoirs of Archbishop Cranmer. In 1551 a German named George van Paris, was burned for this heresy, and, four years after another person at Uxbridge. A more distinguished victim was Joan Bocher, the "Ma of Kent." Under James I. a large number of persons, some of them of rank and consideration, were executed for the same offence. Ten posthumous works of Milton, first published in 1625, show him to have adopted the views. An Act of the Long Parliament, 1648, making the profession of Unitarians a felony, was so far mitigated after the Revolution by Statutes 8 and 9 of William III., to make it punishable, in the first instance by certain civil disabilities, and, in the second by three years' imprisonment and virtual outlawry. These statutes were not repealed till 1813. In the latter part of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century we find among avowed Unitarians such names as Firmin, Emlyn, Whiston, Samuel Clark, and Lardner, and, greater still, Locke an...
Newton. Towards the close of the last century several clergymen of the Established Church (Lindsey, Jebb, Wakefield, Disney, and others) resigned their benefices in consequence of having adopted Unitarian views, while, at the same time, among numerous converts from the Dissenters, appear the names of Doctors Priestly, Price, Aikin, Rees, and others of scientific and literary merit. Amongst the General Baptists many became Unitarians. In the Presbyterian Churches of the North of Ireland the Unitarians have society of their own, consisting of several presbyteries. In Scotland there are Unitarian hapels in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and elsewhere. The supply of Unitarian ministers is chiefly from Manchester College, at York; one, however, come from the Scotch and Dublin universities.

Joseph Priestly [q.v.], a Nonconformist minister of Birmingham, ordained in 1774, penly avowed his belief in the non-inspiration of Scripture, and maintained that Christ was no more than a man, and that it was lolatry to worship Him, thus taking a trictly Humanitarian view. Priestly was compelled to leave Birmingham in 1793, and he died in America in 1804. After his death he writings and labours of Thomas Belsham did much to support Unitarianism. In 1811 he published his celebrated work, Calm Inquiry into the Scripture Doctrine concerning the Person of Christ, which was an able defence of his reed, and is to this hour considered the tandard work on the subject.

The Unitarian faith appears first to have been avowed in Germany soon after the Reformation by Martin Cellarius, a native of tuttgart, who adopted Luther’s views, but afterwards developed Unitarian principles, or which he was imprisoned, released in 1536, and died at Basle in 1564. Among other theologians who about the same time were the like result were Lewis Hetzer, put to death at Constance in 1529; John Campanus, of Wittenberg; Adam Pastor, of Westphalia; Ad Claudia, a Frenchman, who, about 1530, reached his doctrines in Switzerland and Italy. Still more noticeable was Michael Ervtesus [q.v.], put to death in 1553.

In Holland, Erasmus John, Rector of the college of Antwerp, published, in 1585, an anonymous work favouring this doctrine, called Antithesis Doctrine Christi et Anti-Christi de Uno Vera Deo. He was forthwith banished. Thirty years later, Otorode and Oidove, for similar publications, were ordered by the States-General to leave the United provinces within ten days and to have their writings burnt. In 1627 Adolphus Venatus was banished for composing a work which favoured of Socinianism, and in 1653, finding that Unitarians were increasing in Holland, the States-General, after consulting with the princes of Leyden, issued an edict forbidding the profession of the Socinian heresy and holding of its assemblies; but this does not appear to have been carried into rigid execution. To mention no other names than Episcopius and Grotius, there has probably always been a large number of Unitarians among the Remonstrants of Holland, and recent publications show that Unitarian opinions have disseminated themselves in that country to no inconsiderable extent.

As early as 1690 some English ministers complained to a synod, convened at Amsterdam, of the growing heterodoxy of the Genevan Church. In 1757, in the French Encyclopædia, the article “Geneva” announced that “many of the ministers disbelieved the Divinity of Jesus Christ, of which Calvin, their leader, was the zealous defender.” In 1798, the catechism of Calvin was superseded by another, of a character to indicate the justness of this statement. In 1807 a Liturgy, expurgated upon Unitarian principles, was substituted for that formerly in use, and two years earlier a professedly amended version of the Scriptures, which had been in preparation for upwards of a century, was published under the authority of the Venerable Company of Pastors.

In America Unitarian principles appear to have been extensively adopted in Massachusetts as early as the middle of the last century. In 1756 Emlyn’s Humble Inquiry into the Scripture Account of Jesus Christ was published in Boston, and in one of its churches a Liturgy excluding the doctrine of the Trinity was adopted. In 1805 attention was drawn to the subject by several publications, occasioned by the appointment of a distinguished Unitarian (Dr. Henry Ware) to the Divinity Chair of the American University of Cambridge; in 1816 the controversy was revived by a republication of a chapter from Belsham’s Life of Lindsey, with the title American Unitarianism. Dr. Priestly visited Philadelphia, and started a small society there in 1794. Since then they have congregations in various parts of the United States; their ministers are supplied chiefly from Cambridge. Besides the Congregational Unitarians, the denomination called Christians, which is numerous, maintains Unitarian opinions, and they also prevail in the Reformed Baptists.

In France many of the Protestant clergy reject the doctrine of the Trinity, and the principal sources of supply for their ministry are the schools of Geneva and Montauban. A society has been formed in Paris called the Unitarian Association of France.

Unitarians profess to derive their views from Scripture, and to make it the ultimate arbiter in all religious questions, thus distinguishing themselves from the Rationalists of Germany. They say that being interpreted according to the settled laws of language, the uniform testimony of the Scripture is, that the Holy Spirit has no personal existence distinct from the Father, and that the Son is a derived and dependent being who was, as some say, created in a remote period of time, or, as others affirm, beginning to live when he appeared upon earth. The Unitarians do not admit the necessity of an atonement, and consider that a conscientious discharge of moral duties is in itself sufficient to secure a man's future happiness; they cast aside the doctrine of eternal punishment, and deny the personality of the devil and the existence of fallen spirits. In America their creed is called Universalism. [q.v.] Their church government is virtually congregational. It is a curious fact that many of the buildings now occupied in England by Unitarians formerly were the property of English Presbyterians. They were excluded from the benefits of the Toleration Act until 1813, but since then have enjoyed the same political privileges as any other Protestant Dissenting body. It is difficult to ascertain their numbers, but there are probably something under 100,000 in the United Kingdom. In the official return made in 1882 their places of worship number 124.

United Brethren, Unitas Fratres. [Moravians.]

United Greeks.—A name given to those Greeks scattered in Italy, Russia, Hungary, Transylvania, and specially in Austria and Poland, who belong to the Roman Church. They acknowledge the authority of the Pope, and accept the doctrine of the double Procession of the Holy Ghost, but in other respects follow the rites of the Greek Church. They have their own clergy, who are allowed to marry when in minor orders; they receive the communion in both kinds and with leavened bread, and use their own Liturgy. Their position in the Roman Church was settled by a Bull of Benedict XIV. in 1742. They have three seminaries, each having a bishop of the Greek rite residing there to ordain the priests, but otherwise they are subject to the bishop in whose diocese they live. They number about four millions and a half.

United Presbyterian Church of Scotland.—Formed in 1847, when the United Secession and Relief Churches were amalgamated. Some account of the secessions will be found under Erskine, Ebenezer; Secessionists. In 1835 negotiations were begun between the two Synods, and in 1840 a scheme of union was agreed on. But for a time the Secession Church was occupied with the Atonement controversy, and it was not till 1847 that the union was consummated. The two Synods met in Edinburgh May 10th, and walked in procession to Tanfield Hall, where the Articles of the Basis of Union were read and adopted. In doctrine this branch of the Scottish Church holds to the theology of the Westminster Confession and of the Larger and Shorter Catechism. Its form of government is Presbyterian; has no intermediate courts between presbyteries and the supreme court, which it calls Synod. Each congregation has a sessio composed of elders, who watch over Chur matters, fixing the time for the dispensati of the Lord's Supper, etc. It is a volunta Church, and every member has perfect freed of action; it is, in fact, conducted on Co regregational principles. It has a Theologic Hall of its own in Edinburgh, to which attached five Chairs: [1] Sacred language and Biblical criticism; [2] hermeneutics and evidences; [3] exegetical theology; [4] systematic and pastoral theology; [5] ecclesia history, comprehending the history doctrine, ritual, and government. This Chur may be said to be in a very prosperous con-

United States of America, Religion in.—America has been the resting-place for many bodies of persecuted Protestants and als in a smaller degree, of Roman Catholics. The first English settlers were a small colony of Puritans who landed in Virginia in 1607, with their chaplain, Mr. Hunt. These we followed, in 1620, by the Pilgrim Fathers [q.v.] who were persecuted by Laud. Each colony brought with it its own ministers a settled its own rules and forms of worship, so that New England became the stronghold Puritanism, which developed into Congregationalism. The Quakers also fled thither from the persecution in Charles II.'s reign. Baptists, Moravians, Huguenots, Lutherans from the Palatinate, etc., settled here exercise their religious opinions un molested. Numbers also of the members of the Chur of England emigrated to America, but fortunately the Church at home was lethargy, and took no pains to provide for the spirit wants of the colonists, and consequently many years the Church of England steadily dwindled away. New life was infused into the Church at home by Wesley, and carried by him also to America. In 1740 he and George Whitefield preached at Boston with wonder success. At Whitefield's farewell sermon 20,000 persons are said to have been present. Meantime the Episcopal Church was struggling for feeble existence amongst manifold troubles. At length the Declaration of American Indep endence brought about a crisis; it became clear that if Episcopacy was not altogether die out there must be bishops on American soil. Hither to the clergy of the Anglic Church had to go to England for their ordina tion, and had to take the Oath of Allegiance to the Sovereign. This could no longer be done under the relations of the two countries so it was resolved that Samuel Seabury should go to England and be consecrated as the first American Bishop. [Seabury, Samuel; His consecration took place in Aberdeen.
Whilst Seabury was in Europe American churchmen were not idle; they held a Convention of Clerical and Lay Delegates in 1785, to choose some candidates who should be sent to England for consecration. Their voice fell on Dr. White and Dr. Provost, and on Feb. 4th, 1787, these were consecrated at Lambeth Palace Chapel, and the Church of England gave to the American Colonies which it remained to her Bishop Inglis, who may be regarded as the first missionary bishop. He Rev. J. Madison was consecrated at Lambeth in 1790, and thus there were sufficient bishops to consecrate others in America as they should be wanted. The first Consecration Service performed by American bishops took place in 1792, when Dr. Thomas Daggett was made Bishop of Maryland in trinity Church, New York. There are now forty-eight bishops, four assistant bishops, and fourteen missionary bishops. They elect one of their number to be the presiding bishop of their Conventions. The friendly relations between the Church of England and the American Church have been greatly cemented by the meetings known as the PAN-ANGLICAN CONVS [q.v.].

Wesley was so disgusted with the apathy of the Church at home that he did not wait for its help, but proceeded to ordain clergy and consecrate bishops for America. These now form the body known as the Methodist Episcopal Church.

All the religious bodies in the United States are voluntary. The principal theological seminaries are at New York, Cambridge, Madison, Rochester, Princeton, Hartford, and Adover.

Unity of the Church.—The importance of Christian Unity is plainly declared in the New Testament, as well as in the conscience of Christian men. It was one of the principal topics of our Lord’s prayer the night of His Agony [John xvii. 20]. The Apostles accordingly treated the question one of transcendent moment, asserting the unity of the Body with great emphasis, and warned disciples against endangering it [Ph. iv. 4—6]. Yet, when we look upon triumdom as it is, we seem to behold a picture of a very different character. The disciples of Jesus, professing to be His members and followers, and to live in union with Him, are broken into a countless number of outward communions, and the question at once arises, “Has the Saviour’s prayer been answered?” To this question there are three in lines of answer.

[1] The Church of Rome declares that there was established one visibly connected religious community, of which St. Peter was appointed the head, this headship devolving upon his successors in the Roman Church until the end of the world. It is therefore a mark of true Churches throughout the world, that they dutifully submit themselves to the Roman authority, and so preserve themselves in the original organic Unity of the Church. All who do not confess this obedience, and refuse to submit themselves to the central authority of the Roman Church, are in schism, and the religious bodies to which they belong have no right to the name of Churches.

[2] The view which we may call the Anglican, is that the Church was intended to preserve an organic Unity under its Bishops, but not under one visible head. Doubtless, in the Apostolic times, the Unity was so preserved, that all branches of the Church were in communion with the other branches throughout the world. Bingham gives his view of the means which were taken by the Church to preserve this Unity as the Church spread far and wide over the world, and he states them thus:—

[a] The Unity of faith was principally insisted on as the foundation; and next to this the Unity of holiness. When Christ sent forth His Apostles He enjoined them two things:—To baptise the nations in the Name [or faith] of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; and to teach them to observe all things whatsoever He had commanded them [Matt. xxviii. 20]. “If it be inquired,” he goes on to say, “what articles of faith and what points of practice were reckoned thus fundamental or essential to the very being of a Christian, and the union of many Christians into one body or Church, the ancients are very plain in resolving this. For as to fundamental articles of faith, the Church had them always collected out of Scripture in her creeds; and as to the other point of obedience to the laws and institutions of Christ, it was generally summed up into the short form of renouncing the devil and his science and his works, and covenanting with Christ to live by the rules of His Gospel.”

[b] The Church required that men should unite themselves to her by baptism, to be administered but once, and that by the hands of a regular ministry, except some urgent necessity obliged them to do otherwise.

[c] Another requisite was Unity of worship, common prayer, and the administration of the Word and Sacraments. “Which did not require that all Churches should exactly agree in the same form of words—for it was no breach of unity for different Churches to have different modes and circumstances and ceremonies in performing the same holy offices, so long as they kept to the substance of the institution.” But that which was required was that every particular member of any Church should comply with the particular customs and usages of his own Church (nothing being inserted into her offices that was unlawful), and meet for religious worship.” There are several canons in the Council of Gangra against a schismatistical spirit which raise disputes about variations in practice. [Gangra.]

According to this view the broken Unity is in part owing to the unlawful usurpation of authority by Rome, and in part to the wilfulness of other sects. The following passages from the late Bishop Wordsworth's Theophilus Anglicanus will probably be regarded as among the most authoritative statements of this, which we have called the Anglican view, of Church Unity.

"The Church is One, or United, inasmuch as all its members have one God and Father; and are united as sheep of one fold, under one Shepherd, and as members, under Christ their Head, of one Body, into which they are all baptised in one Spirit; and are all partakers of one Bread and one Cup in the Holy Eucharist; have all one Faith, and one Hope of their calling; are of one heart and one soul, loving each other as Brethren, and keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace; walking by the same rule and minding the same thing; united by the same Apostolic government, discipline, and worship; and all living with this one aim, that they may with one mind and one mouth glorify God.

"But since the Church is always a Visible Society of men, united by visible tokens, and since every Society requires a governing power for its own preservation, what is the power which governs the Visible Church?

"The Church, as a whole, is subject, under Christ, to the Laws given her in Holy Scripture, and to those laws which (not contrary to Scripture) have been enacted for her by herself, and which have been generally received and put in use in the Church.

"But Laws require living Interpreters and Executors: who, then, have this power in the Church? The Bishops of the Church, convened in General and Provincial Councils; each having full spiritual jurisdiction in that National Church, or portion of it, committed to his charge.

"Christ, as Creator, Redeemer, and Governor of the world, has delegated to every supreme Governing power, in a Christian State, an external superintending, directing, and controlling jurisdiction, with the exercise of which no foreign prelate, prince, or potentate can interfere. This jurisdiction is what the Emperor Constantine called that of an Episcopus ab extra; and it consists not only in maintaining and defending the Church of Christ in its own dominions, but in regulating and governing it; not, however, after any new code of laws, but of those of God and of the Church. And so Christ has provided for the maintenance of unity in the Church by the distinct though concurrent exercise of the spiritual and temporal Powers, and not by the commission of both or of either of them to the hands of one man.

"In the early ages of the Church, Christendom consisted of independent Provinces, and these were subdivided into what are termed dioceses, each of which had a Bishop as its Centre of Unity, the Presbyters of each diocese being subject to and united with the Bishop, and the people being in communion with their respective pastors. And as Bishop was the Centre of Unity, for purposes of diffusing Grace to all, and joining all together, and of presenting them unitedly to God, so the cathedral was the common Mother Church of the whole diocese and thus, by personal and local communion, the faithful of each diocese were united together as one man in the offices of Pious Worship, and were partakers of those Graces which are specially promised by God to those who 'dwell together in Unity.'

"St. Paul informs us, 'There is one Body and one Spirit, and one Hope of our calling one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism; one God Father of us all.' He does not add, 'Visible Head.' Let all the members of Catholic Church be 'joined together in same mind and in the same judgment,' them 'walk by the same rule, and in the same thing,' let them be united in same Faith, in the same Sacraments, and the same Apostolic Discipline and government; let them communicate with one other by means of their lawful Bishops National and in General Councils, accord to the institutions of Christ, and to unive primitive practice; let them all, each in own sphere, 'endeavour to maintain the un of the Spirit in the bond of peace;' they then enjoy the blessing of primitive Chris unity. But they will never attain this Union by subjection to one supreme visible Head which the primitive Church knew nothi and especially they cannot expect it from sjection to such a supreme visible Head as vents the one Faith by a New Creed, mutil the Sacraments, destroys Apostolic govern ment, and sets at nought the authority the Church in her synods, and having dis soulved all the bands of unity, exacts implicit subjection to all these innovat and injunctions, as an essential condition communion with itself, as a test of Church membership, and as necessary to et salvation.

This view may be further illustrated a correspondence published in January, 1 between the Bishop of Winchester Canon Basil Wilberforce, and by the circumstances which gave rise to it. All Nonconformist ministers of Southampton attended St. Mary's Church in that town receive the Lord's Supper at the hands Canon Wilberforce, avowedly as a sign symbol of Christian Unity in spite of man differences. At a later period Ca Wilberforce had preached at Albion Ch (Congregational); not at an ordinary ser but at a monthly mission service, for which the regular worshippers vacate their seats, and make an effort to gather in those who habitually attend no place of worship. Against this the Bishop, his attention being drawn to the matter, remonstrates, on the ground mainly of what is expressed in the following passages, which may be compared with those cited above:

"There are certain principles of the English Church which she has held almost throughout her history, and which, but for her, would have been probably lost sight of in the world. One is that the Church of Christ is not only an invisible company, but the visible living organism is a gift of God, and has lived on in an unbroken continuity from the days of our Lord's bodily presence unto this day. So the Church is from above, not from beneath; and it is not possible for a single man, or body of men, in recent times to constitute a new Church at their own pleasure. Another is, that though the Church is Divine, it has yet human elements, and so may require pruning, prudent and careful pruning, if it runs into excessive or unhealthy growth. Unless these two principles are acknowledged, the Church of England is indefensible; her very raison d'être is gone. The Church, according to the Church of the New Testament and the primitive ages; the Church as reformed (when corrupt) on the exact model of the primitive body; these two are the pillars of the primitive body; to give these up is to give up all, for if they are not sound the Church of England cannot be defended, either if having separated herself from communion with the Roman Church, or [3] for not simply asking her stand as one of a number of Protestant sects.

"Now to ignore this, to break down all boundaries, to acknowledge that we are but one of a multitude of heterogeneous communities of human origin, is to deprive us of our vantage ground, and the world of the hope which springs from our occupying such a vantage ground. If we, and all the other Christian bodies in England, are to be described as alike Churches of different denominations; then we lose the most onmipresent body in the world, assuming a position to which we have no right, unless we are, indeed, the ancient Church of the nation come down in a continuous stream from the mountain head."

In a second letter responding to a reply from Canon Wilberforce, the Bishop implies that the maintenance of this Church position is the real hope for the unity of the Church in the future, and says:

"My chief objection to dissent is not to the doctrines or discipline of any particular sect, but that its very principle is to ignore the unity of the Church of Christ, inventing a thing unknown to scripture and the primitive Christians, of a spiritual, invisible, and indefinite body of Christ, substituting a multitude of discrete and disconnected sects. All that tends to confirm and perpetrate this theory is a direct detriment to the glory of our blessed Lord, that His Church might be One as a united witness to the world." (John xvi. 23).

To this it should be added that the Bishop himself and those who agree with him pass a judgment on the piety of the devotion of Nonconformists. It would be absurd and contrary to plain facts to question the deep religious earnestness and intense spirituality (such men as Baxter or Robert Hall. But hschurchmen hold that the Church of England, with her precise formularies, her august traditions, and her apostolic ministry, is peculiarly fitted to be a pillar and ground of the truth; that though she has at times seemed to bow before the set of public opinion, it was but for the moment, and that she quickly recovered her position; and especially that her influence has been very great, and was never greater than now, upon religious bodies outside her pale. Those who hold this view point to the vast difference between the Roman clergy in England and those in other parts of Europe, and hold that the high superiority in England is owing to the influence of Protestantism upon them; while it is urged that the influence of our Liturgy and of Church teaching upon the Nonconformist bodies also is indirectly very great, and that where such influence has been absent, as in America and elsewhere, Nonconformity has passed into avowed Unitarianism. On these grounds Anglicans hold that for the Church to practise self-effacement, and to abandon her distinctive marks and insignia, would be to inflict a blow upon religion in general, without furthering the cause of Christian brotherhood.

[3] It remains to state the Nonconformist view of this great question. This is of necessity very largely a direct negative to many of the statements on which the foregoing argument is based, but accompanied also by a positive doctrine of a totally different character. It will be convenient to state each aspect of this view in turn.

Nonconformists altogether deny that the "government, discipline, and worship" referred to in the foregoing, are (as there implied) "Apostolic," on which the entire argument depends. They deny this on the following alleged grounds: [a] Whilst it may be traced to early Fathers and the early Church, it cannot be found in the New Testament, or traced to the primitive Church, and is therefore due to corruption and a craving after outward ceremonial, which have ever been active in causing such developments. They point to the historical fact that the growth of ecclesiastical preconformist was of great rapidity during the early centuries, and believe therefore that the process crept in at an exceedingly early period, and that the only safe authority for the practice and nature of the really Primitive Church is to be found in the teaching and history contained in the New Testament itself. [b] When thus tested, according to the simple, evident, natural meaning of the text, much of the Episcopal system (they say) is in direct contrast to Apostolic teaching and practice, neither of which gives the slightest hint of a worship confined to Liturgy, of "consecrated" elements, of a ministry confined to Episcopal "orders," or of any of the modern ideas of a "bishop" whatsoever, but very many indications and hints of the contrary to all these things. [c] If Episcopal claims are just, the difference between their own view and the Episcopal, in regard to ministry and the sacraments, is so enormous, that there must appear conspicuous differences in Christian graces and life between those enjoying such exalted privileges, and others. This they affirm, with all charity; and especially as regards the attitude assumed towards themselves, they are unable to find.

Nonconformists further say that the Episcopal argument, legitimately worked out, leads to Rome and not to Anglicanism. This they consider is borne out both by the notorious number of conversions to that faith during late years, and by the fact that the Christian recognition denied to themselves is freely awarded to that communion, even in such cases as that of the Spanish Reformed Church [q.v.], Roman orders being freely acknowledged, whilst attendance at their own meetings is frequently denounced as a grievous sin. And as to the assertion in reply [see above] that the Church was "reformed (when corrupted) on the exact model of the primitive body," they respond [a] as stated already; and [b] that this was not the fact, as simple matter of English history; that the Church never did as a whole reform herself, with that pure desire and intention; that her emancipation from Rome, and reform, were effected by the civil government, and formed a political shuttlecock during four reigns; that a very few ecclesiastical individuals directed it who had themselves risen high in the Roman communion, without any consultation of the Church at large, and under limits rigidly laid down; and that all existing practices were simply taken for granted as Apostolic, which were not either felt to be intolerable corruptions, or held to be politically objectionable. Church writers themselves, when writing from other points of view, represent what happened as a "compromise" between widely different beliefs. In reference to their own beliefs, on the other hand, they deny and disclaim what is imputed to them; affirm that they on their part have, with that single purpose lacking on the part of the Church, made honest and conscientious endeavour to find and to follow the "model of the primitive body," from what they regard as alone authentic evidence thereof; and say that to stigmatise the result of this their endeavour as "of man," in supposed contrast to the other, is simply the easy arrogance of self-assertion, and—considering human fallibility—unbecoming to any body of professing Christians whatever.

Nonconformists have, however, also a positive doctrine on the subject. They hold that as [a] the Mystical Body or true Church of Christ confessedly consists of all who have possessed a true and living and obedient faith in Him, so [b] the Visible Church similarly consists of all who on earth profess such faith, and may in charitable judgment be fairly accounted His followers. It is therefore amongst these that Unity is to be manifested; and obviously this must be mainly done by a manifest spirit of love, mutual kindliness and forbearance, the pursuit of common objects, and fellowship in the Gospel. This view, it is affirmed, is borne out by Scripture. In the passage cited at the beginning [Eph. iv. 4—6], the one emphatic direction for practical conduct which precedes that statement of the doctrine is to endeavour to "keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace." This they affirm they endeavour to do, and by the grace God do in some measure attain unto. As their different organisations, they say the Scripture itself contains abundant evidence of much variation in practice amongst different (local) Churches, and at different times. Whilst churches were few, and persecution forced them together, this was insufficient to cause even outward distinction but they reason that when persecution ceased and congregations have multiplied, is natural for those who agree in most point to congregate together. They say that the "denominations" really, and by their own express profession, mean no more than this, and that these denominations take care, speech and action, in countless ways, make the world understand that they regard one another as brethren, and as belonging to the One Church of the Redeemer. It is freely admitted by some Nonconformists, that differences in practice afford insufficient ground to build denomination upon. But they argue that the Episcopal Church is even more open to this reproach since there was a time when their forerunners were in communion with her, but were compelled to choose between a painful departure or a surrender of all the beliefs they held concerning primitive doctrine and practice; and this also disposes of the assertion sometimes made, that they ought to find, and would find sufficient liberty within her walls. On the other hand, they affirm that among Nonconformists these distinctions show signs of breaking down. Others hold that such denominations are useful as bearing special witness to some special truth—as that of the Frien to the work and power of the Holy Spirit—but in the meantime it is agreed by all, or near all, that in brotherly co-operation and into course the essential Unity of the Body can and is fully manifested, so far as these are shown. It is affirmed that as regards that w to the world, of which so much is said, t world at large does fully understand this, as that the "lapsed masses" practically this nothing at all of the differences in organisation between those whom they see to be wor ing in real harmony, while they do often speak bitterly of the differences between Church and Dissent, which they see to be of very different kind.

Comparing the two views, Nonconformist further argue as follows:—[a] If the Unity of Scripture was to be outward and organ and in the Episcopal form, it is very strange that no means were taken to ensure so important an object, which a very few sentences of apostolic instruction would easily have done; whereas there is none such, but countless exhortations to the Unity of Spirit. [6] If organic union were the true Unity, and so far beyond other considerations as Anglicans make it, then the days when it was as yet unbroken would exhibit the golden age of the Church in piety, devotedness, and holiness. The direct contrary is the case, and the Reformation movements were simultaneous with true religious revival in an age of nanscous ecclesiastical corruption. [c] Those who, at a later period, adhered to the Anglican Unity, would be, on the whole, conspicuously superior in Christian grace and work, and those who departed from it, on the whole, marked by deficiency in these respects; regarding the great omissions caused by the Act of Uniformity, and under the Wesleys, and in other cases, they allege that the very reverse was conspicuously the case. [d] Lastly, they say that the Episcopal idea of Unity has absolutely promised and no hope (beyond an absolute surrender of men's convictions such as is demanded by Rome), and has been evidently and conspicuously condemned by the Providence of God itself, since it is manifestly n impossible and impracticable, and every day sees its realisation further removed; while, on the other hand, the Unity of the Spirit, openly manifested in the sight of men, is quite practicable, is only limited by the grace of God given to men irrespective of conscientious conviction, and is, in every direction but one, growing more manifest day by day. That exception, they say, lies in Anglicanism itself, which they affirm, adopting the Bishop of Winchester's conditional admission above in an affirmative sense, is in truth "the most chismatistical world in the world," since it is, with the exception of the Church of Rome (and without the special historical plea of that Church in justification), and one or two obscure sects of the Plymouth Brethren description, refuses as a whole any practical manifestation in the sight of men of that Unity which the Lord and His Apostles held so dear. In fine, they affirm that there is no real breach of unity, and is in fact felt to be none, amongst different denominations who on fit occasions work together, exchange pulpits, and meet and regard each other as brethren; but that there is sin and schism, and division of the visible Body of Christ, on the part of any who stand apart and deny to other godly Christians such recognition, much more who apply to them injurious language or epithets. This view also may be illustrated in the occurrences and correspondence cited above. Canon Wilberforce himself, in his reply to the Bishop, though in many points he is a recognised exponent of what are called High Church principles, to a certain extent endorses the Nonconformist view as to Christian Unity. He supposes the return of the Lord Jesus Christ, and asks if the "Church" which He would recognise and call to Himself, would be in any degree coterminal with the Church of England, or would not be rather gathered from all united by faith to Him? And he then says:—

"If this would be true in the event of the archangel's trumpet sounding to-morrow, it must have been true at the first Sunday night when I was preaching in the Albion Chapel; and if I refuse to recognise it, and consider many of His own to be outside the pale of His Body because they walk not with us, while they cast out devils in His name, and are doing, and doing well, half the Christian work of this country, it is I, and not they, who are guilty of the sin of schism.

"Allowing to the uttermost all the advantages to be derived from the fact that the Church of England is indeed the ancient Church of the nation come down in a continuous stream from the fountain head," is nevertheless true that the soul of man has not to wander eighteen centuries back to find the thrilling touch, the close guidance, and the all-surrounding love of the personal Lord Jesus Christ; and if I refuse fellowship with believers in Christ who are living in vital union with their risen Lord, because they do not see eye to eye with me upon questions of apostolic order, I am grieving the Spirit, marring the secret unity of the Body, and rending the seamless robe."

Pointing then to this episode, and to many such on record, Nonconformists affirm that there is no schism on their part, but that in countless ways (as on this occasion by going in a body to partake of the Lord's Supper at Canon Wilberforce's hands) they have tried to manifest, and so far as lay in them did manifest, to men, the Unity of the Body; but they ask if the Church of England has done the same, or manifested by its action any Unity, of any sort at all which the world can judge of? They admit that Episcopal views must of necessity affect reciprocity; as, e.g., in this case, no conscientious Episcopalian could go to receive the Lord's Supper at unconsecrated hands. All such distinctions and limits they understand and respect. But when such action as the Canon did take is protested against, and the same position is taken in other ways, they say that it is the Anglican Church, and not they, who are breaking the Unity of the Body of Christ.

It hardly needs mentioning, that there are varieties and degrees of each view. Thus, even above we find Canon Wilberforce in part adopting that of those who, in all points of detail, differ from him widely; and there are Nonconformists who more or less incline towards Anglican views. But in their real and essential nature the opposite views are as above; and while there is such profound difference of opinion, the bounden duty of each is to exhibit the utmost personal kindliness and Christian fellowship consonant with his own conscientious convictions. The Bishop of Winchester's letters above quoted, it is well to remark, furnish very strong evidence of this, and it is in this direction that all must seek, and may hope to find, the more excellent way. Meanwhile, whichever may be adopted of these conflicting views, the evils of disunion are but too patent; and although matters have greatly—very greatly—improved since his day, we cannot but still find only too much to endorse in the following vigorous protest of Robert Hall—"Christian societies, regarding each other with the jealousies of rival empires, each aiming to raise itself on the ruins of all others; making extravagant boasts of superior purity, generally in exact proportion to their departures from it, and scarcely deigning to acknowledge the possibility of obtaining salvation out of their pale, is the spectacle which modern Christianity presents. The bond of charity which unites the followers of Christ, in distinction from the world, is dissolved; the evils which result from this state of division are incalculable. It supplies infidels with their most plausible topics of invective; it hardens the consciences of the irreligious; weakens the hands of the good; impedes the efficacy of prayer; and is probably the principal obstruction to that ample effusion of the Spirit which is essential to the renovation of the world."

Universalism.—The name given to the doctrine held by large numbers of Christians to the effect that all men, and also the devil, and fallen angels, will be forgiven and will share eternal happiness. The belief in Universalism is of very ancient origin, and passages implying it may be found in the works of Origen and his followers, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, etc. It is also said to have constituted part of the creed of the Lollards, Albignenses, and Waldenses. Among the English divines who have held the doctrine are Archbishop Tillotson, Dr. Burnet, and William Law, and in modern times Professor F. D. Maurice. All Unitarians hold the doctrine of Universalism, and some of the Universalists agree with the Unitarians in rejecting the doctrine of the Trinity.

The Universalists ground their reasons for their doctrine in the love of God, Who, they say, is only angry with sin, not the sinner, and therefore if the sinner repents even after death his repentance will restore him to God's favour. The sovereignty of God will be finally vindicated by the ultimate harmony of the moral universe, and the submission of all things in heaven and earth to His holy will. That will is righteousness; to the triumph of that, and not universal happiness, all things tend, but when righteousness is triumphant then peace and happiness will prevail; until then pain and suffering will be His instruments to work out His will. With regard to the argument from Scripture, Universalists hold that in the text, "And these shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal" [Matt. xvi. 46], the word ἀιωνίος, translated "eternal," does not express any idea of duration at all, either finite or infinite, but used to denote a mode of existence perfect dissimilar to any chronic state. To prove this they quote John xvii. 3: "This is eternal, that they might know Thee." Late Bishop Martensen quotes in favour this view, "As in Adam all die, even so Christ shall all be made alive" [1 Cor. xv. 22]; "At the name of Jesus every knee shall bow" [Phil. ii. 10]; "That He may gather together in one all things in Christ" [Eph. i. 10]; "For it pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell, a... by Him to reconcile all things unto Himself" [Col. i. 19-20, and 1 Tim. iv. 10]. Universalism is better known as a distinct sect in America than in England. In 1828 division arose among the American Universalists concerning punishment after death, so asserting it to be limited, while others denied it altogether. Some separated from the body and called themselves "The Massachusetts Association of Restorationists." Most of them afterwards joined the Free-Will Baptists or the Unitarians, while the others turned to the main body. In 1840 the whole sect divided into two, the Imperialists and the Restorationists. But Universalism is held by members of other sects.

Universals.—A term of scholastic philosophy signifying the general properties whi many things share alike, and which the mind must conceive of by abstracting itself from the things that exhibit them. Thus, for example, if I make use of the words "animal," "blaneness," "kindness," the possible ideas may occur to the hearer of a dog, ink, givi money to the poor. For each of these words come under the respective words, but the word which has imagined instances of them and from the examples of them which adduce, or are they mere modes of intellectual expression? Those who answered the former question in the affirmative were known Realists [q.v.]; those who denied it were with various modifications, termed Nominaists [q.v.].

Universities were originally spontaneous aggregations of learned men; the circumstances of attraction to particular localities are seldom to be traced. A teacher inspired by a love of learning gathered around him circle of learners. Other teachers followed the circle increased, and thus by a pure natural process a school was founded. This process may in general be said to have taken...
lace in the eleventh or twelfth centuries, but earlier schools of the nature of universities were founded at Alexandria and Antioch in the fourth century [Alexandria, Catechetical School of], and became exceedingly famous under Pantaenus, Clement, and Orieron. How great must have been the reputation and influence of such schools when they were not few in numbers and when oral instruction was nearly the only path to knowledge; how great the noble pride of the professors and the enthusiasm of the scholars when, from all the countries of Europe, learners flocked to spend long years in Bologna and Paris that they might share in this instruction.” [Mullinger, p. 71.]

The earliest of this kind of European school, the histories of which can be historically traced, are those of Bologna, Paris, and Alcalà: the first, the greatest school of civil law; the second, of “arts” and theology; the third, of medicine. But although these “schools” were originally distinct, those who wanted to perfect themselves in each branch of learning going successively to the “school” there it was specially taught, just as in modern times a man would sometimes go to Cambridge for mathematics and to Oxford for logic and classics, graduating perhaps at both universities—each “school” gradually incorporated with its own particular study the branches of learning which were taught at the others. Thus a school of arts and medicine was founded at Bologna in 1316, and in the latter half of the same century a school of theology was founded by Pope Innocent VI. The name preserved at Oxford, where the Lecture and Examination Halls are still called “The schools,” and where the studies of the several branches of university learning are named The School of Theology, the “School of arts,” etc.

But the University or “School” of Paris as that which had most influence in Europe during the early revival of learning, and upon this model Oxford and Cambridge, and all the other great universities of Europe, appear to have been established. It was distinctly ecclesiastical in its associations, and tradition points to the Church of St. Geneviève as the race of its origin; and it was in Paris at the particular studies which had been previously carried out in separate “schools” were first combined under the name of universities,” a term originally applied to any corporation, but in this case taking the sense of such a combination or incorporation of various branches of learning, that the whole body might fairly be called a fice of universal learning. It was in Paris at university degrees originated, the “degree” being originally a licence to teach under the title of “Doctor,” as a Doctor of theology, a Doctor of Civil Law, or a Doctor of Medicine. At Paris also originated the division of students into “nations,” which were four in number—the “French Nation,” which included Spaniards, Italians, and Greeks; the “Picard Nation” which included students from the North-East and from the Netherlands; the “Norman Nation;” and the “English Nation,” which included Irish, Scottish, and German students.

Many Continental universities were formed in the thirteenth century by the dispersion of students from Bologna and Paris through civil discord. Thus arose those of Montpellier, Toulouse, Padua, Vicenza, Pisa, Verceilî, Arzzo, and Ferrara. To the same period and the same cause may be attributed the great increase and development of the two great Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. [Oxford, University of; Cambridge, University of.]

Unleavened Bread.—There was a great dispute in the Middle Ages between the Schoolmen and the Greeks as to what kind of bread should be used at the Eucharist; the Greeks called the Latins Azymites, for consecrating in azymus, i.e. unleavened bread; and the Latins charged the Greeks with deviating from the example of Christ and the practice of the ancient Church by using leavened bread. Our Saviour doubtless used unleavened bread when He celebrated His last supper, but it was at the time of the Passover, when none other was to be had; and from the following arguments it will be seen that the early Church always used common bread: [1] The elements were usually taken out of the oblations of the people, where doubtless common bread and wine were offered. [2] It is noted by Epiphanius, as a peculiar rule of the Ebionite heretics, that they celebrated in unleavened bread and water only, which argues that the Church did otherwise. [3] The ancients say expressly that their bread was common bread, such as they made for their own use upon other occasions. [4] The ancients are wholly silent as to the use of unleavened bread in the Church, but they many times spake of leavened bread, and sometimes the Eucharist is spoken of as fermentum, i.e. leaven. [5] It is observable that neither Photius nor any other Greek writer before Michael Cerularius, A.D. 1051, ever objected to the use of leavened bread in the Roman Church, which argues that the use of unleavened bread did not prevail till about that time, else there is no doubt that Photius would, among other things, have objected to this. These arguments put the matter beyond all dispute, that the Church for a thousand years used no other than common or leavened bread in the Eucharist, but how or exactly when the change was made it is not easy to determine. The first Common Prayer Book of Edward VI enjoins that unleavened bread be used in the Holy Communion throughout the whole kingdom; it was ordered to be round, in imitation of the wafers used by the Greek and Roman Churches, but it was to be without all manner of print; (referring to the impression either of a crucifix or the Holy Lamb), and something more large and thicker than the wafers, which were the size of a penny. This rubric was set aside at the review of the Liturgy in the fifth year of Edward, and another inserted in its room, by which it was declared sufficient that the bread be such as is usually eaten at the table. By the injunctions of Queen Elizabeth wafer-bread seems to have been again enjoined, for among other orders this is one, "For the more reverence to be given to these holy mysteries, the sacramental bread [shall be] made and formed plain, without any figure thereupon, of the same fineness and fashion, round, though somewhat bigger in compass and thickness, as the usual bread and wafers, heretofore called singing-cakes, which served for the use of private mass."

In the Ritualistic controversy which has recently been going on, the restoration of unleavened bread was one of the points in dispute. A Rubric at the end of the Communion Service says, "It shall suffice that the Bread be such as is usual to be eaten." On the one side it is contended that the words "it shall suffice" leave it optional to use either; on the other, that ordinary bread is alone admissible according to the rubric. The Folkstone Judgment took the latter view as follows:—

"The only question on the construction of the rubric is that raised upon the words 'it shall suffice.'

"There is no doubt that in many cases these words standing alone, and unexplained by a context, would be quite consistent with something different from, larger or smaller, more or less numerous, more or less costly, than what is mentioned, being supplied. Here, however, the sentence commences with the introduction, 'To take away all occasion of dissension and superstition, which any person hath or might have concerning the bread, it shall suffice,' etc. These words seem to their lordships to make it necessary that that which is to take away the occasion of dissension and superstition should be something definite, exact, and different from what had caused the dissension and superstition. If not, the occasion of dissension remains, and the superstition may recur. 'To suffice,' it must be as here described. What is substantially different will not 'suffice.'"

"The rubric, which orders that the bread and wine shall be provided by the curate and churchwardens at the charges of the parish, seems to contemplate ordinary bread as the only material to be used, and the Twentieth Canon is still more precise in the same direction.

"The former rubric (1552, 1559, and 1601) had said, 'It shall suffice that the bread be such as is usually to be eaten at the table with other meats, but the best and purest wheat bread that conveniently may be eaten.' Queen Elizabeth's Injunction of 1561 on the same subject (in its form mandate, and acted upon many years after) was issued when this rubric had the force of law, and must be understood in a sense consistent with, and not contradictory to That Injunction distinguishes between 'sacramental bread' and 'the usual bread and wafers, heretofore named singing-cakes, which served for the use of the private mass,' directing the former to be made and formed plain, without any figure thereupon, and the same fineness and fashion round' as latter, but 'to be somewhat bigger in compass and thickness.' The form, and not substance, is here regulated. To order use of the substance properly called 'wafer' which was not 'bread such as is usual to be eaten at the table,' would have been direct contradictory to the rubric; and this can be supposed to have been intended." [FOLKESTONE RITUAL CASE.]

Urban.—There were eight Popes of the name: Urban I. was chosen to succeed Calixtus I. in 225, and was beheaded in 230 under the Emperor Alexander Severus.

Urban II., called Odo or Eudes, was born at Châtillon-sur-Marne, and was a monk at Cluny. Pope Gregory VII. made him Cardinal and Bishop of Ostia. He was chosen Pope after Victor III. in 1058, the Church of Rome being then divided by the schism of the Anti-Pope Guibert, or Clement III. He communicated the Emperor Henry IV. a Clement III., but was at length compelled by their superior strength to fly from Rome, but on the revolt of Conrad against his father the Emperor, in 1093, he was once more established in Rome. He ruled with great prudence. In 1095 a Council was held at Clermont, at which Urban made the famous speech which was the means of stirring up the Christians to undertake the first Crusade. He died at Rome in 1099.

Urban III. was Archbishop of Milan, and was raised to the Popedom in 1185, in succession to Lucius III.

Urban IV., the son of a cobbler at Troye, was chosen Pope after Alexander IV. in 1261. He was Archdeacon of Liége, the Bishop of Verdun, and afterwards Patriarch of Jerusalem. Manfred, King of Sicily and heir of the Ghibellines, sent troops to attack the Papal States. Urban published a crusade against him, and, with the help of Robert of Flanders, defeated him and invited Charles, Count of Anjou and Provence, come and receive the crowns of both Sicilies. Manfred, however, drove the Pope out of Rome, and he died at Perugia in 1264. He instituted the Feast of Corpus Christi in 1264.

Urban V., a native of the diocese of Mend, was a Benedictine monk, and took his degree of Doctor in Canon Law and Divinity.
which he taught at Montpellier and Avignon. He was then made Abbot of St. Victor of Marseilles, and in 1362 chosen Pope in succession to Innocent VI. He took up his residence at Avignon, and one of his first acts was to excommunicate Bernabo Visconti, the tyrant of Milan, who had seized some cities belonging to the Papal States, and having defeated him, Italy for a time enjoyed some peace. The Pope then went to reside at Rome in 1367, where he was received with acclamation; but the city was in a miserable condition, and the surrounding country a prey to incessant internal disensions. These he tried, with the help of Joanna, Queen of Naples, to suppress; but, finding the task beyond his powers, he determined, in 1370, to return to Avignon, where he died almost immediately on his arrival.

Urbani VI. Pope from 1378-1389. An account of him will be found in the article PAPA SCHISM [q.v.].

Urbani VII. a native of Rome, Cardinal of St. Marcel, and famous for his learning. He had held important posts under Paul IV., Pius IV., Pius V., Gregory XIII., and Sixtus V., and on the death of the latter, in 1590, was unanimously chosen to succeed him, but he died before his consecration.

Urbani VIII. Cardinal Maffeo Barberini, was chosen Pope in 1623, after Gregory XV. He was a native of Florence, and studied in Rome and Bologna under the Jesuits, and held various offices under several Popes. He aimed at the temporal rather than the spiritual prosperity of the Papacy; he was a lover of learning and a patron of learned men. In 1624 he concluded the wars about the Valtellina, which had become an intricate political question between the Courts of Rome, France, Spain, Austria, and Savoy; he declared that the Commonwealth of Venice was to be treated as a crowned head; in 1626 he reannexed the Duchy of Urbino to the patrimony of the Church without the aid of arms; he also settled the dispute about the succession of the Duchy of Mantua. In his time began the long conflict known as the Thirty Years' War and also the earlier stages of the great Jansenist controversy. He supported Richelieu and France against Austria and Spain in a war which broke out in Italy in 1635. In 1642 the Papal State itself became the scene of petty warfare. The nephews of the Pope (the Barberini) persuaded their uncle to take military possession of the Duchy of Castro, then held by Odoardo Farnese, Duke of Parma; Farnese, aided by the Duke of Modena and the Republic of Venice, marched an army across the Papal frontier, and bore all before him, and in 1643 the Pope was obliged to give back Castro. The disappointment of his schemes is said to have hastened his death; he died in 1644. He composed some hymns and several pieces of Latin and Italian verse. He instituted a new order of Knights, The Conception of Our Lady, the first of which were Charles Gonzago, and Uladislaus IV. of Poland. He canonised Ignatius Loyola and St. Philip Neri. In his pontificate happened the trial of Galileo [q.v.], and also that of Centini, a nephew of Cardinal Centini of Ascoli, who joined with several dissatisfied men bent on destroying the Pontiff, and had recourse to magical arts to effect his purpose. He intended to murder Urban, and then to place his uncle, the Cardinal, on the Papal throne. The plot was, however, discovered, and as the judges themselves believed implicitly in the virtue of magic, the crime was made capital. Centini was beheaded, others of the conspirators were burned, and the rest were sent to the galleys. Urban founded the College of the Propaganda, enlarged the Quirinal Palace, and enriched the library of the Vatican.

Urbi et Orbi.—A phrase applied to Papal rescripts which, having been issued by proclamation in the Piazza of the Campo di Fiore, are affixed to the gates of the Vatican, and so published “to the city and the world.”

Ursinus, Zachary.—One of the most eminent divines of the sixteenth century [b. at Breslau in Silesia, 1534; d. at Neustadt, 1583]. He was educated at Wittenberg, and here made the acquaintance of Melancthon, who entertained a great friendship for him, and took him to the Conference at Worms in 1557, from whence he went to Geneva and thence to Paris, in order to learn the French language and perfect himself in Hebrew under the famous Jean Mercier. On his return to Breslau he wrote Theses de Sacramentis de Baptismo et de Conde Domini, in which he took the side of Calvin and Melancthon, but he so managed the subject of Conde Domini that the leading party in the town accused him of being a Sacramentarian. He endeavoured to justify himself, but, not giving satisfaction, he chose rather to quit his country than continue a quarrel, and, his friend Melancthon being now dead, he went to Zürich, where he fraternised with Peter Martyr, Bullinger, etc. In 1561 he was invited by the University of Heidelberg to settle there in their “Collegium Sapientiae,” and they made him their Professor "Locorum Communium," a chair which he held till 1568. In 1564 Ursinus, with Olevianus, drew up the Palatinate or Heidelberg Catechism, and at the instance of the Elector, Frederick III., wrote a defence of it against the attacks of Flacius Illyricus and other rigid Lutherans. The Elector was accused of having set forth a doctrine concerning the Eucharist which the Augsburg Confession had condemned, so he ordered Ursinus to write a Tract explaining the Doctrine of the Sacraments. Ursinus was present at the Conference of Maulbronn, where he argued vigorously against the Ubiquitarians [q.v.]. On the death of Frederick III., in 1577, his son and successor, Lewis, would allow no minister to live in the Palatinate who was not a thorough Lutheran, so Ursinus had to leave Heidelberg for Neustadt, where he made Divinity Professor in the Schola Illustris, newly founded by Prince Casimir, the second son of Frederick III. Here he died in 1583, in the forty-ninth year of his age.

Ursula, Sr.—Said to be a princess of Great Britain, who was martyred near Cologne with eleven thousand virgins, who accompanied her. Certainly some parts of the story are fabulous, but it is impossible to sift truth from legend with accuracy. The story accepted by Baronius is that Maximus, being proclaimed Emperor in 382 by his army in Britain, passed into Gaul to establish the power thus usurped against the Emperor Gratian. One of his commanders, called Conan, a British prince and a Christian, so signalised himself in this expedition that Maximus gave him, as a reward, the kingdom of Armoric or Little Brittany. Conan having established his residence at Nantes, sent deputies to demand Ursula in marriage from her father Dunnat, King of Cornwall, with as many young women as would bear her company and become the wives of the Britons who had accompanied him to Brittany. The ambassadors being well received, the princess and her companions took ship at London, but a storm carried them towards the Rhine. The Huns, who were on the side of Gratian, seeing that the ships were British, came down upon them and took them; and the women, being exhorted by St. Ursula to die rather than surrender their virtue, were barbarously massacred. This was in 383. It is not easy to say how many were killed; an historian of the eighth century says only that the number was very great; it is a writer of the twelfth century who affirms that 11,000 virgins were slain; and others say there were but eleven in all, which opinion they ground on ancient titles wherein the number is marked in Roman figures thus: xi. m. v., which, they say, means "eleven martyred virgins," and they add that the arms of the city of Cologne were eleven flambeaux, because, being besieged by the Swedes in 1205, these virgins presented themselves for its defence, each with a flambeau; while others say each flambeau represents a thousand. In Cologne there is still a church dedicated to the 11,000 virgins, where their skulls and various relics are shown.

Ursulines.—An Order of nuns founded originally by St. Angela of Brescia in 1537, and so called from St. Ursula [q. v.], to whom they were dedicated. At first they did not live in a community, but dwelt in their own homes, and were employed in acts of charity and compassion, such as visiting hospitals, nursing the sick, relieving the poor, and teaching the ignorant. In 1544 Paul III. confirmed their Order, and they were further approved in 1572 by Pope Gregory XIII. at the instance of Carlo Borromeo, who had brought son of them to Milan. Sixtus V. and Paul V. granted them new privileges, and in course of time they lived in nunneries and embraced the regular life. The first to do so were the Ursulines of Paris, who entered the cloister 1614 under Madeline Luillier, a nun of St. Beuve. The foundress of the Ursulines of France was Frances de Bernoud, who induced twenty-five young women of Avignon to embrace the rule of St. Angela of Brescia. The chief employment of the Ursulines, after the establishment into a regular Order, was to teach young women; their nunneries were chosen for the education of girls of the higher rank of life.

Use.—The different customs which prevailed in different dioceses with regard to ritual, specially the celebration of mass, are known as "uses." In former times bishop had the power of making what they considered improvements in their liturgies, and these customs or uses in time took the name of the diocese where each prevailed. The principal uses are those of York, Hereford, Sarum, Bangor, and Lincoln. The most remarkable is that of Sarum [Salisbury]. It was drawn up by Osmund, Bishop of Salisbury, about 1085; he rebuilt his cathedral and regulated the ecclesiastical offices of his diocese and brought the service into such order that in time his book of offices was adopted in many parts of the kingdom. The uses of Hereford and York were adaptations of the Sarum Missal. To this day, in churches where the seasons are marked by the use of different colours, there is diversity, some following the Roman, others the Sarum use.

Ussher, James, one of the greatest ornaments of the Irish Church, was born in Dublin in 1580. His father was a clerk in the Court of Chancery; his mother was daughter of James Stanihurst, three time Speaker of the Irish House of Commons, man who had become prosperous and wealthy, by conforming alternately to Romanism and Protestantism according as expediency seemed to point. It is no wonder that his daughter was of no deep convictions, and that he eminent son received no help from her in his religious guidance. But he had two old blind aunts who supplied the deficiency, for these were clever as well as pious. They carried his education to a certain point; beyond that he owed it to Trinity College, Dublin. James VI. of Scotland, while taking such steps as he could to secure his succession to the throne of Elizabeth, sent two eminent scholars to Ireland, James Fullerton and James Hamilton with the object of starting a good school in Dublin, and at the same time creating an interest on behalf of James. Under them little Ussher was placed. His uncle, Henry Ussher, then Archdeacon of Dublin, was then busy engaged, by Queen Elizabeth's sanction, in founding Trinity College. He collected large funds, and the college was opened Jan. 9th, 1593. The first Provost was Walter Travers, who has obtained an enviable notoriety as the opponent whom Hooker overthrew in controversy, but he was a learned as well as pious man. Among the first fellows were Hamilton and Fullerton already mentioned, and Daniel, afterwards Archbishop of Tuam, who translated the New Testament into Irish. To the new college Ussher was sent, now in his thirteenth year. He laboured hard at the learned tongues, but from the first his attention was given chiefly to history and chronology, and he drew up a chronology of Old Testament history as far as the Book of Kings, differing little from that which he put forth as the result of his matriculation. He was also led, through the faltering and conflicting views of his mother's family, to study the Roman controversy, and from his twentieth year, when he took his M.A. degree, to his thirty-eighth, his biographers tell us that no day passed without his studying the Fathers, from the Apostles' time down to the Schoolmen of the thirteenth century. But he had already made his mark as an active controversialist. In his nineteenth year he accepted the challenge of a Jesuit, Fitz-Symonds, to a public disputation, and is said to have completely discomfited him. In due course he was ordained, and at once made his mark as a preacher, and before long was appointed Professor of Divinity in the University. Some officers in the army subscribed a very large sum for a present of books to the University, and Ussher was appointed, with a Dr. Challoner, whose only child, Phoebe, he afterwards married, to administer it. This led to his first visit to England, which from that time he repeated every third year, spending three months, one in Oxford, one in Cambridge, and one in London. Archbishop Loftus appointed him to a stall in the Cathedral which involved the pastoral care of the parish of Finglas, and whilst he pursued his learned studies, he was always once on Sunday in his parish pulpit. His work in drawing up the Irish articles in 1615 has been spoken of elsewhere. [IRELAND, CHURCH OF]

During one of his visits to England, Ussher, who had been warmly recommended to King James by the Irish Government, had an interview with him, and the King was so impressed with him that, the Bishopric of Meath falling vacant, he appointed him in 1620. He is said to have shown himself powerful there in converting the Roman Catholics to Protestantism, and he published a tract on the religion of the ancient Irish to show how unlike it was to Romanism. In 1624 he was appointed to the Primacy of Ireland, the Archbishopric of Armagh. Not long after he converted the famous Earl of Peterborough to his faith. The troubles between Charles I. and his Parliament brought heavy calamities on Ussher. He fearlessly urged Charles I. not to yield to the popular clamour by signing the warrant for Strafford's death, and when the unhappy King gave way Ussher was with Strafford to the very end. The Irish rebellion of 1641 laid the country waste; Ussher's house was plundered—only his books were saved to him. They were sent to him in England. His income was gone; he was even for a while left in want. He was with the King at Oxford in 1642, and his preaching is said to have been most moving. When the King had to leave Oxford, Ussher took refuge at Cardiff, until Lady Peterborough, in gratitude for the service he had done her, invited him to London. Some of the gentry round Cardiff subscribed for the money to convey him there, and sometimes at the London house of the Peterborough family, sometimes at their country residence at Reigate, he spent the rest of his life. He was studious as ever, and for eight years held the office of Preacher at Lincoln's Inn, but was at length compelled by bodily infirmity to resign. He still remained loyal to the unfortunate Charles, visiting him in the Isle of Wight, where he attempted to mediate between him and the Parliamentary Commissioners as to Church government. He proposed that the bishops should still be continued, but should not have independent authority, but should act in conjunction with their presbytery, that the archbishops should be moderators of provincial, and bishops of diocesan synods, and that the important business of provinces and dioceses should be transacted in these assemblies; but that nothing should be done against the direct will of the bishop. This has often been referred to as affording a possible means of uniting Episcopal and Presbyterian discipline. The Parliament were much inclined to it, but their power was gone; it had passed into the hands of Cromwell and his army.

Ussher laboured to the last. The day before his death he spent several hours in his study, then visited a sick person, discoursing, says his biographer, "for near an hour in so heavenly a manner as if, like Moses on Mount Pisgah, he had then a prospect of the celestial Canaan." He died in 1656, and by Cromwell's command was buried in Westminster Abbey, the Church Burial Service being allowed for the occasion.

His learning seems to have been amazing, especially in historical subjects. His chronology of the Scriptures, though modified by later discoveries, is still known as the "Received Chronology," which we have in our reference Bibles. His Antiquities of the British Churches, Treatise on the Religion of the Ancient British and Irish, Answer to a Jesuit, are all works of sterling value. He also wrote on the epistles of Polycarp and Ignatius, on the Samaritan
Usury.—A contract for the loan of money to be returned again with interest. By the laws of Moses the Israelites were forbidden to take usury from their brethren upon the loan of money, victuals, or anything else [Ex. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 36; Deut. xxiii. 19], though they might do so from strangers [Deut. xxiii. 20]. This latter permission, as Michaelis observes, is a proof that the Law of Moses did not condemn the borrowing at interest as bad in itself; but because the Israelites were now poor, and strangers to commerce, borrowing at that stage of their life would be not for the purpose of raising capital wherewith to traffic, but from poverty, and in order to procure the common necessaries of life. It would therefore have been a hardship to have exacted from such borrowers more than was lent. That later in Jewish history Usury among the Jews was practised, we have clear proofs [Ps. xv. 5; Prov. xxviii. 8; Isaiah xxiv. 2; Jer. xv. 10]. On the return from the Captivity, Nehemiah called on them to “leave off this usury” [Neh. v. 7, 10, 11]. Our Saviour denounced extortion and promulgated a law of love and forbearance. [Luke vi. 30, 35.]

The practice of exacting an exorbitant rate of interest for the loan of money is condemned by the universal conscience of mankind, and many laws have been made to check it. The first prohibition in England was made in the days of Edward the Confessor, but that law appears to have become obsolete, for in 1126 usury was forbidden only to the clergy, and in 1138 it was decreed by the Council that “such of the clergy as were usurers and hunters after sordid gain and for the public employment of the laity ought to be degraded.” In 1199 the rate of interest for money was restricted to 10 per cent., and this continued to be the market rate until the reign of Henry VIII. In 1311 Philip IV. fixed the interest that might be exacted in the fairs of Champagne at 20 per cent. James I. of Aragon, in 1242, fixed it at 18 per cent. In 1490 the rate of interest in Placentia was 40 per cent. Charles V. fixed the rate of interest in his dominions at 12 per cent. In 1546 the rate in England was fixed at 10 per cent.; in 1624 it was reduced to 8, in 1651 to 6, and in 1714 to 5.

In the early Christian Church the Fathers were strongly opposed to the system of lending money on interest; Tertullian, Cyprian, Ambrose, Jerome, may all be quoted against it. But as the laws of States and of political economy changed, it became evident that commerce could not be carried on without a rate of interest, and it was acknowledged by casuists that there were just grounds why a moderate rate might be exacted. Sure were the risk to the lender, and the loss which he is put by the want of the capital b which he might have traded. Luther too the ground which had been taken by the early Fathers, and condemned the whole principle and in modern days Mr. Ruskin has taken the same ground with much heat and vigour. Calvin, however, drew the distinction which is ever since admitted between fair and exorbitant interest. The latter he called “usury.” Under such a head would rightly be classed interest which is unjust, because it is not justified by risk to the lender nor by advantage to the borrower, and exorbitant money which is exacted from the borrower because he is in extremity of need and has no choice. In the Roman Church considerable debate has been held from time to time on the lawfulness of usury, and in theory it is so forbidden under certain conditions that absolution is refused to receivers of it. But in 1830 the Congregation of the Holy Office, with the sanction of Pope Pius VIII., decided that they would take interest on the ground that the law has fixed it are not to be disturbed. And this generally accepted. Even the law which forbids the clergy to take interest is practical in abeyance. “The ancient world,” says Roman Catholic writer, “believed that money was barren, and the schoolmen inherited this principle from Aristotle. Experience proved that money produces fruit and multiplies itself, and a man may justly take 5 per cent. for money which is well worth that to the merchant bank, railway company, etc., who receive the loan.” By the English law bills of exchange and contracts for loans above £10 are not affected by the laws against usury. Five per cent. is left as the legal rate of interest for money, unless proof is forthcoming that an different rate was agreed upon between the parties.

Utraquists. [Bohemia.]

Vagantes.—This name was used in ecclesiastical law for clergy who were ordained without having been nominated to any office. Laws against such clergy were made as early as the fourth and fifth centuries, and the Council of Chalcedon [A.D. 451] forbade a bishop to ordain any who had no office. Often the Vagantes obtained ordination by simony, paying for it by doing work for those who ordained them. These were complained of the Carolingian period, and laws were enacted against them by Charles the Great. Many bishops also wrote against them. A length it was enacted that a bishop should support all whom he ordained without office, which effectually put a stop to it. This was adopted by the Roman Church at th
Valentine, Sr.—One of the black-letter Saints in the English Prayer Book, whose name is celebrated on Feb. 14. During the persecution at Rome under Claudius II., he was very zealous in his attention to those condemned to martyrdom, and was in consequence arrested and at last sentenced to death. He was beheaded at Rome about the year 270. A church on the Ponte Mole at Rome was built by Pope Julius I. to his memory, "In our calendar," says Bishop Barry, "he is called a bishop, but this is probably an error." The habit of "choosing valentines" seems to have been a pagan custom, probably connected with the season of the year, and associated by pure accident with the Christian festival.

Valentinus, Sr.—One of the Christian preachers who in the fifth century went forth to labour in those countries where Arius had taken strong hold on the minds of the people. We first hear of him in 440, when he appeared at Vindelicia, an important fort on the shore of the Danube. He managed, with the help of the few followers he had attracted, to build a rough church in the Tyrol. He spent his time in preaching to and advising all those who came to him, and found at last that his influence was making itself felt. He was joined by other disciples, among whom was Severinus [q.v.]. He is said to have been Bishop of Passau.

Valentinus was an Egyptian heresiarch, who flourished under the Emperor Antoninus Pius. It is said that he quitted the Church because another man was preferred to a bishopric which he had hoped to gain. He afterwards visited Rome and abjured his errors, but soon relapsed. He died about A.D. 260.

The religious system of Valentinus was extremely fanciful. He taught that there was one eternal and supreme Deity, Bythis, the Abyss or Unfathomable One, who, after dwelling with Sige, or Silence, for numberless ages, manifested himself by sending forth a number of Æons. These Æons, whom he represented as male and female, were the personified attributes of the Supreme Deity, each being the revelation of some quality of Bythis. They were developed in pairs, of which the first were Nous, or Intelligence, and Aletheia, or Truth. From these sprang another pair, and from them again another. These six, with Bythis and Sige, formed the Ogdoad. From the Ogdoad were produced twenty-two other Æons, and the whole thirty constituted the Pleroma, or Fullness of the Deity.

The Æons decreased in rank and knowledge, and increased in imperfection in proportion to the distance of their descent from Bythis. Nous alone possessed a perfect knowledge of the Supreme One, and the burning desire of the inferior Æons to obtain this knowledge led to a fall even within the limits of the Pleroma. To restore order Nous produced Christ and the Holy Ghost, who spread the knowledge of Bythis among the other Æons, and re-established peace.

During the struggle in the celestial world, Achamoth was born of Sophia, the last and most discontented of the Æons. Achamoth, being too imperfect to be received into the Pleroma, was cast out into Chaos, and there produced the Demiurge, or Creator, and elements of three kinds—viz. spiritual, animal, and material. Out of the elements the Demiurge constructed six regions, with six intelligences to govern them, in imitation of the celestial world, while he himself with Achamoth and the six intelligences constituted an Ogdoad, a distant imitation of the Ogdoad of the Pleroma. Man was formed by the Creator in His own image, without the spiritual element. This element was supplied by Achamoth without His knowledge, and, soon becoming apparent, roused the jealousy of the Demiurge, who forbade man to taste of the tree of knowledge, and expelled him from the intermediate region to this terrestrial world for disobeying His command.

Man growing degenerate, redemption became necessary, and the Æons combined to provide a Redeemer, each contributing something to produce the Æon Jesus, who was to be the mankind what Christ was to the Pleroma. Jesus was only apparently born of the Virgin Mary, and hence had nothing material about Him, but was formed of the spiritual and animal elements alone. The Christ of the Pleroma descended on Him at His Baptism, and left Him before the Crucifixion.

Valentinus held that men were of three classes, corresponding to the three kinds of elements—spiritual, animal, and material. The spiritual, no matter what lives they might lead, were to be united with Christ, as Jesus was, and finally received into the Pleroma; the animal men could not aspire so high, though they might, if they lived virtuously, be translated to happiness in the region of the Demiurge, but those of them who lived wickedly were to be included with the material men; these last were doomed to inevitable annihilation, however virtuously they might live.

Valentinus received the Scriptures, but interpreted them in his own way. He acknowledged as canonical many apocryphal writings which could be made to support his views. His works have not come down to us, but an account of his system is given by Irenæus.

The sect of the Valentinians spread widely. Their doctrine of the infallible salvation of spiritual men led many of them to practise all kinds of immoralities, which were doubtless the foundation for many of the charges against the early Christians.
Valerian, Persecution of.—Valerian began to rule in A.D. 253. His reign opened very auspiciously for the Church; there were many Christians in the Emperor's household, so that it was even compared to a Church of God. But in the year 257 there was a sudden change. The Christians attributed this to the influence of Macrianus, an Egyptian philosopher, who was accustomed to kill new-born infants for the purpose of drawing anguaries from the inspection of their entrails, and who hated the Christians for their opposition to his infamous practices. But, whatever may have been the cause, Valerian issued an edict, addressed to the Proconsul of Africa [1] commanding the bishops and presbyters to adopt the State religion, under pain of exile; [2] forbidding private meetings of any sort, and especially the customary meetings in the cemeteries at the graves of martyrs. The punishment of death was not expressly mentioned, but it was frequently inferred. Cyprian, Bishop of Carthage, and Dionysius of Alexandria, were amongst those who were affected by this edict. They were both banished, but were still able to address the crowds who flocked to hear them, and continued the work of conversion with great zeal.

The first edict failing to produce the desired effect, a second and severer rescript was published. By it [1] bishops, priests, and deacons were to be put to immediate death; [2] Senators and Roman knights were to be degraded, their property confiscated, and if they refused to recant, to be beheaded; [3] matrons were to be banished and have their property confiscated; [4] Cæsariani, or members of the imperial household, were to be sent to work as slaves on the Emperor's property. The first victim was Sixtus, or Xystus, Bishop of Rome. [Sixtus, St.] He was executed on Aug. 6th, and was followed, three days afterwards, by the deacon Laurentius, who was broiled to death on a huge gridiron. Cyprian was also martyred, but Dionysius escaped. Another victim was the child Cyril, at Cesarea, disinowed by his heathen father for becoming a Christian; he was led before the Governor, and after withstanding all efforts to make him deny Christ, he was put to death.

The persecution continued for three years and a half, and a considerable number of Christians suffered. It was terminated in 260 by the capture of Valerian by the Persians.

Various Readings.—We have shown in previous articles how the variations in the manuscript copies of the Scriptures have caused difficulties in the way of ascertaining the very words of the original authors in certain places. The method of treatment of the variations constitutes the work of critical investigation.

Evidence for the sacred text is of two kinds, called External and Internal. The external evidence is that of the manuscripts, and the work of weighing probabilities in the case of variations calls for the highest critical acumen as well as for delicacy of perception. Thus is evident that a mere preponderance of numbers will not settle a doubtful question; a majority may be copied from one faulty or and so be valueless. But if it be found that the most ancient copies be in harmony in given text with quotations in the writings of early fathers, and with ancient translation that constitutes a strong presumption in favour of that text. Again, if copies belonging one region be found in agreement with the in a far-distant one, so that it is clear they are not transcripts of each other, this is evident in favour of that reading. Where ane copies differ, that furnishes probable evidence that they may all be attempts at correcting some earlier corruption of the text. But the whole we may say of external evidence that the most ancient manuscripts demand the greatest respect.

Internal evidence turns upon critical examination of MSS. and the proofs to be discovered by their relative value. Thus Griesbach lays down the general canon that shorter readings is to be preferred to a longer on the ground that transcribers have a knack of adding notes and glosses which they fix on their copies from a fear lest anything should be lost. But such a rule cannot accepted as always good. A transcriber copying may be misled by the catch of a word and accidentally omit a phrase. It was the same principle that Bengel held that who readings differ, if one is easier and the other more difficult, the probabilities are in favour of the latter, on the ground that transcriber coming upon something which they did not understand, could not keep their hands off but altered it to what seemed to them the better sense. Here is a case in point. I Co xi. 29 in the A. V. reads: "He that eateth and drinketh unworthily, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the Lord's body." But all the best MSS. are within the word "unworthily." It is evident that the word was inserted by some one who found a difficulty in what he would regard as to broaden a statement. But the mistake was known, for the true translation is: "He that eateth and drinketh, eateth and drinketh damnation to himself, not discerning the body [καὶ διακρίνοντο τὸ σῶμα]." See further this subject in Mr. C. E. Hammond's very interesting and lucid little volume, Outlines of Textual Criticism of the New Testament [Clarendon Press], pp. 87-92.

We give from the same volume a few of the most important variations of the New Testament text. In 1 John v. 7-8 the Authorised Version reads: "And there are three that bear record in Heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these are one. And there are three that bear witne on earth, the spirit, and the water, and the blood, and these three agree in one." But the words in italics are not found in any Greek MS. older than the fifteenth century; and though many of the Latin versions have the words, even the best of these omit it. All critics, therefore, have come to the conclusion that the words are not genuine.

Much controversy has been spent upon the last chapter of St. Mark's Gospel, verses 9-20. Some ancient MSS. omit these verses, and it is undoubted that the style is unlike the rest of the Gospel. The Dean of Chichester, Dr. Burgon, has written a volume on this subject full of learning and of keen critical power, and has gone a great way towards establishing the genuineness.

The narrative of the woman taken in adultery [John vii. 53—viii. 11] is absent from most of the ancient MSS., and the general conclusion is that it is an authentic history preserved by the tradition of the Church, but not part of the original Gospel of St. John.

In John v. these words—"waiting for the moving of the water, for an angel went down at a certain season into the pool and troubled the water: whosoever then first after the troubling of the water stepped in was made whole of whatsoever disease he had—are not in most of the old MSS. The Revised Version omits them, but places them in the margin.

In Acts xx. 28, "the flock of God which He hath purchased with His own blood," there are several variations—"the flock of the Lord," "the flock of Christ." The Revisers have probably done well to retain the received version.

Acts xi. 20.—The Authorised Version reads "spake unto the Grecians;" the Revisers have "unto the Greeks." The MS. authority is evenly balanced, but the ancient versions and the general context favour the latter reading. The point is an interesting one, for the reason that if "Greeks" be the right reading, we must conclude that the persecution which followed St. Stephen's death led to the preaching to heathens, very possibly in anticipation of St. Peter's conversion of Cornelius. [See note in Bishop Ellicott's Commentary.]

1 Tim. iii. 16: "God was manifest." The Revised Version reads "He who was manifest," and the margin gives a third reading, "which was manifested." The variation will be understood if we give the Greek equivalent. ΟΣ stands for Theos, "God," "ΟΣ for hos, "He who," and "Ο for "which." For the first of these readings there is no manuscript authority older than the ninth century; and only one ancient version—namely, the Slavonic. Therefore the probability is against this reading. Between the other two there is great difficulty. The Latin version favours the neuter, the Gothic the masculine. The masculine is the more difficult, because there is no clearly expressed antecedent, and for that reason is to be preferred. Moreover, ΟΣ is more likely than Ο to be changed into ΟΣ. The Revisers, therefore, have adopted the most probable reading for their textual authority.

Vatican, Palace of the.—The residence of the Pope, called by this name, is the largest palace of modern Rome, and takes its name from the Vatican Hill upon which it stands. It is an irregular group of buildings, containing twenty-two courtyards and an immense number of rooms, estimated at from 4,500 to 16,000, and built at different periods. An Etruscan temple is said to have stood on the site, which gave rise to the name Vatican, from vates, "a prophet." The first palace of the Vatican is reported to have been built by Symmachus about the beginning of the sixth century, and to have been occupied by Charlemagne during his residence in Rome; it was rebuilt and enlarged in the twelfth century. It was first used as the papal residence after the healing of the great schism, as being convenient from its nearness to the castle of St. Angelo; the two buildings were connected by Pope John XXIII., and the palace was enlarged and beautified from time to time by his successors. Nicolas V. [1447-1455] began the "Tor di Borgia," which was completed by Alexander VI. [1492-1503]; the Sistine Chapel was built in 1475, and the Belvedere, formerly a garden-house, in 1490. The part now used as the Pope's residence was finished at the beginning of the seventeenth century. The Sistine Chapel is adorned on the walls and ceiling by the famous frescoes of Michael Angelo, and the stanzas and loggie are ornamented with paintings by Raphael. The Vatican contains other very famous paintings by Raphael, Titian, Domenichino, etc., but they are few in number. The Vatican Library is the finest in the world, containing nearly 25,000 MSS. and about 50,000 volumes. The most valuable of the MSS. is the Codex Vaticanus, which reaches back to the fourth century, and is a little older than the Codex Siniaticus. It contains the LXX. version of the Old Testament with very few omissions, and all the New Testament as far as Hebrews ix. 14.

Vatican Council.—The last General Council of the Roman Church. It was convened by Pope Pius IX. by an Encyclical Letter, June 26th, 1868, to discuss Papal Infallibility and to condemn Rationalism and Liberalism. The Council was opened Dec. 5th, 1869. There were 719 members present, the number afterwards rising to 764—the largest number that has been reached since the Second Lateran Council of 1119. "All bishops of the Churches of Oriental rite not in communion with the Apostolic See," and all "Protestants and Non-Catholics" were invited to attend, in order, as Cardinal Manning says, that they might be referred to “experienced men” and have their difficulties solved. The Council was prorogued on Oct. 20th, 1870, in consequence of the Franco-German War, and is not yet completed, as it may be reconvened at any time by the Pope.

The chief work which has been completed consists of two Constitutions. The first, De Fide Catholica; or, Decrees on the Dogmatic Constitution of the Catholic Faith, contains the primary truths of natural religion, on revelation, faith, and the relation between faith and reason, and is directed against modern pantheism, atheism, materialism, etc. The opening clauses hint that Protestantism is responsible for modern infidelity, which was strongly denied by Bishop Strossmayer from the Turkish frontier. But the Constitution was unanimously accepted by the 667 Fathers present, and confirmed by the Pope at the third public session on April 24th, 1870.

The second Constitution was far more important, being De Ecclesia Christi; or, Decrees on the Dogmatic Constitution of the Church of Christ, which discusses the absolutism and infallibility of the Roman See over all Christians. Nothing had been said openly of such a question before the Council began, but the subject was mentioned at the end of 1869. In 1870 the discussion was objected to by 135 Bishops, and Dr. Dollinger and others outside the Council who objected, formed themselves into a separate body of resistance, but were excommunicated. They assumed the name of Old Catholics [q.v.]. The Constitution was laid before the Council early in May, and was first voted upon in general congregation on July 13th, when 461 Fathers agreed, 92 were ready to accept it subject to alterations, 83 refused, and 70 did not vote at all. It was again read on July 18th, when several who disapproved absented themselves, and it passed with only two dissenting votes, and was confirmed by Papal authority. For the contents of this decree see INFALLIBILITY.

Vaudois, Church of. [Waldenses.]

Vauquay, Henry, was born at Newton St. Bridget in Wales in 1621, and died there in 1695. When nearly seventeen he entered Jesus College, Oxford, where he remained for two years. He wrote much poetry when at one of the Inns of Court in London, and after studying physic became a doctor of eminence in his native place. His life passed quietly and happily there, while so many of his friends were suffering, in those troubled times, much anxiety, if not real privations. In his Olor Isenius we find frequent invitations to his friends to partake of his rustic pleasures. His poetry deserves more praise than has fallen to its share, as it shows much originality, though there are places where he certainly imitates George Herbert.

Vauquay, Robert, D.D., a Congregational minister [b. in Wales, 1795; d. at Torquay, 1868], studied for the ministry at Bristol, devoting himself also especially to the study of history. In 1819 he became minister in the Congregational Church, and took charge of a church at Worcester, which he held for six years. He then became minister of an Independent Chapel at Kennington, and Professor of History at the London University, which had then been recently founded; and in 1843 he was chosen President of the Independent College of Lancaster. He there made himself exceedingly popular as a preacher, and still more so as lecturer in the college and a speaker at political meetings in Manchester, near which place the college is situated. In 1857 he resigned this post and took a small charge at Uxbridge, whence he removed to St. John Wood, and finally to Torquay as pastor of a newly-formed Independent congregation. In 1855 he went to America on a mission from the Congregational Union, of which he was President. His chief works are: The Life and Opinions of John de Wycliffe, D.D. [1825], Monograph; with some account of the Wycliff MSS. [1853]; A History of England under the House of Stuart; The Causes of the Corruptio of Christianity; Congregationalism, and other pamphlets.

Vedas. [Brahminism.]

Veil, Chalice.—The veil used to cover the chalice during the Communion Service in some Churches it is pure white, and is of various colours, according to the particular day or festival.

Veil, Taking the.—The ceremony by which a woman is received into a nunnery. When entering upon her year’s novitiate she takes the white veil, and if she is considered fit for the full profession she takes the black veil and makes her irrevocable vows of chastity and obedience. The veil is blessed by the bishop with prayers, and placed upon the woman’s head as a type of the holiness and humility with which she is henceforth to be clothed; for three days the veil is worn so as entirely to cover the face, and is lifted on the third day by the abess, from which time the nun is of the same rank as the others of the convent.

Venial Sin is defined in the Roman Church to be a disease of the soul, not of death. It does not annihilate the friendship of the soul with God, but there is grace left to repair the sin. Some sins, though mortal in their nature, are held to be venial if not done deliberately, and if the amount of harm done is small, e.g. in the case of small theft. On the other hand it is held that circumstances may make sins generally counted venial become mortal. There are two classes of venial sins, deliberate and indeliberate. But the Roman casuists speak with much caution on this subject, and declare that the distinguish between grave and light sins in many cases must rest solely on the judgment of God, and cannot be judged of by man. Mortal Sin.

Veni, Creator Spiritus.—An ancient hymn generally supposed to be the composition of St. Ambrose, but more probably by Tertullian Maurus, poet to Charlemagne, in use in the Church at Whitsuntide from early times. From the year 1100 it has formed a part of the service for the consecration of bishops, and some hundred years or so later was inserted in that for the ordination of priests. It was translated as it stands in our Prayer Book in King Edward VI.'s reign. The Lutheran Church has also adopted it very generally for services at certain stated times.

Venite, exultemus.—The heading of the 95th Psalm, which opens the second part of Morning Prayer—that of praise. It has also been called, from the spirit that runs all through it, the Invitatory Psalm. Its fitness or its position was recognised as early as the days of Chrysostom, for then, every day after penitent confession, the 95th Psalm was sung. In the English Church it is ordered by the rubric to be sung every day, except Easter Day and on the 19th day of the month, when it comes in the regular course of the Psalms.

Venn, Henry [6. at Barnes, Surrey, in 1724; d. 1797].—A leader in the Evangelical movement of the last century. He was educated at Cambridge. After his ordination he held several curacies, and was Vicar of Huddersfield, and afterwards of Yelling in Huntingdonshire, where he died. During the first years of his ministry he had a hard battle to fight against the indifference shown by all classes to religion; but he worked unceasingly, and afterwards, in conjunction with Whitfield, one of his nearest friends, was among the chief movers in the Evangelical revival. The improvement wrought by him, especially in the town of Huddersfield, was most striking. He wrote The Complete Duty of Man, to counteract the effect of the Whole Duty of Man, which he and Whitfield held to be too formal. His children's children bore an honoured name in the Church.

Verger.—Supposed to be derived from the Latin word virga, "a twig." The name is given to the officers of the cathedral who carry the mace, or virge, before the clerical dignitaries.

Veronica, St.—A legendary saint whose story was from very early times introduced into that of our Lord's Passion, but has been rejected since the eleventh century. It is said that, as our Saviour passed by on His way to Calvary, bearing the cross, a woman was moved with compassion, and stepped forward and wiped the blood and sweat from His face with her veil; after which, she discovered the impression of His face remaining upon the linen. The portrait was called vera icon, "the true image," and in course of time the name, altered to Veronics, was transferred to the woman herself. Stories were afterwards invented concerning her life: some said she was the daughter of King Herod, and was converted from the love of the world to the love of Christ by witnessing His sufferings; while others identify her with the woman who had been healed of an issue of blood. The cloth with the miraculous image is said to be preserved at St. Peter's at Rome, and is exhibited among its relics; but other images, each declared to be the vera icon, are exhibited at different places.

Verse.—A term applied in Church music to that part of an anthem, or hymn, which is sung as a solo, or by a part of the choir only; to distinguish it from those parts which are sung as a full chorus by the whole choir.

Versicles.—Short sentences occurring in various parts of the Prayer Book, appointed to be said by priest and people alternately; as, for example:

Min.: O Lord, show Thy mercy upon us. People: And grant us Thy salvation.

Very God of Very God.—The word "very" in theological language signifies "real," "true," "indisputable." Thus in the second Article Our Lord is called "The Very and Eternal God," and in the Athanasian Creed "Very God and Very Man." And Latimer says, "Believe steadfastly that He was a very natural man, sin only excepted." The doctrine expressed in the phrase of the Nicene Creed is that Our Lord is Himself perfect God, and is begotten of perfect God, the word "of" not expressing the possessive case nor a mere superlative like "heart of hearts," but signifying "out of" or "from."

Vesperale.—The book which contains the vespers services.

Vespers.—One of the Canonical Hours [v.].

Vestments.—There have been two theories as to the origin of Christian vestments: one is, that they are derived from those used by the Jewish priests; the other, that they have their origin in the ordinary dress worn in early Christian times. The first view is now seldom accepted. Some of the chief Jewish garments were not known in the Christian Church. Thus no distinctive head-dress was worn for the first thousand years, and the girdle was not known till the eighth century. On the other hand, the chasuble, the chief Christian vestment, was unknown among the Jews. Also their garments were of many different colours, while in the primitive Christian Church white only was worn. The second view seems much more tenable. The three vestments mentioned at the Fourth Council of Toledo [633] seem to have been the alb, planeta or pleanaia, and orarium or stole: the first of which is the tunic, the under-garment worn by the Romans; the second, toga or over-garment; and the orarium or stole was a garment worn by Roman matrons. From these garments the ecclesiastical vestments of the Eastern and Western Churches were developed. The chief vestments worn in the Greek Church are: the sticharion, so called from its black lines (stoechos), which answers to the Latin alb, and is always white; the phelonion, the chief garment of the priest, resembling a chasuble, which is of various colours; and the epigonation, a square pouch or satchel richly embroidered. The bishops instead of the phelonion wear the saccos, a garment with sleeves, resembling the dalmatic, and the omophorion or pallium, and over the saccos the mantia, a loose blue or black garment ornamented with stripes. They wear a mitre in the sanctuary, a panagia or pectoral cross, and carry the paterissa or pastoral staff, which is shorter and less ornamented than that of the Western Church.

The chief ornaments of the Roman Church are the alb, which is white, made of linen, held by the cingulum or belt, which was formerly a broad sash, but now is very narrow; the chasuble or casula, which formerly resembled the Roman toga. These are white for greater and red for lesser festivals, and black for Lent, etc. Also the manipleum, like the Greek orarium, and the biretta. The bishops wear the mitre, tiara, and pallium.

These garments are chiefly worn at the celebration of the Mass, so at the Reformation they were all discarded, and the plain black cassock adopted. For the use of vestments in the English Church see Ornamenta Rubrice; Ritualism.

Vestry.—In its first meaning the word "vestry" is applied to the room attached to the church in which the clergy robe, and where the various articles in use during the service are kept. In consequence of the meetings being generally held in this room it has also come to mean the assembling together of the ministers of the parish, the churchwardens, and the parishioners, for electing churchwardens and settling various other affairs. The minister, be he rector, vicar, or perpetual curate, has the right of presiding over these meetings. The general custom is for him to choose one churchwarden, and let the vestry choose the other; but in some parishes the vestry has the right of electing both. Every ratepayer in the parish is qualified to vote, residence not being necessary. The notices of the meetings are given by the churchwardens, and must by law be so given at least four days before that appointed for the meeting. The president is bound to consult the vestry before he makes any alteration in the structure of the building, and it has the power of making small bye-laws, and the regulation of order in the parish.

Veto Act.—Passed by the Gene Assembly of the Church of Scotland, M 31st, 1834; it enacted that no pastor should be intruded on a congregation against will of the people, and that if a minister appointed who was disapproved by the great number of the congregation, he should be rejected by the presbytery, provided it could be shown that the disapprobation was for legitimate reasons. This Act led to the rupture in 1843, and the foundation of Free Church of Scotland [q.v.].

Vianney, Jean Baptiste Marie, better known as the "Curé d'Arts" [b. 1786, d. 1818], was the son of a peasant of Dardilly, near Lyons. Displaying unmistakable signs of piety, he was taken by a neighbour, who was a curé to live at his presbytery, and trained for orders. But though extremly good, those who had opportunities of watching him judged him so "simple" that they doubted whether he could ever pass a needful examination. In 1809 he was set for a soldier by the Conscription, and but an illness might have perished in the Russia Campaign, as his brother did, who went in his substitute. After that he was admitted to orders, "more for his devotedness than capacity," and in February, 1818, was made a curé of Ars, and remained so for more than forty years, thereby converting an obscure village, remote from great towns, and almost devoid of roads, into one of the best known places in France.

Very early he obtained a great reputation for sanctity by the passion with which he devoted himself to his duties, and by his absence from all the social and political life of the age. One of the miracles attributed to him is the multiplication of corn in the granaries of the Sisters of Penance spread his fame still wider, and from 1834 onwards a regular line of eight or ten coaches a day ran from Lyons to Ars, distance of twenty miles, to convey pilgrims. The Government were compelled to put up the road into good order, and when railways were at length established special privileges were granted to the Ars pilgrims. For the benefit of these pilgrims he entered the confessional before daybreak, and did not leave it till midnight, except to say his daily prayers, give a short "instruction," and eat his simple meal. Crowds used to stay all night in the church in order to be heard at three or four o'clock in the morning. An eye-witness states that on his visit he found that the Curé retired to rest at eleven at night, and was in Confessional again at one in the morning. I saw the old man come from the Confessional in a battered soutane and cassock. His airness was excessive. If you face the shape of a heart, triangular from the seeks to the chin, with large eyes, and aadem of white hair. He tottered under the pressure of the crowd who came eagerly forward to touch him. I do not think I ever heard him pronounce the name of God without his voice being interrupted and broken by s tears." A movement almost immediately followed death to procure his canonisation, it being aserted that miracles were being wrought at s tomb. "Putting these aside," says a protestant writer, "there remains abundant atter, free from all doubt and cavil, to command our admiration, and almost awe, in ch an existence passed among ourselves in middle of the nineteenth century. Forty ears of such labours, devotion, privations, rent sanctity, and holiness of life passed determined and voluntary obscurity, and al forgetfulness of everything that is ordly, sensual, or selfish, is surely an ample well worth dwelling on and condering, were it only for its startling contrast ith everything around it. When considered apart from a system, and as an individual ct, it is certainly a bright example, worthy the deepest admiration and respect. It ay very possibly be mixed up with much might wish away from it; there may be me weak points visible in the confessor himself, and far more among those who often, may be conjectured, from vain, morbid, stless, or even merely inquisitive feelings, ecked to him. But the great fact of the ous, devoted, humble, and self-denying life nds out boldly far above all suspicions, rich in truth one is ashamed to dwell on in ch a case, and leaves the obscure Curé of s true saint of these latter days, in the st and highest significan of the term—a int of whom any Church may well be oud, and of the like of whom no true rch can pretend to be above desiring to the mother."

Vitiacum.—The provision made for a journey. The term was applied in the early arch to Baptism and the Holy Commonion, accoe," says Bingham, "they were equally eemed men's necessary provision and proper nour, both to sustain and conduct them rely on their way in their passage through s world to eternal life." The term was ersways confined to the Eucharist given to person in immediate danger of death, and that sense it is used several times in the ons of the Nicene Council.

Vicar, derived from vicarius, meaning representative or viceregent. In England e name is applied to the parish priest of particular standing; he is called the rector he owns all the tithes of the parish; if receives a part only, he is then called the .er. The origin of vicars can be traced as back as the reign of Henry IV., when a v was passed providing that they should be sufficiently endowed to perform Divine Service, inform the people, and keep hospitality. The incomes were for the most part derived from glebe land belonging to the parsonage—that which was most fruitful being, as a rule, kept as rectorial tithe, and the rest being handed over to vicarial. The system was by no means equally carried out, and that is the reason that the incomes in different places vary so much in value.

Vicar-Apostolical.—A name formerly given to a bishop or archbishop to whom the Pope gave authority to act upon his own responsibility, or to any ecclesiastic invested with power to exercise jurisdiction in some place where the resident priest was for some reason incapable of discharging his duties efficiently. In modern times vicars-apostolic are appointed to supply the place of bishops where no episcopate has been established or where the succession has been interrupted. There are at present over a hundred of such vicariates in existence.

Vicar-General.—An officer employed by the Archbishop of Canterbury and some other bishops to assist in such matters as ecclesiastical causes and visitations. His duties are much the same as those of the chancellor of a diocese.

Vicar of Christ.—A title now appropriated only by the Pope, but belonging in the days of the early Christian Church to bishops all over the world.

Vicarage.—The term was originally applied to the church and land, in fact, everything under the charge of the vicar of the parish; but latterly it has been confined to the house belonging to the living. In former times the vicarage was always under the patronage of the rector, but in James I.'s reign it was decided that under certain circumstances the patronage was in the hands of the manor, and sometimes in that of the bishop of the diocese.

Vicars-Choral.—In some cathedral foundations, the assistants of the dean and chapter, for the most part, though not always, in charge of the choir and the chancel. They have to provide for a sufficient number of choirmen, etc., being in their place for the proper performance of the daily services. In some of the old foundations they were practically synonymous with the minor canons. Lay members of the choir of mature age were sometimes called lay-vicars.

Victor, Sr., an African bishop, was raised to the See of Vita in the reign of Genseric, about 477. In 484 he was banished by the Emperor Huneric, son of Genseric, on account of a book he had written against the Arian heresy then prevailing. It is uncertain where he went—some say to Constantinople, but it is highly probable that he remained in Africa, from the exact account that he gives of the African martyrs in the fifth century under the Arian kings. This work was divided into five books. Hunerick died about 490, and his nephew Gondebaud allowed the bishops to return to their sees; but they were all banished again at his death in 496 by his successor Thrasamond, who in 504 published an edict at the instigation of the Arian bishops, which forbade the consecration of any Catholic bishops in the room of those who might die. As many of them disobeyed this edict, 200 were banished to Sardinia.

St. Victor, however, continued to consecrate Catholic pastors, and in 506 was sentenced to imprisonment for life at Carthage. On his journey thither the inhabitants of Raspa asked him to consecrate Fulgentius to that see, which he did in spite of the anger and threats of those in charge of him. After spending a year in confinement at Carthage he was sent to Sardinia, and died there in 512. The exact day of his death is not known, but August 23rd is the day kept in memory of him. His history of the persecution was edited by Ruimart in 1694, and has been re-published in Vienna in 1881.

Victricius, St., Bishop of Rouen, born at Vienne, Council of.—There were meritorious councils held at this ancient French city, but most of them were of little importance. The most celebrated were that held 1112, presided over by Archbishop Guibert afterwards Pope Calixtus II., at which Emperor Henry V. was excommunicated, investiture by lay hands was declared to be heresy; and that in 1311, convened at Montpellier, at which the Order of the Templars was suppressed. Various different statements are given as to the number of prelates present at this Council; some 300, others 140. It was decreed that the Templars should be secure in no part of Christendom. Instructions were sent to Spa Constantine, and elsewhere, to forbid them to any extent; but suddenly the Templars who had been in hiding appeared and demanded to be heard in defence of their Order. The Pope ordered them to be heard and imprisonment. The Archbishops of Rheims and Rouen, who had both been persecutors of the Templars, insisted that in common justice the defence of the Order ought to be heard by the Council, and so for a time Pope prorogued the meeting. On April 13, 1312, the Council again met, and the Order was declared to be extinct, the Pope reserving to himself and the Church the disposal of their persons and property. The Council also proposed the recovery of the Holy Land.
at the crusading fire had now burnt out, and nothing was done. The third object proposed was the reformation of manners and of ecclesiastical discipline, and a number of decrees regulating these were passed; so sentences of condemnation against the Behards and Fraticelli [q.v.].

Vigil.—A word derived from the Latin quille, watches kept by the Roman soldiers during the night; hence, originally, watches kept in the Church by the early Christians during the night preceding a great festival. Vigils were kept at least till midnight before the feasts of martyrs, and those of Easter Eve and Christmas Eve were prolonged till cockcrow. At first the night was spent in prayer and hymns, but in course of time the keeping of vigils gave rise to scandals, and about the thirteenth century the practice was forbidden, or limited only to the midnight Mass before Christmas. The vigils of the greater saints were always observed by fasting, and in the Middle Ages this was extended to the days before all holy days—a rule which has prevailed among Roman Catholics, with few exceptions, till the present day. In England Roman Catholics are exempted from fasting on all vigils except those of the Assumption, St. Peter and St. Paul, and All Saints' Day, Pentecost, the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, St. Lawrence, and Christmas Day.

Vigilantius.—A priest of Gaul, living at the end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth century; b. at Calagurris, a village in Comminges, in the south of Gaul. He was ordained at Barcelona in 395, and was sent by Paulinus of Nola with letters of recommendation to St. Jerome at Jerusalem, which resulted in a quarrel between himself and St. Jerome, and the departure of Vigilantius for Alexandria. Vigilantius condemned the worship of saints and relics as a revival of paganism; he objected to monasticism, and denied that the state of celibacy is more acceptable to God than that of marriage; and he said that the use of candles in churches in the daytime is useless and indefensible. St. Jerome attacked these opinions in one of his letters and in an essay, Contra Vigilantium, written when the latter had returned to Gaul.

Vigilius.—Bishop of Tarsus, in Byzacene, of whose life nothing is known except that he was present at a Synod held at Carthage in 84, convened by Huneric, King of the Vandals. Vigilius was the author of five books against Utyches, formerly wrongly ascribed to Vigilus, Bishop of Trent. They are valuable as polemical works, but not of much account for historical purposes.

Vincent, Sr., a native of Saragossa, suffered martyrdom during the Diocletian persecution, Jan. 22nd, 304. He was educated by Valerius, Bishop of Saragossa, and by him ordained deacon. He was brought before Dacian, the Roman Governor of Tarragona, and sentenced to the most horrible tortures. Legend says that no cruelty practised on him by his tormentors could in the least shake his faith, or even abate his courage and calmness; that Dacian, enraged at his inability to vindicate the honour of his own gods, threw Vincent into a dungeon where no light could enter, and left him there to starve; but here, too, he was disappointed, for the first news he had from the dungeon was that it was filled with heavenly light, the saint's wounds all healed, and he walking about singing praises to his deliverer. Dacian directed that Vincent should be laid on a soft bed that he might gain strength to bear new torments; but the martyr's sufferings were now at an end, for the moment he was laid on the couch he expired with a calmness more like sleep than death. A church was built in his honour at Valencia, and St. Augustine says that in his days the feast of St. Vincent was celebrated wherever Christianity was planted.

Vincent de Paul, Sr. was born at Pouy, in Gascony, on April 24th, 1576. He was educated by the Franciscans at Toulouse, and ordained priest in 1600. On a voyage which he made from Marseilles to Narbonne he was captured by corsairs and sold at Tunis. He belonged successively to three masters, the last of whom, a Savoyard renegade, he converted, and the master and servant escaped together and landed in France in 1607. He went for a short time to Rome, and was sent thence on a mission to the French Court, where he became almoner to Queen Marguerite de Valois. He did not remain at Court long, but became tutor in the family of Count Gondy. He at this time began to form the Confrérie de Charité, an association of women who nursed the sick and visited the poor. In 1619 he became, through Count Gondy, almoner-general of the galleys, and he seems to have had wonderful success in softening the stony hearts of the reprobates with whom he was brought into contact. It is said that once he offered himself, and was accepted, in place of one of the convicts who would have left his family in the utmost poverty. He founded other societies, as the Society of St. Borromeo, against begging in Burgundy [1623]; and a congregation called Priests of the Mission, which was confirmed by Pope Urban VIII. in 1632 under the name of Lazarists [q.v.]. The members of the Confrérie de Charité were mostly married, so he instituted the Order of Filles de Charité, the members of which were not nuns, but after their novitiate they took vows for one year. This congregation soon spread all over Europe. St. Vincent died at St. Lazare, September 27th, 1660, was beatified in 1727, and canonised by Clement XII. on July 19th, 1737, on which day he is commemorated. He was not learned, but his sermons, though very simple, were affecting and impressive, and he is considered one of the most eminent saints of the modern Roman Catholic Church.

Vincent of Lérins, Sr.—A native of Gaul, and of noble extraction [b. at the latter end of the fourth century, d. in 450]. He spent some years in the army, but desiring to avoid the temptations of the world, he retired to the Monastery of Lérins, situated on an island not far from the coast of Lower Provence, where he spent the remainder of his life. After a course of monastic discipline he was admitted to the priesthood. In 434 he wrote a Commonitory against Heretics, in which he attacks principally the Nestorians, who had been condemned by the Council of Ephesus three years before. It was divided into two parts, the first of which remains entire; the second was lost during St. Vincent’s lifetime, and he has left an abridgment of it. He signed himself “Peregrinus,” and was at first accused of Semi-Pelagianism, for which accusation, however, there is no ground in his writings.

Vinet, Alexandre Rodolphe [b. 1797, d. 1847], was born and educated at Lausanne. He was ordained a minister of the Swiss Protestant Church in 1819, holding besides his cure the Chair of Professor of Theology at the University of Basle. He was obliged to resign both in 1840 on account of being unable to agree with the union which existed between the Church and the State, the Church being, as he considered, completely subservient to the State. At the same time he explained most fully to his friends and parishioners that by this act he did not consider himself in any way severed from his National Church, which he held to be perfectly sound in doctrine, and to which he was firmly attached. All this time he seems to have been privately engaged by the University to give lessons in French literature, of which he was particularly fond, and which he had studied carefully for years. In 1845 he formed an assembly of all those who, like himself, had seceded from the National Church, under the name of the Constitution of the Free Church of Vaude. His works are partly theological, partly historical—the latter being mostly on the history of French language and literature. A great many of them have been translated into English. His theology is entirely such as is known by the word “Evangelical,” insisting strongly on the necessity of repentance and salvation by faith. His basis of belief is the subjective, that the Divine origin of Christianity is proved by its fitness to meet the deepest needs of the human heart. He denies the need of any priestly character in the minister, who is simply a Christian commissioned by his brother Christians to carry out their views, but possessing only such authority as his study and practice give him.

Virgilius, Sr., Bishop of Salzburg, was born of noble parents in Ireland, went to France, and became a great favourite with Pepin’s Court. He went thence to Bavaria, and was, either in 744 or 745, made Bishop of Salzburg. He was strongly opposed to St. Boniface, who twice explained the Bishop to Pope Zacharias for his heresies. The Pope, however, decided in favour of Virgilius. He built a church, which he dedicated to St. Rupert, his predecessor, converted the Carinthians, and died at Salzburg in 784. He was canonized by Gregory IX. in 1233, and is commemorated on November 27th.

Virgilius, Sr., Bishop of Arles, was born in Aquitaine about the middle of the 6th century. His parents were most anxious that he should receive a sound Christian education and sent him to the Monastery of Lérins, one of the most famous in France at that time. He was there for some years, and then set about to superintend the Monastery of Avenburgundy. He there gained such a great name, both for his learning and piety, that the death of Licerius, Bishop of Arles, in 580, he was appointed to succeed him. In 647 Gregory the Great became Pope. He appears to have held Virgilius in great esteem, and in 595 sent him the pallium, a great mark of distinction, and also appoints him Vicar in the Gallican Church—who was the Church in the kingdoms of Burgundy and Austrasia. Virgilius died in 670 and was buried in his cathedral at Arles.

Vision.—By this word we understand a supernatural representation of an object to man when waking. Thus Isaiah was witnessed in the temple when he saw a vision of the Lord seated upon His throne [Isai. vi. 1]. And Cornelius was praying in his house in open day when he saw the vision of the angel. The frequent mentions of visions in Holy Scripture, as also the prophecy that they should be made means of God’s revelation of His will to men under the Christi dispensation, prepares us for the fact that many visions are recorded in ecclesiastical histion which, however we may choose to account for them, whether by supernatural revelation by the strength of fancy, have, in some case had a very marked and unmistakable effect. Thus the beautiful story of Cædmon tells how this first of English poets was a servant of the monastery of Whitby, knowing nothing of literature or song; that he retired from the table when the harp came round to his turn because he had no skill with it; that the vision of an angel appeared to him and bade him sing the beginning of created things, when upon he burst out into his song of the Creation, which is one of the noblest pieces of ancient literature.

The vision of St. Boniface is another very charming story. Dissatisfied with the pursuits of his companions, he used to wander sale an evening among the lime-trees or to prorate himself before the crucifix in his cell,
then he frequently heard a voice which folwed him about and bade him go to preach at Gospel. One day whilst listening to this nice, and wondering how he should obey it,
he saw stretching out before him the German from which his race had come, and so long was the vision upon him that he pas-sonately sought means to visit it and fulfill his mission, and so went forth in 116 to labour and martyrdom.

The alleged visions of St. Catharine of Jerusalem were manifold. At the early age of seven years she had a vision as of the open caverns, with Christ seated on a throne with St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. John the Evangelast standing beside Him, and it is said that he determined her to lead a monastic life,
by being beset by terrible temptations and foul images which she tried in vain to rid herself of; she went at midnight to the church and spent much time in prayer and fasting and vouring of herself, and at length she was comforted by the visible presence of Christ, who came and talked with her and calmed by His conversation. At Pisa, when restraining herself before an ancient crucifix,
she is said to have received the Stigmata [q.v].

Three alleged appearances of St. Michael in visions at different times have had great influence; in the fifth century he is said to have appeared to a Bishop in a cave at Monte Alegno, and to have directed that a church should be built there in his honour; this was one, and it became the object of pilgrimages on all parts of Europe. The second was in the sixth century, when Rome was almost depopulated by the plague. St. Gregory was leading a procession through the streets zaging litanies on the third day St. Michael appeared to him at the top of Hadrian's Mount, sheathing his bloody sword as a sign at the pestilence was at an end; a church was built there in his honour, and the hill was borne the name of St. Angelo ever since.
The third was to Aubert, Bishop of Avranches, commanding him to repair to Mont Saint-Michel and build a church there.

St. Francis of Assisi is said to have found true vocation by means of a vision of a splendid room filled with jewels and arms all armed with a cross, and in the midst the giare of Christ, who said to him, “These are the riches reserved for My servants, and the eupons wherewith I arm those who fight in my cause.” His most extraordinary vision as in the cave of Monte Alverna; he had spent forty days in his solitary cell, passing at time in prayer and contemplation, when he beheld a seraph descending from above, arying between his six shining wings the arm of a man crucified. When the vision fit him his hands, feet, and side bore the apress of the Saviour's wounds. This story frequently the subject of art.

St. Ignatius Loyola on his way to Rome turned aside from his companions to pray in a small chapel, and it is said that whilst he was thus engaged the Saviour appeared to him, bearing His Cross and strengthening His sant with encouraging words: Ego vobis
Rome propitious ero.

To his friend and disciple, Francis Xavier,
frequent visions came in slumber of the trials
he was to encounter in his missionary labours, and made him yearn to make great sacrifices for the conversion of mankind, so that when the call to go and evangelise India and Japan came, it found him ready and anxious for the service.

The visions of Edward the Confessor are interesting as being portrayed in bas-reliefs in his chapel in Westminster Abbey. One is that of a demon dancing on the Danegelt which had been collected, on whose appearance the King restored the money to his subjects and abolished the tax. Another is the appearance of our Saviour at the altar in Westminster when Edward was partaking of the Eucharist. Others represent the Danish king drowned as he was about to make war on England, a fact which was revealed in a dream to Edward; and the vision of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, which was taken to predict the Norman invasion.

To St. Gregory the Great several visions of our Saviour are reported; one, when Gregory was celebrating Mass, Christ de-sending on the altar with the instruments of His passion; and another when Christ came in bodily presence to the upper-table of Gregory and revealed Himself, afterwards saying that He was the beggar on whom Gregory had had unwavering compassion
before he became Pope.

In the foregoing instances we have referred to records which are enshrined in the Hagi-ology of the Roman Church, are read in her legends, and commemorated on painted windows, especially on the Continent. Similar stories, however, are not wanting outside that Church. The appearances of the devil, for example, to Luther and Bunyan, were to their imagination so real that we might well class them under the head of visions; and the story of the conversion of Colonel Gardiner may claim a like place. He had been a thorough reproube, and was still living the life of one, when sitting alone one evening he suddenly saw an appearance of the Saviour dying on the Cross, who spoke to him and said, “I bore all this for thee, then how canst thou treat me so?” We may form our own ideas as to the explanation of the phenomenon, but there is no question as to the consequence. He flung himself upon his knees in an agony of penitence, and from that hour led a most strict and religious life. While some such stories may be regarded as apocryphal, others, well authenticated, remain wonderful and unexplained.
Visitation. — There are two distinct visitations in the Church of England—that held by the bishop of the diocese, which now takes place once in every three years, and that by the archdeacon of the district, which is held annually. In each case the clergy are expected to attend if possible, so that the bishop or the archdeacon may personally become acquainted with the clergy, and be able to judge of their efficiency. Formerly the bishop was bound to visit the parishes of his diocese, to inquire into the state of the Church, the condition of the schools, and general well-being of the parish, but of late years this duty has devolved entirely on the archdeacon.

Visitation of the Sick. — This is made by our Lord one of the tests of discipleship, and has been practised in the Church ever since earliest times in compliance with St. James’s injunction: “Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the Church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins they shall be forgiven him” [James v. 14, 15]. In the Greek Church the priest still anoints the sick person with oil, but in the Roman it is only done when he is on the point of death. [Extreme Unction.] The form for anointing was inserted in the Prayer Book of 1549, but was omitted in that of 1552. The service for the Visitation of the Sick is founded on those in ancient liturgies, omitting the formal procession of the priest and his clerks to the house of the sick, the saying of the Penitential Psalms, and the using of oil. The four last prayers—for a sick child, for a sick person when there appeareth small hope of recovery, a commendatory prayer for a sick person at the point of departure, and a prayer for persons troubled in mind or in conscience —were added in 1662.

Visitation of the Virgin Mary. — A festival instituted in the middle of the fourteenth century by Pope Urban to commemorate the Virgin’s visit to Elizabeth, the mother of John the Baptist.

Visitation, Order of. — An Order of nuns founded at Annecy under the guidance of Francis de Sales by Mme. de Chantal in 1610. No distinctive dress was insisted on, and as the object of the foundress was to make it possible for invalid ladies to join, the rules of living were not very severe. The work of the members is the visitation of the poor by those strong enough to undertake it. The Order has flourished in France ever since, and there are two houses belonging to it in England, at Walmer and Westbury-on-Trym.

Vitalis, Ordinicus, Church historian [b. at Attengesham, near Shrewsbury, 1675; d. about 1143], was of French extraction, and educated at St. Evroul, Normandy, where he became a monk under the name of Vitalis, was made priest in 1107. He wrote Histo Ecclesiastica, a history from the creation 1142, part of which concerns the relation existing between England and Normandy.

Vitringa, Campegius, a Dutch divine commentator [b. at Leeuwarden in Friesia 1659; d. at Franeker, 1722], studied Franeker and Leyden, where he took D.D. degree in 1679. He was made Prof. of Oriental Languages in 1681, and in 1701 obtained the post of Professor of Theology Franeker, which he held till his death. Vitringa was famed for his learning and dexterity, and has left many valuable works, most of which are Latin commentaries on Scriptures, chiefly on the Prophets.

Vitus, St., was born in Sicily of heathen parents. He was given into the charge of a Christian nurse named Crescentia, who, when her husband Modestus, took great care of him in their religion. His fat Hylas, after repeated attempts to make him abjure his faith, informed against him, and the early age of twelve years he was brought before Valerian, the Governor of Sicily, on his refusal to give up his belief in Christ was ordered to be whipped and sent back to his father. His parents thought their faith disgraced by one of its members being Christian, and determined to give up his son to the authorities. But Vitus heard their design, and escaped with his nurse to the ancient city of the Lucania, near Naples, where he was all martyred either there or in Rome. It is uncertain which, on June 15th, being the Dicilian persecution.

Vladimir, St., a Russian prince of Kiev, grandson to the Princess Olga, who embraced Christianity in 955, and was canonised. He then sent messengers to visit the various churches, and of all they gave unfavourable reports till they reached Constantinople, which they were so impressed with the magnificence and earnestness of the worship in the great church of St. Sophia, that they could hardly find words to express their admiration. Their return they pressed on Vladimir that his grandmother Olga had embraced the Gospel of the Church, and he determined that his success in laying siege to Cherson should decide for him; after he had conquered the city, he and many of the church were baptised by the Bishop of Cherson 988. He married Anne, sister of the Emperor Basil. On his return to Kiev, Vladimir destroy the huge idol Peroun, which he had hitherto worshipped, and ordered the immediate banning of all his subjects in the river Dniep. Many churches were built in his realm, and the people instructed in the Slavonic Scriptures and Liturgy which had been compiled Methodius.
Void.—A parish is said to be void when it is destitute of a pastor or incumbent. When the incumbent holds several benefices which are incompatible, the voidance is de jure; if he dies or is deprived, it is de facto.

Vocation.—The Greek word so translated in Eph. iv. 1, but generally in the Authorised Version rendered "calling," is applied to the position of all Christian men. In the same sense it is used in the second Collect for Good Friday: "Receive our supplications and prayers, which we offer before Thee for all estates of men in Thy Holy Church, that every member of the same, in his vocation and ministry, may truly and godly serve Thee." In a more restricted sense the word is applied to the calling by Providence to special work in the Church—e.g. to the ministry of souls. Such calling, it is evident, must first of all be inward, springing from the love of Christ, the zeal after holiness, the promotion of God's glory, and the salvation of souls.

Volney, Constantin François Chassebief, Comte de, author of several anti-Christian works [b. at Craon in Anjou, 1757; d. 1820].—He was educated at Angers and Paris, and studied at first for the law and afterwards for medicine; but he gave up both professions, and, in 1783, started on a four years' expedition to Egypt and Syria. On his return to France he published his Travels in Egypt and Syria, a trustworthy and accurate book, written in a lively and interesting style, which at once procured him a great reputation. In 1790 he was elected by his native district Deputy of the National Assembly, and took a prominent part in the politics of the next few years. He wrote, in 1791, Ruins or Meditations on the Revolutions of Empires; and in 1793, Natural Law, or Catechism of the French Citizen, otherwise called Physical Principles of Morality. This was thoroughly anti-Christian, and an exposition of such a system of ethics as can be based on the theory of Materialism. In 1793 Volney was imprisoned as a Royalist by Robespierre, and not liberated till the following year, when he was made Professor of History in the École Normale at Paris. In 1796 that school was suppressed, and he then went to the United States; but returned to France in 1798. He was soon after made a member of the Academy. Bonaparte wished him to be one of his colleagues in the Consulate, but he would only accept a seat in the Senate and the title of Count, together with the command of the Legion of Honour. But he made no secret of his dislike of Bonaparte's tyranny and want of principle, and the latter sneeringly called him an "ideologue." On the fall of Napoleon, Louis XVIII. made him a peer. In 1819 he published his latest work, The History of Samuel, the Inventor of the Sacredness of Kings, in which he treats the character of Samuel and the Hebrew Scriptures with equal freedom. Volney was a fast friend of the public liberties, and a fearless opponent of popular excesses. But he remained to the end of his life an enemy to all systems of religion.

Voltaire, François Marie Arouet de, the most celebrated of infidel writers, was born at Chatenay, near Sceaux, in 1694. His father, François Arouet, was a notary of good repute; his mother belonged to a noble Poitevin family, and is said to have been of brilliant ability. She died, however, when her son was seven years old. The child was so feeble in constitution that, as in the case of Fontenelle, whose hundred years surpassed even Voltaire's long span, his life was long despaired of. He was educated by the Jesuits at the Collège Louis-le-Grand, and it is said that one of his tutors there, Father le Jay, predicted that he would be the Corypheus of Deism in France. Between the stated temperament of his father, proper to a notary with many responsibilities, and the bold vivacious son, there was little sympathy, and before many years had passed the two were at open variance. His godfather, the Abbé Châteauneuf, introduced the young man into the gay and corrupt world of the Regency, where his sprightliness and skill in literary trifling made him a favourite. The celebrated Ninon de l'Enclos, now eighty years old, who had been a friend of his mother, and still preserved her wit and power of epigram, took him up, and on her death left him a legacy to buy books. His father, unhappy at the sight of the frivolity of the Court, and also at the reaction against it into sourness and Jansenist narrowness, persuaded Châteauneuf, who was now ambassador to Holland, to take his son with him, and accordingly, in 1713, the young man went to the Hague. Here he fell in love with a young countrywoman; the course did not run smooth, and the ambassador sent his godson back to Paris in displeasure. In 1715 Louis XIV. died, and next year the young Arouet was thrown into the Bastille on the charge of having written a pungent satire on the Regent d'Orléans, though he had nothing to do with it. Here he lay for nearly a year, and amused himself by sketching his epic poem the Henriade, and by writing the first of his dramas. The Regent, convinced of his innocence, at length released him, and he spent the next six years in Parisian society industriously engaged with his pen. In 1722 his father died, and he dropped the name of Arouet for that of Voltaire, which was an anagram from Arouet [e]jene]. An incident at the house of the Duke of Sully led to a great change in his life. A noble at one of the gatherings there spoke to him contemptuously, and received back a sharp answer, which turned the laugh against him, whereupon the mean-spirited aristocrat caused Voltaire to be caned by his footmen. Voltaire practised with his rapier, and challenged him to fight, and for this was thrown a second time into the Bastille. After six months he was released, but ordered to leave Paris, and he came to London. It was a prevailing fashion of Frenchmen at that time to do so—Buffon, Brissot, Lafayett, Mirabeau, the Rolands, Rousseau did the like. Voltaire came with a hatred of feudalism in his heart, and at once found himself entranced with the freedom of thought prevailing in England, especially as exhibited in the power of Deism, of which England was the original parent, and which was now in its full swing. He eagerly read Woolstoum, Tindal, and Collins, but was also deeply moved by the discoveries of Newton and the philosophy of Locke, both of which had given England an unprecedented position in the philosophical thought of Europe.

It was altogether new to the young Frenchman to see the social and political consequence of the men of letters, and the recognition given to the power of the pen. He saw Newton's funeral, in 1727, conducted with a pomp and circumstance which could not have been surpassed had he been a king. He saw in England a country in which personal liberty was secure, and in which the priesthood had lost the power of persecution. And connecting the two things together, he formed his notion of liberty, which was that of writing against priests and religion. After residing three years in England, during which his poetical pen was busy, he returned to Paris, and for some time lived a quiet life, dividing his time between literature and commercial speculations, in which he proved very successful. His Philosophical Letters, published in 1733, raised a storm, and he judged it wise to retire from Paris with the Marquise du Châtelet, a clever woman and an ardent student of Newton, with whom he formed a connection. They took up their residence at Cirey, on the borders of Champagne and Lorraine, and here he finished his disgraceful Pucelle, a savage and indecent libel upon the character of Joan of Arc. In 1749 the tragical death of the Marquise left him free in his movements. He had from time to time visited Paris, and received overtures from Madame de Pompadour, the King's favourite mistress at that time, and she had with much difficulty procured his election to the Academy [1746], but not until he had written a letter to Father Latour, head of his former school, protesting his affection for religion and his admiration of the Jesuits. But he felt that his position in France was precarious, and he accepted an invitation from Frederick the Great, then at the height of his influence in Europe. He arrived at Potsdam in July, 1750, at the time when Diderot was busy with the first volume of the Encyclopædia. For three years Voltaire resided at the Prussian Court, and neither he nor the King reapplied any good from the mutual intercourse. Berlin was a great barrack, the King a martinet. There was no intellectual vigour as in England. Frederick simply imbibed Voltaire-doctrines; he had none of his own to instil back. At length they quarrelled—the miserable story is fully told in the graphic pages Carlyle—and Voltaire left Berlin. He did not return to Paris, but took up his residence at Geneva, then and until 1798 an independent municipality. In 1758 he bought the estate of Ferney, by the Lake of Geneva, and here the rest of his life was spent. Here it was that he set himself in a earnest to the endeavour to destroy Christianity from off the earth. His enmity contained two elements. The one was his belief in the miraculous and in the inspiration of the Old Testament; the other was his hatred of the Roman priesthood as he saw it in France, the intolerance, the opposition to knowledge, the interminable struggles Jesuits and Jansenists, the cruelty of persecution. Probably the second of these two feelings was prior in order of time, and cause of the former, but as time moved on was not more fierce than the other. Voltaire so entirely identified the priests with religion which they professed, that the Scriptures and the theology which they taught were hated with a fierceness which a fanatic ever surpassed. His admiring biographer, Mr. John Morley, makes this a mission about his principles:—"It is necessary to admit, from the view of impartial criticism, that Voltaire had one defect character, of extreme importance in a lead of this memorable and direct attack. With his enthusiasm for things noble and lofty generous and compassionate, he missed that peculiar emotion of holiness, the soul at life alike of the words of Christ and St. Paul." The beauty of real religion has never been brought before him: he was critic, a destroyer, in no sense a builder. Hence his days at Ferney become to us strange record of inconsistencies. His passion for the stage was unabated; he built a theatre, and procured the first actors of the day to come time to time to serve it, occasionally acting himself. He was a benefactor to the poets around him, and even rebuilt the church on his own expense. But having ordered the demolition of a large wooden crucifix, a complaint was made to the Bishop of the diocese and Voltaire, in order to quiet matters, received the Communion—an act of undoubted hypocrisy. Next year the Bishop forbade his clergy to confess or communicate him. Thereupon Voltaire pretended mortal sickness, and persuaded a Capuchin friar to administer the Communion to him, and all others which a Catholic could claim. And at the while he was writing his fiercest diatribe and making sport out of his religion.
conformity. In 1779 he applied to the Pope for the post of temporal father of the Order of Capuchins for the district of Gex, and through the influence of the Duchess of Choiseul received it. It was partly his love of farce and mischief which moved him to this miserable act, partly a desire to worry his foe Bishop, to whom he wrote letters signed 'Voltaire, Capucin indigne,' partly also a dread of personal harm. He had no desire, he said, to be burnt alive, and so conformed.

There are other features of his history at this time which are pleasanter to think of. He generously exerted himself in favour of the Calas family, a case in which an unfortunate old man, Jean Calas, a Calvinist, was accused of murdering his son to prevent him becoming a Roman Catholic, and entirely against evidence was convicted and broken on the wheel. Voltaire received his family into protection, and never ceased to agitate until he had procured a reversal of the condemnation, and restored the children to their rights. His endeavours for justice on behalf of Sirven, of Lally, and of the English Admiral Byng, were in unison with that for the Calas household.

In 1778, when he was eighty-four years of age, he once more visited Paris, and was received with the wildest enthusiasm. But his excitement was more than he could bear. A fit of illness came on, and he asked for a reconciliation with the Church on the ground that he did not wish to be deprived of Christian burial. The Abbé Gauthier obtained from him a declaration that he would be in the Roman Catholic faith, and that he asked pardon of God and the Church for his sins. But he recovered, and transferred his thoughts from the Church to the stage, attending successive representations of his plays. A relapse came on, and he lay down on his bed to die. The accounts of his death are contradictory. The Abbé Gauthier signed a paper stating that he was sent for at Voltaire's request, but found him too far gone to be confessed. He died May 30th, 1778. An order from the Bishop forbidding his Christian burial came too late, or on the strength of Gauthier's certificate the rites had been performed.

The works of Voltaire were published by Saudouin [1824-34] in ninety-seven volumes. The brilliancy and vivacity of his style will cause him to be read probably for ages to come, but he can only be regarded as a destroyer in the world of theology, though outlandish even destructive has at times their egress and their use. He had no deep convictions, had little simplicity or sincerity of character, and none of his friendships seem to have been strong. The deep earnestness of Bossuet and Pascal and Massillon, their resolute grappling with the awful problems of life and death, of God and His relations to the universe, of suffering and temptation, of guilt and remorse, of pain and bereavement—all these things were strange to him, and his influence as a philosopher is now gone.

Voluntary.—The name given to the music played at the beginning or end of Divine Service and occasionally in other parts of the service; so called because this music formerly was mostly extemporaneous or voluntary.

Voluntary Controversy.—The name given to a controversy which arose in Scotland in 1829, and which began with a sermon preached by a minister named Marshall, a member of the United Secession Church in Kirkintilloch. He endeavoured to prove the unscriptural and unjust nature of the maintenance of Church establishments, the principle of which he declared to be the exertion of the civil authority to compel payment of the endowments of the clergy. He said that civil establishments of religion are condemned in the New Testament, and opposed in every way to the dictates of conscience and common sense. He and his followers took the name of the Voluntary Church Association, and started a periodical called The Voluntary Church Magazine. They were opposed first of all in the Edinburgh Christian Instructor; but as the matter went deeper, a rival association was formed, calling itself the Association for Promoting the Interests of the Church of Scotland, by which the Church of Scotland Magazine was started. Great interest was felt in the matter, and various able men took part in the controversy on both sides.

Vorstius, Conrad.—An Arminian divine [b. at Cologne, in 1569; d. at Tönningen, in Schleswig, in 1622]. He studied at Düsseldorf, Cologne, and Heidelberg, and left the Roman Church to become a Protestant. At Heidelberg he was made a Doctor of Divinity, and lectured on theology at Basle, Geneva, and Steinfurt; and in 1610 he was called to succeed Arminius as Professor of Theology at Leyden. He soon became involved in theological controversy, and was accused at one time of Socinianism, while the Gomarists accused him of publishing heterodox doctrines in his Tractatus Theologicus de Deo, which appeared in 1610. Vorstius was attacked as being the supposed author of a work called De Officio Christiani Hominis, which he disclaimed; but the suspicion with which he was regarded became so strong that he was condemned as a heretic by the Synod of Dort, and banished, first from Leyden, and finally from Holland. He returned secretly after some time, and remained concealed until his death.

Vossius or Voss, Gerard Johannes [b. near Heidelberg, 1577; d. at Amsterdam, 1649], studied at Dordrecht and Leyden, where he devoted himself chiefly to the study of theology, Hebrew, and ecclesiastical Vow

(1092)

Vow — A vow is a special promise made to God, binding the maker to do or forego something for the promotion of God's glory. Vows took a prominent part in Judaism, as they have also done in the religious observances of all races. Vows are common in the Roman Catholic Church, which holds that to be valid they must be of free and deliberate choice, and therefore must be made by persons capable by age of contracting the obligation. As they are always made to God, and are acts of divine worship, it follows that to vow to a saint means vowing to do something to God's worship in honour of a saint. Thus to vow a church to St. Agatha would mean a church for God's worship, where the purity of St. Agatha should be specially commemorated. The Reformers held that, as it is the duty of man to devote himself wholly, his life and his goods, to God, vows as a religious observance were unnecessary; but with the Roman Catholic to take a vow is considered to be a great merit, as Works of Supererogation are. The merit conferred is said to be threefold: it elevates the acts performed under the vow to the rank of sacrifice, and raises a good action to the level of divine worship; it offers not only the action but the faculty from which it proceeds, so that the whole spirit is elevated thereby; and it strengthens the will to the perfection of virtue. There are two sorts of religious vows in the Roman Church: simple and solemn. Simple vows are those taken in all religious Orders when the period of noviceship elapsed. They are held for three years, and then, if the superior allows it, solemn vows taken. The chief difference between them that in solemn vows of chastity, marriage contracted afterwards are null and void, while a simple vow of chastity makes unlawful to marry, but, except in the Jesu- Society, does not invalidate a marriage subsequently contracted. Solemn and certain simple vows, as those of chastity and greater pilgrimage, can only be dispensed the Pope, or by a superior specially delegated for the purpose; but most of the simple vows can be dispensed by the bishops.

Vulgar Tongue. — Several titles throughout the Prayer Book it is direct that the service should be held in the Eng. or vulgar (i.e. common) tongue, as in rubric before the Te Deum, etc. This first ordained in the reign of Henry VIII., service having always previously been read Latin. This is forbidden by Article XXI. which says: 'It is a thing plainly repugnant to the Word of God, and the custom of the Primitive Church, to have public prayer the Church, or to minister the sacrament a tongue not understood of the people.'

Vulgate. [Bible.]

W

Waddington, George [b. 1793, d. 1852]. Dean of Durham, and first Warden of Durham University. He wrote two ecclesiastical histories: The History of the Church from Earliest Ages to the Reformation, and History of the Reformation on the Continent. He also wrote works on Ethiopia and Greece having travelled much in the East.

Wafer. [Unleavened Bread.]

Wahabees or Wahabites. — The name of a modern Mohammedan sect whose object is to purify their religion from abuses and idolatrous practices which have crept into it. The Wahabees reject no new precepts, but their followers are rigid in their observance of all the laws and use which the Turks neglect, such as the reading of the Koran, the five daily prayers, the reverence for the City of Mecca, etc. The founder was Abd-ul-Wahab, the son of an Arab chief of Naljed, born at the close of the seventeenth century. He lived to the age of ninety-five and during his life peaceable means were used in the making of converts; but successors followed the example of Mohur in propagating their faith by the sword. The most important convert was a young chief named Saoo’d, and about 1746 he began to the principal mover in the work of reformation, and carried his arms with success against his heretical neighbours. He died in 1765, and was succeeded by his son Abl-ul-Aziz, who followed in his steps and pushed his conquests all over Arabia. The Wahabees reached the height of their power at the beginning of the present century; when, in 1803, they became masters of Mecca, and in 1804 of Medina. They laid a yearly tribute on the Turks in return for the privilege of making pilgrimages to the sacred city. In 1808, while pressing on to the east coast of the Persian Gulf, they came into collision with Great Britain, and were severely defeated. In 1811 the Pasha of Egypt, Mahomet Ali, sent an expedition against them, and in 1812 and 1813 recovered Medina and Mecca, and his adopted son, Ibrahim Pasha, in 1815 attacked them in their stronghold, central Arabia, and in 1818 captured their capital, Deraieh, and took their chief, Abdallah, prisoner to Constantineople, where he was beheaded. Their power was thus for a time crushed, but, according to the Eastern travellers Palgrave and Leggo, they are still very powerful in the peninsula. The former speaks of their empire as "a compact and well-organised government, where centralisation is fully understood and effectually carried out, and whose mainsprings and connecting links are force and fanaticism. Its atmosphere, to speak metaphorically, is sheer despotism—moral, intellectual, religious, and physical. . . . Its weakest point lies in enmity rivalries and feuds of succession, which, joined to the anti-Wahabian reaction existing far and wide throughout Arabia, may one day disintegrate and shatter the Nadjedean empire, yet not destroy it altogether. But as long as Wahabism shall prevail in the centre and uplands of Arabia, small indeed are the hopes of civilisation, advancement, and national prosperity for the Arab race." Their political power is now confined to their native province, Nedjed, but they have missionaries and spies in many places north of that, and also on the coast of the Persian Gulf.

Wake [derived from an old Gothic word, waken, "to watch"].—The people had been accustomed to hold wakes in honour of the casket gods. When it became a recognised Christian use to dedicate churches to popular saints, the day on which such saints were commemorated came to be celebrated with great rejoicing. At first the congregation used to meet the night before, and watch (hence the name) all through the night; and the morning, after a solemn service had been held, gave themselves up to feasting and rejoicing. In time the custom became passed, and the day was no longer treated as a religious festival. In the reign of Henry III. it was ordained that the wake should be kept in all parishes on the first Sunday in October, in the hopes of getting the day observed more quietly; but in spite of this the festivals fell into such bad repute that the Puritans made a vigorous effort to bring about their discontinuance. In 1627 one of the judges in Somersetshire ordered that no wake should be held henceforth, and the custom gradually died out, especially in the western counties. [Sports, Book or.] In the north and midland counties they are still, though rarely, to be found. A lyke-wake, or liche-wake, is the watching of a dead body all night by the relatives or friends.

Wake, William, D.D. Archbishop of Canterbury [b. 1657, d. 1737], was educated at Oxford, and became successively Canon of Christ Church [1684], Dean of Exeter [1701], Bishop of Lincoln [1705], and Archbishop of Canterbury [1715]. He began his career as a polemicist with his Exposition of the Doctrines of the Church of England, an answer to Bossuet's recently published Exposition of the Roman Catholic Faith, and this led to a controversy in the course of which Wake published two more treatises. Pope Clement XI. is said to have regretted that so profound a theologian was not a member of his Church. In the earlier part of Wake's episcopate he belonged to the Low Church school, but he steadily became more conservative, as was shown by his sharp controversy with Hoadly, and by his votes in the House of Lords against the repeal of the Test and Corporation and the Occasional Conformity Acts. One of his most memorable works was his endeavours, in conjunction with Dupin, to bring about a union between the English and Gallican Churches, which, though it failed, has left a longing hope on the part of many Anglicans that it may even yet promote a reunion of Christendom. His English Version of the Genuine Epistles of the Apostolic Fathers is still regarded as a standard work in English divinity.

Wakefield, Gilbert, a distinguished scholar and critic, was the son of a clergyman, George Wakefield. He was born at Nottingham in 1756, died in London in 1801. He entered Jesus College, Cambridge, in 1772, and was elected a Fellow in 1776. The same year he published a volume of Latin poems, with some clever criticisms on Homer, which already gave promise of the brilliant scholarship for which he was afterwards famous. In 1778 he took deacon's orders and obtained a curacy first in the Cheshire and afterwards near Liverpool. He was never ordained priest, for, before the year he had expired, he had become so dissatisfied with the teaching and discipline of the Church of England that he resolved to leave it, and, in 1774, took the post of classical tutor in a Dissenting school at Warrington. While there he published A New Translation of the First Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Thessaloniens; A Plain and Short Account of the Nature of Baptism; An Essay on Inspiration, and a New Translation of St. Matthew's Gospel, with notes critical, philological, and explanatory. Soon after, the Warrington school broke up, and he took a house at Bramcote in Nottinghamshire, hoping to get some private pupils. Here, in 1784, he published the first volume of an Enquiry into the Opinions of the Christian Writers of the First Three Centuries Concerning the Person of Jesus Christ, a book which he never finished. In 1799 he began a book called Silva Critica, the object of which was to illustrate the Scriptures by the philology of Greece and Rome. In 1796 he was offered the post of classical tutor at the Dissenting college at Hackney, which he accepted, and kept until he got himself into trouble about a tract in which he advocated the superiority of private to public worship, and was obliged to resign. He next defended revealed religion by his Evidences of Christianity. He also turned his attention to theologico-political discussion, and published in 1794 The Spirit of Christianity compared with the Spirit of the Times in Great Britain, and Examination of the Age of Reason in answer to Paine. He then turned his attention to select Greek tragedies; his edition of Lucretius particularly gaining him the distinction of being one of the ablest classical critics. In a pamphlet written in 1798, entitled A Reply to the Bishop of Llandaff's Address to the People of Great Britain, he censured the policy of the war against France produced by the French Revolution. For this he was subjected to a prosecution on the part of the Crown for libel, which terminated in a sentence of two years' imprisonment in Dorchester Gaol. A subscription amounting to £5,000 was raised by his friends for the support of his family during the time. At the end of the two years he was set at liberty, and immediately began to give a course of lectures on Virgil in London, but in August of the same year, 1801, was seized with typhus fever, and died in the September following. Besides the critical power already mentioned, his zeal for what he considered the truth, no matter what the consequences were to himself, ought to be noticed. In his private and family life he was gentle and amiable, the direct opposite to what he was in controversy and criticism. After his death a collection of letters between him and C. J. Fox, chiefly relating to Greek literature, was published.

Waldenses.—A remarkable Christian sect dwelling in some of the Swiss valleys, principally in those of the Pellice (or Luserna) and the Germanasca, in the Western Alps. A large amount of information respecting them is found in some old MSS. in the possession of the University of Cambridge, and a very valuable account is given in Histoire Littéraire des Vaulods du Piémont d'après les Manuscrits Originaux par Édouard Montet [1889]. They owe their origin and name to Peter Waldus (Waldo, Vaud), a rich citizen of Lyons. About 1170 Waldus, from reading the Bible and some passages from the Fathers of the Church, which he caused to be translated into his native tongue, determined to imitate the mode of life of the Apostles and primitive Christians, gave his goods to the poor, and his preaching collected numerous followers chiefly from the class of artisans, who, from the place of their birth, were called "Lycists;" sometimes "Poor men of Lyons," account of their voluntary poverty; "Sabotati," on account of their wooden shoes or sandals [sabots]; or "Humiliatarii," account of their humility. They have often been confounded with the Cathari or Albigenses, but M. Montet has proved conclusive that they had no connection with them; they even spoke of the Albigenses as "daemons. In their contempt for the degenerate clerics and their opposition to the Roman priesthood the Waldenses resembled other sects of the Middle Ages; but as early as 1184, by what time they had spread over Southern France and North Italy, they were excommunicated by the Pope, though the reason is not clear. They were distinguished from "heretics" generally, and seem to have held the doctrines of the Church, going to Catholic sources for literature, and to the priests for the sacraments. Probably the objection to them was that they were preachers, the same objection which was afterwards made to the Mendicant Friars. Once driven from the Catholic pale, they made the Bible alone the rule of their faith, and, rejecting whatever was not founded on it, conformable to Apostolic teaching, they gave the first impulse to a reform of the Christian Church. They, or at least the Italian branch of them, began to preach that a bad price cannot validly administer the sacraments, so as to reject Confession. As the French Waldenses were stamped out by persecution the Italians assumed the lead. The body thus separated from the Church held their ways until the war broke out against the Albigenses, by which time they had spread and established themselves in the South France, under the protection of the Count of Toulouse and Foix. At that time [1290-1320] many Waldenses fled to Aragon, Savoy, and Piedmont. Spain would not tolerate them at all. In Languedoc they were able to maintain themselves till 1330 in Provence, under severe oppression, till 1345, when the Parliament at Aix caused them to be exterminated in the most cruel manner; still longer in Dauphiny; and until the war of the Cevennes were the last Waldenses expelled from France. In the middle of the fourteenth century single congregations of this sect went to Calabria an Apulia, where they were soon suppressed others to Bohemia, where they were calle Grubenheimer," because they used to hide themselves in caverns. These soon became amalgamated with the Hussites, though as they were not so advanced in view as the Taborites there was a good deal of delay. From them the Bohemian Brethren derived the consecration of their bishops. They found a safe retreat, fortified by nature, in the valleys of Western Piedmont, where they founded a distinct Church, which has remained till the present day the main centre of their sect. A correspondence which two of their pastors, Morel and Masson, had with Ecolampadius, in 1530, is preserved in the library of Trinity College, Dublin, from which it appears that among the Waldenses there were sisterhoods bound by vows of celibacy, that the preachers received confessions, but resorted to the Catholic priesthood for the Sacraments. But now they resolved to abolish Confession, two Sacraments only were acknowledged, and the doctrine of Predestination was asserted. Their doctrines rest entirely on the Gospels, which, with some catechisms, they have in their old dialect, a mixture of French and Italian. In this language their worship was performed till 1630, when their old "barbes" or teachers became extinct. They then had recourse to Geneva to supply the vacancies, and ever since the French language has been used in their services, and teachers are sent from the Calvinistic colleges. The constitution of their congregations, which are chiefly employed in the cultivation of vineyards and the breeding of cattle, is republican. Each congregation is governed by a council, consisting of the elders and deacons, under the presidency of the pastor, which maintains the strictest discipline. The congregations are all united at the early synod. From their origin the Waldenses have been distinguished for their pure morals and industry, and have always been regarded as good subjects. After they had joined the Calvinists, in the sixteenth century, they were again exposed to the storm which was intended to sweep away the Reformation, he doctrines of which they had held practically for nearly three hundred years. This was the cause of their being expelled from France. Those who had settled in the duchy of Saluzzo were totally exterminated by 1633; and those in the other valleys, having received from the Court of Turin, in 1654, new assurances of religious freedom, were treacherously attacked, in 1655, by monks and soldiers, and shamefully treated. By the aid of other Protestant Powers they procured a new, though limited, promise of freedom by the Treaty of Pignerol, signed Aug. 18th, 1655, but the persecution, again brought about by French influence, obliged thousands to take refuge in Protestant countries: in London they joined the French Huguenots; in the Netherlands, the Walloons; in Berlin, the French: while nearly 2,000 went to Switzerland. They now enjoy religious freedom and all civil rights in Lucerne, St. Martin, and Perusa, where they number over 20,000, while there are about 1,600 settled in Württemberg.

M. Montet has given a very thorough account of Waldensian literature, dividing it into three periods: [1] The Catholic period, during which the dogmas and practices of the Church were accepted. The writings of this period are taken from the Fathers and the Liturgists. The Pope during this period is never attacked, the Seven Sacraments and Transubstantiation are assumed, and ascetic views are strongly maintained. [2] The Hussite period. Now the Pope is fiercely attacked, the Sacraments are invalid by reason of the wickedness of the priests, and there is a strong leaning towards the Universal Priesthood. [3] The Calvinistic. Unhappily this last period has been marked by a wholesale falsification of documents, by forgery and by mutilation, with the object of showing that the Waldensian is a Christian body which had descended from Apostolic times, preserving their faith through the ages in primitive form. This fiction M. Montet has altogether destroyed, though, as he acknowledges, the late Mr. Henry Bradshaw had already discovered and exposed the real character of some of the documents adduced. Much kindness has been expended on the Waldenses by English, Scotch, and American sympathisers, and every year in the first week of September delegates from these countries attend the Synod, when not unfrequently a dispute arises between the United Presbyterians and the Free Kirk men. Much money, diverted from home charities, finds its way hither. A short time since the Waldensian inhabitants of Dormitorv in Dauphiné were transported by mistaken kindness to Algeria, the result of which was that their bones were scattered, not on Alpine mountains, but on scorching African plains. The services are the very plainest and barest type of Genevan Protestantism; the minister taking the whole service and the people taking no share, except the occasional singing of a hymn.

Waldo, Peter, the alleged founder of the Waldenses [q.v.], was born at Vaux, or Waldum, on the Rhone, early in the twelfth century. He made a large commercial fortune in Lyons. In 1170 he employed a priest to translate from Latin into French the Four Gospels, with other books of Holy Scripture, and the most remarkable sentences of the ancient doctors so much esteemed at that time. It was through the perusal of these books that he determined to lead a religious life, and, abandoning his mercantile pursuits, he distributed his riches among the poor, and formed an association with other pious men who adopted his sentiments, and then assumed the character of a public teacher and instructor of the multitude in the doctrines of Christianity. His opinions were condemned by a General Council held in the Lateran in 1179, and he was forced to leave Lyons; he fled to the mountains of Dauphiné, and afterwards probably to those of Piedmont. He is said also to have visited Bohemia. The exact date of his death is not known, but it was about 1190.

Wall, William [b. 1646, d. 1728], Vicar of Shoreham in Kent. His History of Infant Baptism remains the standard work on the subject. It was answered by John Gale [q.v.] in his Reflections on Mr. Wall’s History, and Wall then replied with a Defence of the History. Hardly anything is known of his life. Like Baxter, Newton, Warburton, he owed nothing to either of the Universities. That he possessed considerable property is clear from his selling a great part of the manor of Offord to Sir Jeffrey Amherst, and that he had a large family appears from the register of christenings at Shoreham. A tradition preserved in the village has it that he used to walk solitary in the churchyard on fine nights for hours, plunged in deep meditation. He was a good Hebrew scholar, and took part in the controversy of Whiston with Collins.

Wallin, Johan Olaf, Archbishop of Upsala [b. 1779, d. 1839], was born of poor parents, but by his own exertions as a teacher he raised the sum necessary for his support at the University of Upsala. In 1803 his poetical genius was first manifested in some translations of Horace, which won the prize of the Swedish Academy. He had, however, already determined to devote himself to the sacred ministry, and, having passed through a distinguished course at the university, received the degree of Doctor of Theology, and became pre-eminent as a parish minister, an eloquent preacher, a powerful speaker, and a Christian poet. He was the chief instrument in revising and compiling the hymn-book of the Swedish National Church, and enriched it with many of its noblest hymns, full of deep thought, evangelical fervour, and true poetry. In 1815 he became President of the Swedish Bible Society, and earnestly promoted its work: in 1821 we find him a leading member of the Commission for the revision of the Swedish Bible. His scholarship and attainments justified the high position he acquired. After filling various distinguished posts in Church and State, he was, in 1834, made Archbishop of Upsala and Vice-Chancellor of the university of that city. His health, which had never been strong, gave way at last under his manifold labours. His last words were: “My God—my country—my King.”

Walloon Church.—This body is a branch of the French Reformed Church, and was originally composed of the refugees who left France on account of religious persecution in the early part of the sixteenth century, and settled in England. The name was a Dutch form of the name “Galicen. Many refugees came over from Flanders 1520, after the condemnation of Luther doctrines at the Diet of Worms, as the first recognised congregation of religious refugees in England was established in 1547. Strype says that in the year a body of them met together at Canterbury; Jan Utenhove went there short after his arrival in this country, and probably took a great part in founding Walloon Church there, which had as first minister François du Rivière, with two years later, occupied a similar position in the French and Walloon Church London, established in 1549. There was another at Southampton. The refugees from France had greatly increased in numbers consequent of the persecution of Henry I and there were in 1548 over five thousand Netherlanders in London, a large proportion of them being Walloons. By the intervention of the Duchess of Suffolk Edward VI, favouring them, and the Privy Council agreed to give them part of the church of the dissolved monastery of the Augustine Friars, and the grant was confirmed by letters patent 1550; it was ordered that the church should have a superintendent and four ministers, so that it should be a body corporate. The first superintendent was Joannes A’Isaco, all the foreign churches in London being under charge. Divine service for these strangers was first celebrated in Austin Friars Sept. 21st, 1550. A’Isaco translated Psalms into Dutch verse, and set them music for the use of the congregation. The accession of Queen Mary an order was issued that all Netherland and other Protestant refugees should leave the kingdom with twenty-four days, and so the congregation was dissolved, and they settled in Emden where they soon re-established their church At Norwich, too, there had been a large body of Flemish weavers, and also at Glastonbury, these latter removed to Frankfort. The last patent of Edward VI. are still preserved. The archives at Austin Friars. On the accession of Elizabeth, the religious refugees were allowed to return to London to resume the use of their church, but instead of being a body corporate, they had the submission of the Bishop of London. In 1561, there being a hundred refugee families in Sandwich, royal letters patent they were allowed use of the aisle in St. Clement’s Church payment of forty shillings a year. In same year Queen Elizabeth ordered that the whole of the crypt in Canterbury Cathedral should be given up to the French and Flemish refugees; the main body was occupied their silk looms, and the south side aisle set apart as their place of worship, and it has been.
Walpurgis or Walpurga, St., was born in England, but spent most of her time in Germany, assisting her brother, St. Willibald [q.v.] and her uncle, St. Boniface [q.v.], in their missionary labours. About the middle of the eighth century she became the Abbess of a convent at Heidenheim, in Franconia. She is generally considered the authoress of a Latin description of the Travels of St. Willibald. She died about 777, and after her death many chapels were built in her honour. Of the origin of the curiousiegods and customs connected with the so-called Walpurgismacht, April 30th, very little is known. It is said that May 1st was a very important day for the German farmer, who signs contracts and begins to range for the work of the summer. With view to harassing him and doing him mischief, Satan and the witches were supposed to meet the night before on the Brocken and lay plans for his ruin. Hence the custom of burning straw in some parts of Germany on that night, which was supposed to have the power of dispersing all evil beings—a custom still, though very rarely, preserved.

Walstan, St., Confessor.—A saint of Norfolk, born of a rich family, who renounced his wealth at the age of twelve and became a farm-labourer at Taverham, near Cossey. He died May 30th, 1016, and was buried at his native place, Baber. Two wells in the neighbourhood bore his name and were the object of pilgrimages for the cure of palsy, lameness, and blindness. He died in a field, in the act of mowing, and was for a long time looked on in Norfolk as the patron saint of farm-labourers.

Walton, Brian, D.D., Bishop of Chester, born at Cleveland, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, in 1600. He was educated first at Oxford and then at Peterhouse, Cambridge, where he took his degree in 1623. He was ordained, and, while serving his first curacy, was also a schoolmaster in Suffolk; he then became Curate at All Hallows, Bread Street, and in 1626 was made Rector of St. Martin's Orgar in London and Sandon in Essex. About the same time he was appointed Chaplain to the King and made a Prebendary of St. Paul's. When the Puritans gained the upper-hand he was ejected from all his appointments, and fled to Oxford; while here he spent his time in collecting the materials for his celebrated Polyglot which has made his name famous. Several Polyglot Bibles had been published in foreign countries before Walton's, which appeared between the years 1654—57; but all critics allow that his is by far the most useful, and shows the greatest scholarship. It is supposed to be the first book printed in England by subscription. Nine languages are used in the course of the work, as many as seven being sometimes given in one page. On the Restoration he was made Chaplain to Charles II., and in September, 1661, was consecrated Bishop of Chester in Westminster Abbey, but died in the following November. Dr. Walton published, in 1655, as a help to the study of his Bible, an Introduction to Oriental Literature.

Walton, Izaak, best known as "the Father of Angling," but also as a Christian biographer, was born in Stafford in 1593; died 1683. Little is known of him before his marriage, in 1626, to Rachel Floud, a descendant of Archbishop Cranmer. From her uncle, George Cranmer, who had been the pupil of Richard Hooker [q.v.], he probably gained the material for his celebrated Life of Hooker. Walton's first literary effort was an elegy on his friend Dr. Donne, whose life he wrote as a preface to the volume of sermons published in 1640. Walton's "Lives" comprise those of Donne, Hooker, Sir Henry Wotton, George Herbert, and Sanderson Bishop of Lincoln. Walton's second wife was Anne Ken, half-sister to the celebrated Non-juring Bishop of Bath and Wells. He is buried in Winchester Cathedral, as, at the time of his death, he was residing with his son-in-law, Dr. Hawkins, Prebendary of Winchester. His greatest fame rests on his Complete Angler, or Contemplative Man's Recreation—a beautiful pastoral, breathing forth the love of the Creator and His works, and full of delightful descriptions of rural scenery.

Warburton, William, Bishop of Gloucester, was born at Newark-upon-Trent, in 1698, died at Gloucester, 1779. He was the son of an attorney, and his father, wishing to train him in the same profession, apprenticed him, in 1714, to an attorney at East Markham. He was there five years, and then gained admittance in one of the courts at Westminster; but, having by this time come to the conclusion that his talents were not suited to the law, he gave it up, and in 1723 took deacon's orders. Two years later he published his first literary work, entitled Miscellaneous Translations, in Prose and Verse, from Roman Authors, with a dedication to Sir Robert Sutton, who, in return, presented him, on his being admitted to priest's orders in 1726, with a small living. In 1727 he began to distinguish himself as an original author by his Inquiries into the Causes of Prodigies and Miracles, which he dedicated to Sir Robert Sutton. His patron gave him the living of Brant Broughton, in Lincolnshire, and by his interest at Cambridge caused Warburton's name to be placed on the list of the King's Masters of Arts, a favour which proved of great service in his after-career, supplying to some extent the position he would have lost by not having received a university education. In 1736 appeared his Alliance between Church and State; or, the Necessity and Equity of an Established Religion and a Test Law, demonstrated from the essence and end of civil society upon the fundamental principles of the law of nature and nations, which passed through four editions during the life of the author, though it is said to have given satisfaction neither to the upholders of the Church nor to those who advocated religious liberty. The first volume of his chief work was published in 1738, under the title of the Divine Legation of Moses Demonstrated on the Principles of a Religious Deist, from the Omission of the Doctrine of a Future State of Rewards and Punishments in the Jewish Dispensation. This brought a storm of abuse upon his head from all Church parties; but, nothing daunted, Warburton remained firm to his opinions, and published a Vindication of them. In 1740 he wrote a defence of Pope's Essay on Man in a leading journal called Works of the Learned, which so enchanted Pope that he bequeathed Warburton half his library and the copyright of such of his works already printed as were not otherwise disposed of. In 1746 he became Preacher at Lincoln's Inn, and in the following year appeared as an editor of Shakespeare. His name was by this time famous, and his rise in the clerical profession was rapid. He became Prebendary of Gloucester in 1753, King's Chaplain in 1754, Prebendary of Durham the same year, Dean of Bristol in 1757, and Bishop of Gloucester in 1759. He died at Gloucester in 1779, and was buried in the cathedral. After his death his works were collected and published in six volumes by his friend Bishop Hurd, and a biographical memoir, forming a seventh volume, appeared some years later. Doctor Johnson in his life of Pope thus describes Warburton: "He was a man of vigorous faculties, a mind fervid and vehement, supplied by incessant and unlimited inquiry, with wonderful extent and variety of knowledge, which yet had not oppressed his imagination, nor clouded his perspicuity. To every work he brought a memory full fraught, together with a fancy fertile of original combinations, and at once exerted the powers of the scholar, the reasoner, and the wit. In his knowledge was too multifarious to always exact, and his pursuits were too early to be always cautious. His abilities gave him a haughty consequence which he disdained correct and mollify; and his impatience of opposition disposed him to treat his adversaries with contemptuous superiority, as much as his readers commonly his enemies, and cited against the advocate some who favour the cause."

Warburton Lectures.—This lecture ship, the object of which is "to prove a truth of revealed religion in general and the Christian in particular from the complection of those prophecies in the Old a New Testaments which relate to the Christ Church, especially to the apostacy of Pa Rome," was established in 1768 by Bish. Warburton. It is endowed with the diivider of £500 Consols, and is tenable for four year. The lectures are to be delivered in the cha of the Society of Lincoln's Inn on the fi Sunday after Michaelmas Term and f Sundays before and after Hilary Term.

Ward, Seth, Bishop of Salisbury and the most noted mathematician and astronomer his time [b. at Buntingford, in Hertfordshire, in 1617; d. in 1689]. He was educated at Sydney College, Cambridge, where he applied himself specially to the study mathematics, and became a Fellow. In 1656, the Master of his college and several other Fellows, was imprisoned and deprived of his fellowship for refusing to subscribe the Solemn League and Covenant, and, in conjunction with Isaac Barrow and Peter Guening, wrote a tract against the Covenant. For a time he carried on his mathematical studies with Mr. William Aughtred, at Aubury in Surrey, and mastered his Clau Mathematica. At the end of the Civil War he became Chaplain to Lord Wemman, and 1649, by shifting his opinions and casting his lot with the Commonwealth, he obtain the chair of Astronomy at the University of Oxford, on the ejection therefrom of N. Gres. He then associated himself wid Wadham College, and took his M.A. t same year, and his D.D. in 1654. In 1660 he obtained of Dr. Brownrigg, the silent Bishop of Exeter, the Precentorship of the cathedral, and the following year was elected President of Jesus College. In 1659 was chosen by a majority of the Fellow President of Trinity; at the Restoration was forced to restore these posts to the rightful owners, but was presented to rce of St. Lawrence Jewry, in Londo and confirmed in his post of Precentor Exeter. In 1661 he was made a Fellow the Royal Society, and soon after Dean Exeter; and in 1682, on the translation Bishop Gauden to Worcester, he became Bishop of Exeter, from which See he was translated to that of Salisbury on the death of Bishop Hyde in 1667. In 1671 Charles II. made him Chancellor of the Order of the Garter. He was distinguished for his power as an orator, and for soundness of argument.

His chief theological works are: A Philosophical Essay towards an Elevation of the Being and Attributes of God, the Immortality of the Souls of Men, and the Truth and Authority of the Scripture, published in 1652; a volume of Sermons [1674], Against the Resistance of Lawful Powers, Against the Anti-Scripturists, etc. His most celebrated writings, however, are astronomical.

Ward was a very munificent man; he gave a considerable sum of money towards making the river at Salisbury navigable to Christ Church in Hampshire; and in 1679 he bestowed £1,000 on Sydney College, Cambridge. In 1683 he built a hospital or college at Salisbury for the benefit of ten poor widows of clergymen, and the following year erected at his birthplace almshouses "for four ancient men and four ancient women who had lived well, but by misfortune brought to poverty."

Wardlaw, Ralph, D.D., Scottish divine

John, d. at Dalketh, 1779; d. at Glasgow, 1853. In 1791 he entered the University of Glasgow, and afterwards attended for five years the divinity lectures of the Secession Church, which decided him to become a minister of the Scottish Independent congregation. He began to preach in 1800, and a church having been built for him in Glasgow, he took charge of the congregation there in 1803, and continued to hold the office for more than fifty years. In 1811 he was elected Professor of systematic Theology in the Theological Academy of the Scottish Congregationalists, then established in Glasgow, and this post also he held until his death. In 1833 he delivered a course of lectures in London on the defence of Congregationalism, and was appointed in 1839 to appear in London to reply to some lectures, defending Church establishments, delivered by Dr. Chalmers. Wardlaw wrote many controversial and theological works, remarkable for learning, vigour, and grace of style. The chief of these are discourses on the Socinian Controversy; On the Nature and Extent of the Atonement of Christ; Christian Ethics; Congregational Independence; and numerous essays and discourses.

Warham, William, Archbishop of Canterbury, was born at Oakley, in Hampshire, about 1560, died at St. Stephen's, near Canterbury, in 1582. He was educated at Winchester, and afterwards at New College, where he obtained a Fellowship in 1575, and a few years later the degree of L.L.D. He was ordained, and is supposed to have possessed some living; but he was for the most part employed in the business of the Court of Arches. He was a member of Sir Edward Poyning's mission to Burgundy, on the question of the support given by Margaret, the Dowager-Duchess, to Perkin Warbeck, and Bacon gives one of his speeches on this occasion in the life of Henry VII. He was in high favour with the King, and obtained promotion quickly — being Keeper of the Great Seal, Lord Chancellor, Bishop of London, and Archbishop of Canterbury, in the course of a very few years. When Henry VIII. came to the throne Warham was made to resign several offices in favour of Wolsey, a former pupil. This was partly because Warham had opposed the marriage of Henry, when Prince of Wales, with Catherine of Aragon, his brother's widow. He and the Cardinal were jealous of one another, and the question of rights — one being Archbishop and one Cardinal — was always arising. But Warham lived to see his rival disgraced, and was afterwards even again offered the Chancellorship, but declined it on account of his age and ill-health. He was a generous patron of Erasmus, who dedicated to him the collection of St. Jerome's works which he edited.

Warrants, Warranty. — A term used in the Thirty-nine Articles to signify a proof or security to the truth of a doctrine. Thus in Article VIII. it is written that "the Three Creeds . . . ought thoroughly to be received and believed: for they may be proved by most certain warrants of Holy Scripture;" while Article XXII. says that "the Romish doctrine concerning Purgatory, Pardons, Worshipping and Adoration . . . is a fond thing, vainly invented and grounded upon no warranty of Scripture."

Washburn, Edward Abel, D.D. [b. at Boston, Massachusetts, April, 1819; d. at New York, February, 1881], studied at Andover and New Haven, and entered the Congregational ministry; but soon left this and became a clergyman in the Episcopal Church. From 1845 till 1851 he was Rector of St. Paul's, Newburyport; subsequently he travelled in Egypt, Palestine, India, and China, and on his return in 1853 was appointed to the rectory of St. John's, Hartford. In 1862 he was removed to St. Mark's, Philadelphia, and in 1865 to Calvary Church, New York, where he spent sixteen years in unwearying labour, attracting large numbers by the earnestness and depth of his sermons. He published only one volume, The Social Law of God; but he wrote numbers of essays, reviews, and commentaries, and some of his sermons have been collected and published since his death, as The Great Social Problems of the Day, published in 1884.

Watch-night Service. — That kept in the night between the old and new year.
The watch-night service was originally started by the Methodists under Wesley, but is now very generally adopted in the Established Church under the elasticity allowed by the Act of Uniformity Amendment Act. The form of service varies a good deal. A usual plan is to begin with the Litany, followed by an address, then a few minutes' silent prayer until the striking of midnight. Then follows the Te Deum, or sometimes Holy Communion.

Waterland, Daniel, D.D., an English theologian and divine [b. at Waseley, Lincolnshire, of which his father was rector, 1683; d. in London, 1740]. He studied at Magdalen College, Cambridge, of which he was made Fellow in 1704; took orders, and after some years spent in tutorship became Rector of Ellingham, to which he was presented by the Earl of Suffolk in 1713. Here he published Advice to a Young Student, with a Method of Study for the first Four Years, which brought him under the notice of George L., who made him his chaplain in 1717, and conferred on him the degree of D.D. Waterland made his first appearance as a controversialist in 1718, when he criticised a book by Dr. Whitby on Bull's defence of the Nicene Creed, afterwards publishing his criticisms in a book called A Defence of Christ's Divinity. He was attacked by Dr. Clarke and other Arians, and a sharp contest was maintained, much being written on both sides. In 1721 Waterland was presented by the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's to the rectory of St. Augustine's and St. Faith's, and in 1723 received the Chancellorship of York Cathedral; in 1727 he was made Canon of Windsor; in 1728, Archdeacon of Middlesex; and in 1730, Vicar of Twickenham, which he held with the two latter appointments. During the later years of his life he engaged in a controversy with the Freethinkers, and with many other theologians who were opposed in any respects to his doctrines. Besides the works above mentioned he wrote A Critical History of the Athenasian Creed; Scripture Vindicated; The Doctrine of the Holy Trinity Asserted; and A Review of the Doctrine of the Eucharist, as laid down in Scripture and Antiquity. Some volumes of his sermons were also published.

Watson, Richard, Bishop of Llandaff was born at Heversham, Westmorland, 1737, died 1816. His father was a clergym and master of a free grammar school, at which Richard received his early education. In 17 he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, as sizar, and there had a hard struggle on account of his poverty. He was distinguished from the first for his diligent application to his work, took his degrees regularly, became a Colleague, and in 1760 obtained a Fellowship. Four years later he was appointed Professor of Chemistry to the University, a very singular choice, as he had never studied the subject. He was not, however, soon daunted by difficulties, but started for Paris, where he worked hard in a laboratory for four months. When he came back he was a not only to lecture on the subject, but wrote books, which were popular for some time, was elected a Fellow of the Royal Society, and often contributed articles to collection of Philosophical Transactions. 1771 he was appointed Regius Professor of Divinity, and seems to have known as much Divinity as he did chemistry a few years before. He was often called the "self-taught professor," and prided himself on the title. But his political speeches and sermons made his name especially famous. The first effort of this kind that he made was in a sermon preach before the University on the anniversary of the French Revolution, which was printed under the title of The Principles of the Revolution Vindicated. He had already appeared as an opponent to Gibbon, to whom he had addressed a series of letters, entitled Apology for Christianity. The patronage of the Duke of Rutland was exerted to obtain his promotion to the See of Llandaff, which he succeeded Bishop Barrington in 178; and he was permitted to hold at the same time the Archdeaconry of Ely, his professorship, and other ecclesiastical benefices. And wherever he went, he found a ready listener at having sacrifice himself to his principles, and be left in poverty. Soon after this he received a large addition by the bequest of a valuable estate from a former pupil Cambridge, worth £20,500. At the same time he addressed a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, suggesting the advisability of equalising the value of church benefice. During the illness of the King in 1784, Watson, in a speech in the House of Lords, strongly defended the right of the Prince...
Wales to the Regency, in opposition to the policy maintained by Pitt. In 1796 he appeared a second time as the defender of revealed religion in his Apology for the Bible, designed as an answer to Hume's Age of Reason. In 1798 he published an address to the people of Great Britain on the danger which threatened their country from the influence of those principles which had occasioned the Revolution in France. Gilbert Wakefield [q.v.] published an answer to this publication, for which he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment. Watson always continued to be the advocate for liberality, both in politics and in religion; but his fears from the ascendancy of French principles were expressed in a publication under the title of The Substance of a Speech intended to have been spoken in the House of Lords, Nov. 22nd, 1803. The latter part of his life he spent in retirement at Calgarth Park, in Westmorland. Besides the works already mentioned, he wrote others, for the most part political sermons, and several letters, signed at the time "A Christian Whig." After his death his autobiographical memoir was edited by his son.

Watts, Isaac, the well-known Puritan divine and hymn-writer, was born at Southampton, July 17th, 1674, died in 1748. He was brought up a rigid Nonconformist, and from his earliest years determined to become a Dissenting minister. He was educated in his native town, and at the age of sixteen was sent to an academy in London kept by Mr. Thomas Rowe, an Independent minister. He remained there for four years, studying so hard as to injure his constitution. He returned home in 1694 for two years, and during this time most of his hymns, and several other works, were composed. In 1696 he became tutor to the son of Sir John Hartopp, of Stoke Newington. In 1698 he was chosen assistant to Dr. Chauncey, minister of the Independent Church in Mark Lane, but continued his duties as tutor till he succeeded Dr. Chauncey in 1702. He became very ill, and an assistant was provided. He remained sick for some time, and in 1712 was attacked by a violent fever, from which he never entirely recovered. He went to visit Sir Thomas Abney, at Theobalds, intending to stay a week; but remained there till his death, in 1748. He officiated in London when he was well enough, but if prevented refused to receive his salary, and devoted himself to literary work. His books were very popular, but have now been superseded. The chief were: Logic, which was at one time used as a text-book at Oxford University; * Psalms and Hymns*; a number of works for young children, among which are his Divine and Moral Songs; An Essay towards the Encouragement of Charity Schools; Three Dissertations relating to the Christian Doctrine of the Trinity; Horae Lyricae; Sermons; etc.

Week.—A period of seven days; also used in the Bible to signify a heptade of anything. The antiquity of the custom of measuring time by seven days is certain; it has even been said that our first parents were commanded to do so in commemoration of the time employed in the creation of the world, and many instances in the early chapters of Genesis testify to its use. It is in use among all the Semitic races, among the Egyptians and Persians, which leaves no doubt of its antiquity; other tribes among which it is found may have adopted it in modern times from the people with whom they have come in contact. Whether the division was made by the Hebrews purely for theological reasons, or whether it was a natural division, hallowed by associations, is open to doubt. The Jews seem to have made no distinction between the six days of the week, the only division being that occasioned by the Sabbath [q.v.], the other days were reckoned merely by ordinal numbers.

Wenceslaus, Sr., Duke and patron saint of Bohemia, martyr; born in the beginning of the ninth century. He was the son of a Christian prince, Duke Wratiales, and of his wife, Drahomira, a pagan. He was sent to Prague to be brought up in the Christian religion by his grandmother Ludmilla: when old enough he was sent to a college at Budevis, distant about sixty miles from Prague, and led a grave, modest, and pure life. His father died when he was still young, and his mother became regent, and at once repealed the laws her husband had made in favour of the Christians, and a great persecution and slaughter of the Christians followed. Ludmilla then got Wenceslaus to take the reins of government into his own hands, and helped him with her advice; the nobles, however, decreed to divide the kingdom between him and his younger brother, Boleslaus, who had been educated as a pagan, and in whom consequently Drahomira found an ally in her crimes. They plotted against the life of Ludmilla, and she was strangled with her own veil in her chapel. Wenceslaus turned his mind to the reformation of several abuses in his country and governed with great wisdom, but among his subjects there were very many who were averse to any changes, and who mocked at his prayers and religious life, saying that such employments were unfit for a prince and incompatible with the courage and policy necessary to govern a state. His mother and brother were concerting plans to murder him when they learnt that he had begged the Pope to send some Benedictine monks to his kingdom in order that he might spend the rest of his life with them in religious retreat. As, however, there was some delay in their arrival Drahomiru and Boleslaus grew impatient, and as Boleslaus had just had a son born to him they invited Wenceslaus to be present at an ente-

raining of rejoicing at the birth. Wenceslaus fell into the trap laid for him, and went. But at midnight he left the company to go as usual to his prayers in the church; his brother followed him and murdered him with his own hands. This was in the year 929.

Werburgh or Wereburga, the patroness of Chester, lived in the seventh century, and was born at Stone in Staffordshire. She was the daughter of Wulfere, King of Mercia, and of St. Ermenild, daughter of Ercombert, King of Kent. St. Werburgh devoted herself to fasting and prayer, refusing all her suitors, till Werbode, a wicked knight of her father's Court, obtained the king's consent to his suit. Werburgh's two elder brothers, Wulfade and Rufin, who had retired to be taught by St. Chad, Bishop of Lichfield, were strongly opposed to the match, so Werbode persuaded the king to murder them, which he did, but immediately repented, did penance, destroyed all idols, founded the Abbey of Peterborough and the Priory of Stone. Werburgh now, for the first time, made known her wish to become a nun, and entered the abbey at Ely. She afterwards founded the monasteries of Trent-ham and of Hanbury, in Staffordshire, and of Weedon in Northamptonshire. She died at Trentham on Feb. 3rd, about the end of the seventh century, and was buried at Hanbury. Her body was removed in 875, for fear of the Danes, to West Chester, where a church was raised for it, which afterwards became the Cathedral. [CHESTER.]

Wesley, Charles, the well-known hymn-writer, was born in 1708, educated first at Westminster School, then at Christ Church, Oxford, after which his history becomes merged in that of his brother. In 1749 he married Miss Gwynne, a Welsh lady, and from that time confined his preaching almost entirely to London and Bristol. He had great talent for verse-writing; several of his hymns have taken their place among our sacred classics; and such poems as "Come, O Thou Traveller Unknown," will also hold their own. Charles Wesley was of quiet and domestic habits, with little ambition of power, pious even to fervency, but not adverse to jocularity in its place; whereas John held laughter to be almost a sin. Charles Wesley died in 1788. His son, Samuel, belonged to the first rank of English musicians.

Wesley, Rev. John, A.M.—The second son of Saul and Susannah Wesley [b. at Epworth in Lincolnshire, June 17th (O. S.), 1703]. At six years of age he nearly lost his life through the burning of the parsonage house, set on fire, according to his own account, by some of the ill-conditioned parishioners, who resented his father's plai speech. The memory was always potent the child's imagination, who frequently refe-to it in his writings. He was deeply religiofrom the beginning, and at eight years age became a communicant. He was sent Charterhouse, to which school, though suffered a good deal from bullying, he w always affectionately attached, and used visit it yearly to the end of his life. The b boys used to eat his meat, and he was ve-

often reduced to a bit of bread for his day meal; but he was hardy, and obeyed h father's strict command to run round th Charterhouse Gardens three times ever morning. From the Charterhouse he went to Christ Church, Oxford, and in due tune took his B.A. He soon became conspicuous as a scholar in the learned languages, but al for the religious earnestness of his life. I put away all acquainances that he four injurious to his soul's health, new mode of his life so as to regulate his time, his studi his expenses, and chose all his companion from among those that he thought likely help his efficiency in the ministry, for whi he was now zealously preparing. In 1725 he was ordained by Potter, then Bishop Oxford, and officiated for a while as b father's curate. But in 1726 he was elect a Fellow of Lincoln College (taking his A degree the same year), and became reside at Oxford as Greek Lecturer, and Modern of the Passes. He wrote a form of pray for his pupils, showing how desirable he wa that they should be good as well as learn. His impressions deepened, and he joined a association which had been formed by h brother Charles, then an undergraduate Christ Church, along with James Herve Whitfield, Morgan, and others. They m to read divinity on Sunday evenings, at classes on other days. And they all arranged to visit the prisoners in the cast and the sick poor of the town. Then it can to Greek Testament readings very frequently on the week evenings instead of the classic "We were now," he says, "about fifteen; number, all of one heart and of one mind. How the name of Methodists' came to be appli to this little band has already been tol [Methodists]; but in truth this little O ford society, never exceeding thirty in number, had nothing in common with th Methodism which afterwards arose, save r ligious earnestness. It was of a most pr nounced High Church character, had r organisation or bond of union, and hence i members became scattered in different direc tions. Whitfield bent in one direction an Wesley in another; Clayton remained Hig Church to the end; James Hervey began a fervid Evangelical Churchman; Gambold Moravian bishop; Ingham a Dissente While thus the name once given to Wesley friends remained, the Methodists he founded must not be confused, as they so often have been, with that Oxford company of which he was also the leading spirit.

One of his intimate friends at this time was Law, whose Serious Call had been one of the books which had most strongly impressed him. Twice or thrice in the year John and Charles Wesley had visited him, travelling for sixty miles on foot in order to save the more money for the poor. One day Law said to John, “You would have a philosophic religion, but there can be no such thing. Religion is the most plain, simple thing in the world. It is only—we love Him because He first loved us.” This remark he never afterwards forgot. Another time Law saw him much depressed, and inquired the reason. “It is because I see so little fruit of my labours,” was the answer. “My dear friend,” said Law, “you reverse matters from their proper order. You are to follow the Divine light, wherever it leads you, in all your conduct. It is God alone that gives the blessing. I pray you, always mind your own work, and go on with cheerfulness, and God will take care of His.”

Wesley’s father wished his son to succeed him at Epworth, but he so wedded to a college life and to the advantages he enjoyed of his retirement and his chosen companions, that he could not be persuaded to consent. His father died in 1735. He had desired John to present to Queen Caroline a book he had just finished, and he went to London for that purpose. There he was strongly solicited by Dr. Burton, one of the trustees for the new colony in Georgia, to go there and preach to the Indians. He refused at first, but afterwards consented; and on Oct. 14th, 1735, he sailed from Gravesend with his brother Charles and two other friends. They arrived at the Savannah in the February following, and preached to the people whom they found on landing, who were the more rejoiced, that means of grace had been scarce with them. Not finding any open door for the prosecution of work among the Indians, the two brothers laboured incessantly where they landed. “The inconveniences and dangers,” says one of Wesley’s biographers, “which he embraced that he might preach the Gospel and do good of every kind to all that would receive it at his hands: the exposing of himself to every change of season and inelegance of weather in the prosecution of his work, were conditions which few but himself could have submitted to. He frequently slept on the ground, as he journeyed through the woods, covered with the nightly dews, and with his clothes and his hair frozen by the morning to the earth. He would wade through swamps and swim through rivers, and then travel till his clothes were dry. His health in the meantime, strange as it may seem, was uninterrupted.” His work here was interrupted by a love-passage. He became attached to Miss Causton, the niece of the chief magistrate of Savannah, but eventually declined to marry her, on the advice of his friends. On this disappointment she married a Mr. Williamson, and Wesley refused to admit her to the Communion, upon which her husband indicted him for defamation. The affair was never brought to an issue, but was the occasion of Wesley leaving the colony, which he did on Dec. 3rd, 1737, “shaking the dust off his feet,” to use his own expression.

During his voyage back to England Wesley became conscious of a great change in his religious feelings, which may be told in his own words. “It is upwards of two years since I left my native country in order to teach the Georgian Indians the nature of Christianity, but what have I learned myself in the meantime? Why, what I least of all suspected, that I, who went to America to convert others, was never converted myself. . . . All this time that I was at Savannah I was beating the air. Being ignorant of the righteousness of Christ, which by a living faith in Him bringeth salvation to every one that believeth, I sought to establish my own righteousness, and so laboured in the fire all my days.”

He arrived in England Feb. 1st, 1738, and found that Whitfield had sailed for America the day before on purpose to assist him. It is characteristic of him that on his journey from Deal to London he preached and read prayers at several places. He was still under concern from a sense of sin and a want of assurance of forgiveness, but he says that the light came to him through the conversation of Peter Böhler, a Moravian, whom he renewed acquaintance with on his arrival. As he attended the afternoon services at St. Paul’s he heard the 130th Psalm sung as an anthem, and the same evening he attended a religious meeting in Aldersgate Street, where one was reading Luther’s Preface to the Epistle to the Romans. And he says, “I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ alone for salvation, and an assurance was given me that He had taken away my sins, even mine.” This event he regarded as his conversion. During his absence the religious movement which began to be known by the name of Methodism had made great progress in London, Bristol, and other parts of the South of England, under the impulse of the enthusiastic preaching of Whitfield. With this enthusiasm Wesley now found himself in full accord, and under its influence he determined, three weeks after his “conversion,” to retire for a short time to Germany. He hoped, he said, that the conversing with those holy men [the Moravians] who were themselves living witnesses of the power of faith, and yet able to bear with those who were weak, would be a means, under God, of establishing his soul. Accordingly, in June, 1738, he crossed to Rotterdam, and went on to Herrnhut, the Moravian settlement in Upper Lusatia, when Count Zinzendorf introduced him to the Prince Royal of Prussia, afterwards Frederick the Great. On his return to England in September, he heard that Whitfield had returned from Georgia, and they once more became intimately associated. From this time the history of Wesley becomes merged in that of Methodism, and we refer the reader to the article on that subject. [METHODISTS.] It only remains to note the main dates of the rest of his biography. He began his open-air preaching early in 1739, and the same year gave his sanction to lay-preaching, to the disgust of his High Church brother Samuel. In 1740 he broke with the Moravians, on what he regarded as doctrinal points, and from that time the two parties were in undisguised, and even bitter, hostility. Before the year was ended he had also broken with Whitfield, the result of which was a division of the new religionists into two permanently distinct bodies, though after a while the two men themselves renewed their personal friendship.

From that time his whole life was spent in hard labour for the consolidation of his new Society. He rode 40, 50, even 60 miles a day, reading as he rode, and preaching sometimes five times a day. Towards the end of his life he exchanged horseback for a chaise, and not the severest weather ever hindered him. His journals are filled with graphic accounts of his preachings. We extract his account of his visit to his native Epworth: "Sunday, June 6th, 1742. A little before the services began I went to Mr. Rowley, the curate, and offered to assist him, either by preaching or reading prayers. But he did not choose to accept of my assistance. The church was exceedingly full in the afternoon, a rumour being spread that I was to preach. After sermon, John Taylor stood in the churchyard, and gave notice as the people were coming out—"Mr. Wesley, not being permitted to preach in the church, designs to preach here at six o'clock." Accordingly by six o'clock I came, and found such a congregation as I believe Epworth never saw before. I stood near the east end of the church upon my father's tombstone, and said, 'The Kingdom of God is not meat and drink, but righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost.' Friday, the 11th, I preached again at Epworth, on Ezekiel's vision of the resurrection of the dry bones. And great indeed was the shaking among them; lamentation and great mourning were heard; God bowing their hearts, so that on every side, as with one accord, they lifted up their voice and wept aloud. Saturday, the 12th, I preached on the righteousness of the Law and the righteousness of Faith. While I was speaking, several dropped down as dead, and among the rest such a cry was heard of sinners groaning for the righteousness of faith as almost drowned my voice. But many of these soon lifted up their heads with joy and broke into thanksgiving, being assured they now had the desire of their souls, the forgiveness of their sins.'

In 1750 Wesley married Mrs. Vizelle, a widow with four children, having not long before written a tract recommending celibacy. The marriage was a most unhappy one. He had stipulated that he was not to preach or travel less, but his wife became dissatisfied at his continual absences, and was even jealous. He had a high opinion of marital authority and wrote to her to know him and know herself. "Suspect me no more, asperse me no more, provoke me no more. Do not any longer contend for the mastery; be content to be a private, insignificant person, known and loved by God and me," etc. In consequence she several times left him, and was induced to come back. But at length he besought her no more. "Non em reliqui, non dimisi, non revocabo" he wrote ["I did not desert her, I did not dismiss her, I will not recall her"]. She died ten years later, in 1771.

Wesley himself lived twenty years longer, keeping up his indefatigable labours till the last. The amazing amount of work he got through could only be accomplished by the most rigid economy of time, and resolution in the use of it, under a strain that would have broken most men down; but his health only failed about three years before his death. In spite of this he still rose at four o'clock in the morning, and preached and travelled as usual until the Wednesday before his death, when he preached for the last time at Leatherhead, in Surrey. On Friday symptoms appeared which left little doubt as to the end, and the next four days were mainly occupied by him in praising God. He died about ten o'clock on the morning of Tuesday, March 2nd, 1791, in the 85th year of his age, and after lying in state in his ministerial robes at his chapel in City Road, was interred there on March 9th.

Westminster Abbey.—It is supposed that Sebert, King of the East Saxons, built a Church on the site of the present abbey some time during the seventh century, and this would seem probable, as his grave has always been shown there. In its neighbourhood sprang up a monastery founded by Edgar, the site of which in those days was insular, through the stream which, running down from the Hampstead hills, forked off into a delta, the one branch falling into the river on the site of Millbank Prison, the other near Whitehall. It was known as Thorn Ey, or the Isle of Thorns, and was afterwards called Westminster, to distinguish it from the Cathedral of St. Paul, which was the Eastminster. This structure was destroyed by the Danes in the ninth century. It was rebuilt by Edward the Confessor between the years 1055 and 1065, but of his work little now remains beyond the Pyx-house, which lies to the south of the present abbey, adjoining the chapter-house. It was dedicated to St. Peter, and consecrated on the feast of Christmas, 1065, in the presence of King Edward and many of his nobles; he died five days after, and was buried in the Abbey Church, which he had rebuilt. His tomb is one of the most conspicuous objects in the building. From that time the Abbey became to the English people the most sacred spot in the country, as, groaning under the rule of the Norman conquerors, they looked back to the days of the Confessor as the golden age. On the first anniversary of the consecration, namely on Christmas Day, 1066, William of Normandy was crowned king of the nation which he had conquered. Since him, all the Sovereigns of England have been crowned there. Edward I. brought the famous coronation stone from the Abbey of Scone, and had the coronation chair made which covers it, and on which the Sovereign is still crowned.

Henry III. built most of Westminster Abbey as it now stands; he pulled down the greater part of the Confessor’s work, and erected a chapel to the Virgin at the east end in 1220. The Abbey was completed in 1285, in the reign of Edward I. The western parts of the nave and aisle were erected between 1340 and 1483. Henry VII. rebuilt the Lady Chapel of Henry III., and it is called after his name; it stands behind the head of the cross, in the form of which the abbey is constructed. With the exception of the two western towers, the upper parts of which were built by Sir Christopher Wren, Westminster Abbey remains in outward aspect much as Henry VII. left it. Inside, the Abbey is at once imposing and inspiring; it was at one time the burial-place of the English kings, and now it is a mark of national honour to be buried there. The chapel of Edward the Confessor contains his shrine, and the altar-tombs of Edward I., Henry III., Henry V., and Edward III. In Henry VII.’s Chapel, Henry himself, Edward VI., James I., Charles II., William and Mary, Queen Anne, Georges I. and II. were buried, and in the aisles adjoining are buried Mary and Elizabeth, and Mary, Queen of Scots. This is the Chapel of the Order of the Bath. Poets’ Corner, which forms the most southern portion of the arm of the cross, contains memorials to the most eminent British poets; here, too, are the graves of Chaucer, Dryden, Dickens, Handel, Sheridan, Campbell, Garrick, Samuel Johnson, Macaulay, etc. In other parts are the tombs of Pitt, Fox, Chatham, Wilberforce, Livingstone. The monuments in the north transept have caused that part to be called “Statesmen’s Corner.” In the north aisle behind the choir is “Musicians’ Corner,” with the graves of Purcell, Croft, Blow, Bennett, and others. At the west end of the south aisle is “New Poets’ Corner,” with monuments to Keble, Wordsworth, Kingsley, Maurice, and others. South of the Abbey are the cloisters, which also contain many graves of interest, and the architecture of which is exquisitely beautiful.

The Abbey, as the name implies, was a monastery ruled by an abbot. The present Deanery, Cloisters, Chapter-house, and other adjacent buildings, form part of what was once this great Benedictine Abbey. The Abbots of Westminster were mitred, and of almost as much dignity as bishops, ranking only second to those of St. Albans. Like Holyrood, this Abbey was enclosed within the precincts of the Royal Palace. Not even the Archbishop could officiate in the Abbey without his leave except at a Coronation. Until 1642 the Regalia were kept here, and though they are now lodged in the Tower, they are placed under the care of the Dean before a Coronation. On the Dissolution of the Monasteries by Henry VIII., a monk of Westminster lived seventy years longer, dying at the age of ninety at the village of Westmeon, Hants, quite blind, reverently tended by a Roman Catholic gentleman there.

Westminster is, like Windsor, a Royal Peculiar; it has a Dean (whose income is £2,000 per annum), an archdeacon, six canons, and six minor canons. For a short time only was it under a bishop. Bishop Thirlby was consecrated in 1540, and remained Bishop of Westminster, which included all Middlesex except Fulham, for ten years, when he was translated to Norwich.

The Memorials of this Abbey, by Dean Stanley, is one of the most delightful works in the language. The daughter of Dean Bradley has also written a very charming handbook.

Westminster Assembly. [Assembly, Westminster.]

Westminster Confession.—A confession of faith drawn up by the Westminster Assembly, and completed Dec. 4th, 1646, adopted by the Scotch Church in 1647, and by the Long Parliament in 1648. It is based upon the Scriptures, and upon the Irish Articles drawn up by Archbishop Ussher in 1615. [Protestant Confession, par. 12.] The Presbyterian Church of Scotland has in 1874 made additions to it on the doctrines of Redemption, Divine Decrees, Man's Total Depravity, Salvation of Infants, and Civil Magistrates. The Westminster Confession has also been adopted, with modifications, by the Baptists and by the Welsh Methodists. It is reckoned to be the best existing Calvinistic Confession.

Westminster School.—It would appear that a school was attached to the Abbey of St. Peter's from its first foundation, but we have very few trustworthy notices left to show us the character of that institution. Dean Stanley, in his Memorials of Westminster Abbey, after describing the cloisters, adds: "In the north cloister, close by the entrance of the church, where the monks usually walked, sate the prior. In the western cloister sate the 'Master of the Novices' with his disciples. This was the first beginning of Westminster School." But the actual greatness of the school dates from no earlier period than the reign of Henry VIII. and his daughter Elizabeth. Henry, out of the revenues of the Abbey which he had seized, provided a certain endowment for the newly created Chapter, but charged its revenue with the maintenance of a master and scholars. Elizabeth gave form to her father's scheme, settled statutes for the school, and arranged for the yearly election of the Queen's scholars to the two royal colleges of the Trinity, at Cambridge, and Christ Church, Oxford. These statutes constituted an "archidiaconus" and an "hypodidascalus" (as they learnedly designate the master and under-master), forty Queen's scholars and eighty "pensionarii," "oppidani," and "peregrini," as members of the school. The whole charge of the school fell on the income of the Dean and Chapter, and continued to do so until the new scheme was put in force by the Royal Commission of 1862. Until this time the nomination of boys as King's or Queen's scholars rested with the Dean as members of the Chapter, but now admission to the college is gained only by competitive examination; the competition is open to those who have been at the school at least twelve months and are under fifteen years of age. The Queen's scholars, who now number forty, live together in college, and are distinguished by cap and gown and white neck cloth; in the Abbey they wear white surplice as being part of the foundation of the Collegiate Church. Since 1872 the studentships at Oxford and the scholarships at Cambridge have been thrown open to competition among the whole school. The College Hall, where the scholars dine, was originally the refectory of the abbot's house, and dates from the reign of Edward III.; it is said to have been built by the same Nicholas Littlington to whom the Jerusalem Chamber and a great part of the deanery are ascribed. On each side are two long tables of chestnut wood, taken from the wreck of one of the vessels belonging to the Spanish Armada. The schoolroom was originally the dormitory of the monks. Many of the customs are still kept up in the school: for instance, Latin prayers are used at the beginning and end of school. The prayers are said by the captain of the school and three monitors in turn, each taking a week; the model kneels in the centre of the school, with his face turned to the east, the headmaster, the usher, and the other masters kneeling in full behind him.

At Westminster School there is a custum which dates from its very foundation, and is prescribed in the statutes of its royal foundress of performing before Christmas a play from Terence or Plautus. There are now added to the performance a prologue and epilogue, as in Latin, the former recounting the events of interest to the school during the past twelve months, the latter satirising the political and social events of the day.

The nearness of the school to the Court of Whitehall, and the fame of its teachers, mad Westminster for two centuries after its foundation the chosen seminary of the English nobles. Its numbers increased from 200 boys under Dr. Busby, to twice that number in the next century, and remained over 300 so late as 1814. From that time onward the school rapidly wasted away, and was likely to have fallen into entire decay had not fresh blood and new measures been introduced. The reason for this decay are not far to seek: the disadvantage of a school buried in old and highly unsuitable buildings in the heart of an ever growing city; the rivalry of Eton and Harrow the great growth of modern schools of large size and resources; and, last but not least, the conservative spirit and nature of the teaching maintained at Westminster, and the entire dependence of the school on the bounty and enterprise of the Abbey Chapter, are among the more obvious. Nor could the system which confined the selection of the candidates for the headmastership to those educated at Westminster fail to be a source of weakness to a declining school. It may, however, fairly be hoped that the separation of the school from the Abbey, and its independent endowment, however much to be regretted for sentimental reasons, will prove of lasting benefit.

Amongst the famous scholars of Westminster who may name William Camden, Ben Jonson, Dryden, George Herbert, Cowper, Southey, Cowley, Gibbon, Froude, Sir Christopher Wren, John Locke, Horne Tooko, Warren Hastings, etc.

Wetstein, John James, was born at Basle in 1693, died at Amsterdam in 1754. His uncle was a famous professor of divinity in that town, and John received most of his early education under him; while Buxtorf taught him Hebrew. In 1713 he was admitted into the Church, and from that time devoted his life to the study of one subject—the genuineness and authenticity of the commonly received text of the Greek Scriptures. He visited most of the countries in Europe in order to examine MSS. in the different libraries. He was in England for this purpose three times; and once, in 1720, was employed by Bentley, who himself published an edition of the Greek Testament. In 1730 Wetstein published Prolegomena to a new edition of the Greek text, which created so much stir and dissatisfaction amongst the clergy of Switzerland that the author was obliged to leave the country. He settled in Amsterdam, where he obtained the post of Professor of Philosophy and History at one of the universities. The Basle Senate offered to allow him to return, but he refused. His edition of the Greek Testament, on which he had spent many years of study and research, appeared two years before his death. It is very rare now, but in spite of some errors is valuable to the student.

Wette, Wilhelm Martin Leberecht, one of the most brilliant theologians of modern Germany, was born at Ulla, near Weimar, in 1780, died at Basle in 1849. He was educated at Jena University, and in 1807 became Extraordinary Professor of Philosophy at Heidelberg, and two years later Professor of Theology. In 1810 he was made professor at the new university of Berlin, but was deprived of his post nine years after on account of a letter which he had written to the mother of Karl Ludwig Sand, an Erlangen student who had murdered August von Kotzebue. In this letter De Wette, though he blamed the murderer, said that the crime was due to patriotism, and therefore was not so bad as had been stated. On his ejection from Berlin he went to Weimar, and in 1822 was called to be Professor of Theology at Basle. He became Rector of the University in 1849, but died the same year.

De Wette was the author of Contribution to the Introduction to the New Testament [1805], Contribution to the Introduction to the Old Testament [1806], Commentary on the Psalms [1811], Commentary on the Expiatory Death of Jesus Christ [1814], Compendium of Christian Dogmatics [1813], Christian Ethics [1827], Religion, its Essence and Formal Manifestations [1827], Essence of Christian Faith [1848], etc.

De Wette is one of the leaders of the modern Rationalistic school of Germany. Thus he denied the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch, assigning Genesis to the time of David, Deuteronomy to that of Josiah. He also denied the Messianic character of the Psalms, further than holding that Christianity answered to the ideal future which the prophets set forth. Of miracles he spoke somewhat doubtfully, but settled down to the conviction that, though not historically true, they were symbolic of truth. Of Christianity as a practical system he always spoke with enthusiasm, as well as of the character and person of Christ. In fact, he adopted as his own view the expression of the Apostle, that there is no salvation but in the Name of Jesus Christ, and Him crucified, which he interpreted as the assertion that all nobility of character, all spiritual health, lies in the formation in each man of the Christ-spirit of self-sacrifice.

Whately, Richard, Archbishop of Dublin [b. 1787, d. 1863].—One of the leaders of popular religions thought in this century. His father was a Prebendary of Bristol, and Richard was the youngest of a large family. He was entered at Oriel College, Oxford, in 1805, and became a Fellow in 1811. There, in union with Davison, the author of Discourses on Prophecy, and Copleston, then Provost of Oriel, afterwards Bishop of Llandaff, he founded what is known as the “Early Oriel School.” To this school belonged Arnold, who came as a youthful scholar of Corpus in 1815; Hampden, afterwards Bishop of Hereford; and for a short time J. H. Newman. Keble was a Fellow of Oriel at the time, but always stood aloof from this society. To these names is to be added that of Dr. Hawkins, who succeeded Copleston as Provost in 1828, and held the post until 1882—a man of powerful influence in his time, who, surviving his fellows, still maintained their liberal principles even when the potent influence of Newman was at its height. The most popular writer of the school was Whately. The best of his writings was probably his Historic Doubts Respecting Napoleon Bonaparte [1819], a clever pamphlet in which he reduces to absurdity the dictum of Hume of the incredibility of miracles in spite of any evidence.
Whately, by analysing the evidence for the existence of Bonaparte, gravely professes to maintain that no such person ever existed. In 1822 he was Bampton Lecturer, and took for his subject On the Use and Abuse of Party Feeling in Religion. In 1825 he wrote his essays On Some Irregularities of the Christian Religion, and in 1828 a series On Some Difficulties in the Writings of St. Paul. The object of this work was to show that the common Evangelical doctrines of Election, Final Perseverance, Assurance, Imputed Righteousness were not Pauline; that they had grown up in the Christian Church from various sources, and were shaped in such a way as to fit with certain perversions of Pauline language. All this while he was entirely under the influence of Copleston, the real master-mind of the Early Oriel School, who led him firmly on into Liberalism both in Church and State, and into strong independence of judgment. The new men were called "Noetics," from their supposed claim to superior mental penetration, and they were regarded with something like dismay by the older members of the University. In 1820 Arnold left Oriel, but afterwards returned to Oxford as Professor of History [1841]. In 1831 Whately became Archbishop of Dublin. Though the appointment gave great offence to the clergy, who disliked Whately's strong Liberalism, the choice proved by no means an unwise one. Whately, staunch Protestant as he was, won the confidence of the Roman Catholics by his fairness and impartiality, and the system of education which he so strenuously promoted was wise and popular.

Whately was not a theologian, nor a deep thinker. But he was wonderfully clear and lucid in style. His theology was entirely of the school of Paley, and opposed to that of Coleridge and the Platonists. Christianity with him rested on external evidence, not on any internal teaching. Doctrines to be believed must be proved from Scripture, which is authoritative, and can command belief in matters of which we should otherwise have no cognisance. Whately was a determined opponent of the Tracts for the Times, denying Apostolical Succession and the authority of the Church.

Whichcote, Benjamin, one of the most eminent of the "Cambridge Platonists," was born at Stoke in Shropshire in 1610, died in 1683. He was educated at Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and elected a Fellow there in 1633. He soon became a famous Tutor, and, after his ordination, was appointed one of the University preachers. In 1659 he took his degree of D.D., and soon after accepted the living of Milton, and was also made Provost of King's College. At the Restoration he was deprived of this last piece of preferment, the Government objecting not so much to the man himself or his politics, as to allowing any one who had been appointed under the Commonwealth to keep a position of importance. He was presented to St. Anne's, Blackfriars, which he kept until his church was burned down in the Great Fire of 1666. Two years later he became Rector of St. Lawrence Jewry, which he held till his death in 1683. He wrote very few books, and his influence, which was very great, was exerted rather by his sermons and speeches than in any other way. Some of these were published after his death, one volume of sermons being edited by the Earl of Shaftesbury; and the same collection appeared many years after in Edinburgh. Dr. Campbell collected the whole of his works, and published them in the middle of the eighteenth century. "He stood," writes Principal Tulloch, "at the head of the Cambridge thought of his time. Men like Smith and Cudworth and More and Tillotson looked back to him as their intellectual master."

Whiston, William, was born in 1667, at Norton in Leicestershire, where his father was rector, and died in 1752. He was educated by his father till he was seventeen, and then became the pupil of Mr. Anthrobus of Tamworth. In 1686 he entered Clare College, Cambridge, where he chiefly studied mathematics and the Cartesian philosophy. He took his degree in 1690, was elected a Fellow, and ordained in 1693. He became chaplain to Dr. More, Bishop of Norwich, and in 1698 was made Vicar of Lowestoft in Suffolk. He had become acquainted with Sir Isaac Newton, who in 1703 caused him to be appointed his successor to the Lucasian Chair at Cambridge. He also undertook clerical duties; but his views gradually changed, till he openly declared himself to be an Arius, and also rejected infant baptism. He was, in 1719, expelled from his Professorship and from the University, his writings were censured in the Lower House of Convocation in 1711, and in 1713 he was accused of heresy before the Dean's Court of St. Paul's; but after the proceedings had been prolonged for two years he was acquitted, and was allowed to remain formally a member of the Church of England. He was, however, preached against by many clergy, at whose head was Dr. Sacheverell, who also refused him communion. In 1720 he was proposed as a member of the Royal Society, but refused admittance by his former friend, Sir Isaac Newton. Whiston, who was a vain man, ascribed the refusal to jealousy of his scientific genius. He spent the rest of his time in retirement in London, formed a religious society at his house, occasionally gave lectures, and carried on scientific studies. His chief works were: Theory of the Earth, containing very peculiar notions as to the Deluge; Primitive Christianity Restored; several scientific works, and a translation of Josephus, the only one which lasted any long period.

Whitaker, William [b. 1548, d. 1595], Regius Professor of Divinity at Trinity College, Cambridge [1579]; Chancellor of St. Paul's [1580], and master of St. John's [1586]. He wrote many works on behalf of Protestantism and Calvinism; as—A Disputation on Holy Scripture against the Papists, especially Bellarmine and Stapleton [1588], and An Answer to the Ten Reasons of Edward Campion the Jesuit [1581], both of which were written in Latin, but have been translated into English.

Whitby, Daniel, D.D. [b. at Rushden, Northamptonshire, 1638; d. at Salisbury, 1726].—An English divine. He entered Trinity College, Oxford, 1653; took his M.A. degree, 1660; was elected a Fellow of the College, 1664; made chaplain to the Bishop of Salisbury, and afterwards Precentor of the Cathedral in 1672; and in the same year he was presented to the Rectory of St. Edmund's, Salisbury. He published from time to time a series of attacks on Romanism: The Absurdity and Idolatry of Host Worship, Romish Doctrines not from the Beginning, etc.; and also appeared as a defender of the Dissenters in his Protestant Reconciler himself humbly pleading for condescension to Dissenting brethren in things indifferent. The book was attacked on all sides, and condemned by the University of Oxford to be publicly burnt; and Whitby was obliged to recant his opinions, with an apology for the heresy. He also published a second part of the Protestant Reconciler, with an appeal to the Dissenters to rejoin the Established Church. The next turn which he took was a publication of an Arminian work: A Discourse on the Five Points of Calvinism, His Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament, published in two folio volumes in 1703, was long regarded as a valuable work. In D'Oyly and Mant's Bible it is largely drawn upon. But it is now looked on as of little worth, either as regards scholarship or devotional feeling. He is continually protesting, in a sort of nervous and excited manner, against Arminianism, and in 1714 he adopted Arian views, and published Dissertatio de S. Scripturarum Interpretatione, which involved him in a controversy with the Trinitarians. To the end of his life he continued to uphold Arminianism, and to write repeated attacks on Popery. He is said to have been a very lovable man in personal life.

Whitby, Synod of.—By the middle of the seventh century the Irish Church, through the exertions of its workers, had become so powerful that the clergy of England deferred to the judgments of its bishop rather than to those of the Pope. Oswy's Queen, Eanfleda, daughter of Edwin and Ethelburga, brought with her from Kent the Roman way of calculating Easter, while her husband's household adhered to the custom of St. Columba. This led to disputes between those of the clergy who had been ordained by the Scots, and the disciples of Augustine and Paulinus; and a few years before the arrival of Theodore, a famous council was held on this question at the Abbey of Whitby in 664. Agilbert, a French prelate, who was now Bishop of Dorchester, was the leader of one party; and Colman, Bishop of Lindisfarne, was speaker of the other. Agilbert, however, retired to France, and deputed Wilfrid, a young Northumbrian priest, who had passed some years in study at Rome and Lyons, to plead for the rule of Italy and France. Oswy, who presided at this council, after listening in turn to Colman and Wilfrid, one of whom traced his practice to St. John, the other to St. Peter, on hearing the text, "Thou art Peter, and I will give to thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven," stopped the debate. "Is it true, Colman," he said, "that our Lord spoke these words to Peter?"—"Most true."—"But can you prove that any such power was given to your Saint Columba?"—"We cannot."—"Then," said the King, "I dare not withstand this door-keeper of heaven, but must obey his rule, lest, when I come to that door and ask for entrance, he should refuse to turn the key." The assembly of earls and commoners decided that it would be expedient to leave the erroneous calculation and adopt the better. It is most likely that the influence of the Queen had previously persuaded Oswy to take the part he did. It was unfortunate in its result, as it gave offence to Colman, a plain sincere Christian, who shortly after resigned his bishopric, and retired, with the greater part of his Scottish monks and clergy, to a monastery in Ireland.

White Brethren.—Christian hermits who arose in Italy among the Alps in the fourteenth century. They were called "White Brethren," "Albati," or "Bianchi," from their garments of white linen, which reached to their feet, and covered all their faces except their eyes. They were headed by a priest, whose name and nationality are unknown, who, with a crucifix in his hand, led them down into the Italian plains in 1399. He called himself the prophet Elias, and called on the people to follow him to a crusade to regain the Holy Land from the Turks. Not only the peasants, but priests and cardinals enrolled themselves under his banner, till his followers are said to have numbered forty thousand. They marched from city to city, singing hymns, and daily increasing, till Pope Boniface feared they would attack the Popedom, and sent out a band of troops, which met the pilgrims at Viterbo, seized the leader, and dispersed the others. The priest was put to death as a heretic at Rome about the year 1403.
White, Henry Kirke, Christian poet [b. at Nottingham, 1785; d. at Cambridge, 1806]. He was the son of a butcher, and destined to follow his father's trade, but was afterwards sent to an attorney's office, and, while there, with very little help, he studied Latin and Greek and other branches of education. At the age of fourteen he wrote for several periodicals, and in 1802 published a volume of poems, which, however, met with very little attention, but procured him the notice of Southey. At this time a great change took place in him: he had indulged a leaning towards infidelity, but now he became ardently impressed with the truth of Christianity, and devoted all his powers towards getting to Cambridge and being educated for the Church. In 1804 he succeeded in getting a scholarship at St. John's College, and for two years he studied with wonderful perseverance, and gained a First Class in 1806. But the strain proved too much, and he died that year of consumption. Southey published a selection of his prose writings and poems under the title of The Remains of Henry Kirke White. Some of his hymns are popular, but his literary merits have probably been exaggerated owing to the circumstances of his early death.

White, Joseph Blanco (b. 1775, d. 1841), a remarkable theological writer, was of Irish descent, but a Spaniard by two generations, and was born in the Roman Catholic faith in Seville, unfortunately for him the most bigoted and ascetic town in Spain. From his tenderest years he was subjected to monastic discipline, his parents' object being to "make him religious and in perfect deference to the priest who directed the conscience of the family." But the child was unfit for such discipline, being exceedingly shy and sensitive, and he has put on record the mental agonies he suffered at the confessional, and the terror which haunted him for years, because he had been ashamed to confess the hideous crime of robbing a bird's nest. In due course, though his heart hardly went with him, he took orders in the Roman Church, but from the first Reason disturbed the supremacy of Faith, and though for a while he stilled his fears by ascetic practices, and took refuge from them in the infallibility of the Church, they rose up after suppression, and after ten years of this hot and cold fever he determined to leave Spain, though the sorrow of bidding farewell to his home ties was very poignant. He came to England and enthusiastically joined the Established Church. His devotional habits had never deserted him, and he rejoiced to believe that the Church of England was able to supply his needs, while he rejected Popery. For it was not the doctrines which are considered orthodox which had disgusted him, but the persecuting spirit of Popery and the theory of Church infallibility. The Church gladly received him as a man of ability and unblemished character, and the University of Oxford conferred on him the degree of M.A. When Whatley was appointed to the Archbishopric of Dublin he took White with him. But doubts of the tenability of his position again came upon him, and, after a twenty years' struggle, he went forth from the Archbishop's house a lonely and poor man, and again put into writing the history of his mental trials. He became a Unitarian, and for the rest of his life remained in that creed. He is described by one of their eminent members as "the most distinguished convert Unitarianism ever had." He died at Liverpool, and the Rev. J. Martineau preached a remarkably touching sermon over his grave. Interesting notices of him will be found in the second volume of Mr. Gladstone's Gleanings, and in Cardinal Newman's Apologia.

White, William, a celebrated bishop of the American Church, was born in Philadelphia in 1747, died in 1836. From a very early age he had wished to become a clergyman, and in 1770, having passed successfully through the college course at Philadelphia, he went to England, and was ordained deacon towards the end of the same year by Young, Bishop of Norwich. As soon as he had been ordained priest by the Bishop of London he returned to America, and before long the great War of Independence broke out. Unlike most of his fellow-clergy, he took part with the States against the Mother Country, and was always a strong Republican. When the war was over the few remaining clergy met to consider the state of the Church, which looked well-nigh hopeless. White published a pamphlet entitled The Case of the Episcopal Churches in the United States considered. The meeting decided that in order to save the Church there must be no further delay in procuring bishops on their side of the Atlantic, so Dr. Seabury went to England for consecration at the hands of the English bishops. But difficulties were made, and he was consecrated by the Scottish bishops. [SEABURY.] Though the American clergy acknowledged his consecration as valid, all felt that it would be better to have some others consecrated in England. So in 1780 White (who had been elected Bishop of Pennsylvania) and Provost (elected to the See of New York) went to England, and were consecrated in Lambeth Chapel, Feb. 4th, 1787, by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the Bishops of Bath and Wells and Peterborough. They arrived in New York on Easter Day, 1787. Bishop White was a wonderfully laborious and zealous prelate, and at his death had been at the head of the American Church for nearly fifty years, having consecrated in that time twenty-six bishops.
Whitfield, or Whitefield, George, one of the most celebrated of English preachers, was born at Gloucester, 1714, died in America 1770. His father was a wine merchant, and his mother kept an inn at Bristol. At the age of fifteen he had made some progress in classical studies, and while assisting his mother in her business he wrote many sermons, showing the serious impressions he already had. When eighteen years old, he entered Pembroke College, Oxford, and was formed with the body of young men who were termed “Methodists” [q.v.]. At the very early age of twenty-one, Dr. Benson, Bishop of Gloucester, “reckoned it his duty,” as he said, to ordain George Whitfield. The following Sunday he preached in the church where he was baptised, to a very large congregation, on the benefits of religious society. A complaint being made to the Bishop that fifteen people went mad after hearing that sermon, it was said that he replied “that he wished the madness might not be forgotten by next Sunday.” He took a curacy in London for two months, working indefatigably amongst soldiers and prisoners; then, after returning to Oxford for a while, he undertook work at Dummer, in Hampshire, where he catechised the children daily, read prayers twice a day, and formed the habit of dividing his day into three parts: eight hours for study and retirement, eight for meals and sleep, eight for reading prayers, catechising, and visiting. At length he decided to join the Wesleyans in America, and went to bid farewell to his friends in Gloucester, and it was on this journey that he first met with the marvellous success in preaching which was a feature in his work ever after. Large congregations flocked to hear him at Gloucester, Bath, Bristol, and Stonehouse. As his popularity increased, much opposition arose from the clergy who strongly protested against his written opinion that “his brethren should execute their auditorys oftener on the new birth.” He reached Savannah, May 7th, 1738, and preached three or four times every Sunday. He soon saw the great need of an orphan house, which he eventually built, returning several times to England to raise the necessary funds. He was ordained priest in England in 1738. Finding on Sunday, Jan. 21st, 1739, that the churches were not large enough to contain all the people who flocked to hear him, it occurred to him that open-air preaching would be an advantage; so on going to Bristol in February he carried out his idea, preaching at Kingswood to nearly 2,000 people, many of them being colliers with whom few dared to mingle. Beginning with about one hundred of these colliers at the first special service held in the open air for them, the congregation steadily increased until nearly twenty thousand eagerly listened to him at one time. He often said that the sight of such a multitude so anxiously listening to his words made him almost powerless to speak anything, but that God Himself seemed to supply the words. He went about for some time preaching to numbers of rich and poor in Wales, Gloucestershire, and Worcestershire, and on April 26th, 1739, preached for the first time in Moorfields and on Kennington Common to immense crowds. On returning to America that summer he went through Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina. In speaking of his journeyings through America, he says: “It is now the seventy-sixth day since I arrived at Rhode Island. . . . I have been enabled to preach, I think, 175 times in public. . . . I have travelled 500 miles, and gotten upwards of $700 sterling for the Georgia Orphan Homes.” He again left America for England in 1741, and, on going to preach as of old at Kennington, was amazed and saddened to find that very few would listen to him owing to his having written against Archbishop Tillotson and others who differed from him. Scarcely one hundred people listened to him at Kennington, and few of his old supporters came even to see him. He was anxious to raise money for the Homes, yet saw no opening to get the much-needed sum of £1,500. At Bristol, he was prevented from preaching in the very house he had founded there. But one or two other ministers there soon joined him in starting a school at Kingswood to promulgate Calvinistic doctrine. Open-air preaching was begun again, and large audiences gathered round him, and at Moorfields, on account of the bad weather a large shed was erected, which was called a tabernacle. He visited Essex and Suffolk also, and had immense audiences wherever meetings were held. Ten thousand heard him at one time at Brantree. In 1741 he accepted urgent invitations to visit Scotland, where he was warmly received by the Erskines. He preached at Dunfermline first, then in Edinburgh, Glasgow, Aberdeen, Dundee, Paisley, Perth, Stirling, besides smaller towns. He there gathered £500 for the Orphan Home in America, and proceeded through Wales to London. At Abercavenny he married a widow, Mrs. Jenner. Next he dared to preach at Moorfields when a fair was being held, and he writes that no fewer than one thousand letters were received by him from persons under conviction of sin, and three hundred people joined his community at once. In 1743 he again visited Scotland, and what took place in the West at Cambuslang is described thus by him: “People sat till two in the morning hearing sermons, disregarding the weather. You could scarce walk a yard but you must tread upon some either rejoicing in God for mercy received, or crying out for more. Thousands and thousands have I seen, before it was possible to catch it by sympathy, melted down under the word and power of God." At the celebation of the Holy Communion their joy was so great that they arranged for a second.
The Communion table was in the field; three tents were all surrounded with a multitude of hearsers; above twenty ministers attending to preach and assist. About this time he resigned all news of the Spaniards landing in Georgia, but he encouraged his friends by his unbounded trust in God's care for them and the Orphan Home, which faith was soon rewarded by all danger from the Spaniards being removed. In 1744, just before starting for America, he was nearly murdered in his bed by one of four men who had designs upon his life, but so little moved by resentment was he that he refused to prosecute these men, and as crowds gathered round him at Plymouth to see one who had been so nearly killed, he expressed his joy that greater opportunity was given him to draw them to seek their hap-iness in Christ. His health became affected, and after four years in America he was advised to visit the Bermudas, where he met with a hearty welcome from the English colonists.
After three months there he returned to England, where at first he met with great discouragement, but eventually an opening to preach to the great people as well as the poor was afforded him by Lady Huntingdon, who had welcomed him to her house on his arrival.
The Earl of Chesterfield and Lord Bolingbroke were amongst the brilliant audiences who so eagerly listened to him twice a week. In 1748 he paid a third visit to Scotland, meeting with every encouragement and success, and between that year and 1751, when he laboured in Ireland for a time, he travelled through almost every town in England. He returned to America after a time, but his constant travels undermined his health, and at length he succumbed to a fit of asthma at Newbury Port, in New England, on Sept. 30th, 1770. He was not quite fifty, and had spent thirty-four years in the ministry.

Whitgift, JOHN, Archbishop of Canterbury; famous for his zeal and energy in spreading the doctrines of the Reformation.
He was born at Great Grimsby in 1530,
where his father possessed a large merchant business; died at Lambeth in 1604, and was buried in Croydon parish church. His uncle, Robert Whitgift, though Abbot of a monastery, had long predicted the speedy downfall of the Church of Rome, and as John's early education was entrusted entirely to him, he naturally was influenced from the first in favour of the Reformation. In 1555
he went to Peterhouse, Cambridge, the college being at that time under the superintendence of Bishop Ridley. John Bradford, the martyr, was his tutor. He also made the acquaintance of Grindal. Cambridge learnt decidedly to the Reformation, and Whitgift had by this time become quite convinced of the truth of its doctrine. He was ordained 1560. On the accession of Queen Mary he had to hide for some time, as his life, wi-that of many of his colleagues, was in the greatest danger. From the accession Elizabeth he worked hard in the Protestation. All through his life he was remarkfor his firmness in carrying out what he judged to be right, without reference to in-opinions of those about him. He has been accused of harshness and severity, but it must be remembered that his were perilous an xious times, when half-hearted measures were of no use. He lived for the most part in Cambridge, where he had been appointe-Regius Professor of Divinity, but his fan-as a preacher reached the Queen, who in 1565 made him one of her chaplains an Master of Trinity College. As soon as he had the power he set to work to reorganize
the government of the college, with which he had long been dissatisfied; and, as a ground work, he insisted strongly on conformity to the Established Church. In 1571 he was asked by Archbishop Parker to write a answer to a book lately published by th
Puritan Cartwright, entitled an Admonitio parliament, which violently attacked the teaching and discipline of the Reformed Church. This he did very successfully, and as a reward was made Dean of Lincoln b
the Queen in 1573, and Bishop of Worcester
in 1576. He resisted the teaching of th
Roman Catholics on the one hand, and of th Puritans on the other; in this way a great contrast to the meek and timid Archbishop Grindal. The latter was considered a dangerous man to have at the head of the Church at such a critical time, so the Queen and the Privy Council commanded him to resign, and offered the Primacy to Whitgift.
He refused to take the office while Grin
d was alive, but accepted it on his death in 1583. His first act was to insist that all the clergy should be obliged to subscribe to these three points—that the Queen was the Supreme Head of the Church; that the Common Prayer and Ordination Services contained nothing contrary to the teaching of the Bible;
that the Thirty-nine Articles agreed in all particulars with the Holy Scriptures.
His one idea all through his life was to obtain absolute uniformity of religion in England. With this in view he obtained an order from the Star Chamber to restrain the liberty of the press. Only matter was to be printed which had been licensed by the Archbishop of Canterbury or the Bishop of London, or their chaplains. It was in consequence of this that the famous Martin Marprelate Controversy [q.v.] took place. His private character was estimable, and he was much respected by learned men, as may be seen from the dedication to him both of Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity and Stow's Annals. He was exceedingly liberal, built and endowed a Whitern, or Candida Casa, Bishopric or.—This was the See of a border district which was evangelised by St. Ninian in the beginning of the fifth century. Alongside of the kingdom of Northumbria, which extended from the Humber to the Forth, there was also a kingdom of Cumbria or Strathclyde, a district inhabited by the southern Picts, and extending from the Mersey to the Clyde. The Venerable Bede says of St. Ninian, native of North Wales who converted the southern Picts, and became their first bishop, "This holy man ... Yeowell 118 ... Roman arms." He was "indisputably," according to Stubbs and Haddan, the founder of this See, "and within a few years subsequent to A.D. 400." But nothing is known of the diocese, or of St. Ninian's successors, until the Saxon conquest brought hither a Saxon bishop nearly three hundred years afterwards. Before the Saxon Conquest the old British diocese appears to have been absorbed into that of Glasgowl, but in A.D. 685 Egfrith formed the southern portion of that great diocese into a new district under the old name, just as Hexham had been recently formed out of the northern part of the great diocese of York. There were six bishops of Candida Casa in about a century, the last dying in A.D. 791; but when Galloway was reunited to Scotland, Whitern ceased to be an English diocese, and became part of the Scottish diocese of Galloway. Cumberland and Lancashire eventually became part of York diocese, until the foundation of the See of Carlisle in 1152.

The following were the Bishops of Whitern:

Whitsunday.—The common English name for the Feast of Pentecost, celebrating the gift of the Spirit and the foundation of the Christian Church on earth. The derivation of the word has been the subject of much dispute. Three solutions have been offered, but there is a certain amount of doubt about each of them. The most common is that the word was originally spelt "White Sunday," and was so called because in the early Church the catechumens were baptised on that day, and that their white garments gave name to the festival. But when it is noticed that the Prayer Book speaks of Whitsun Week, Whitsun Monday, and not Whit Monday, this derivation hardly holds good. Others derive it from the German Pfingsten—"Pentecost," and say that though some of the links in the chain are missing, the word through various changes has come to Whitsunday. The other solution is suggested by an old poem, probably written about the fourteenth century, in which the writer evidently takes for granted that Whit is a corruption of Wit or Wisdom—

"This day Whitsunday is said,
For wisdom and wit severe said,
Was given to the Apostles as the day."

Whitsun-farthings, called also smoke farthings, the offerings formerly made by every one at Whitsuntide who lived in a house with a chimney, to the cathedral of the diocese in which he lived.

Wiccelius or Witzel, George [b. 1501, d. 1573], was educated and ordained in the Roman Church, but adopted the Reformed religion, for which he was driven from his charge in 1526. He was appointed pastor of Niemcck, but relapsed into Romanism, and was expelled in 1530. He helped to draw up the Augsburg Interim. He lived at Fulda from 1540-54, and then, on the spread of the Reformation, withdrew to Mayence, where he died. He wrote Typus ecclesiae prioris, and Querola pacis.

Wichern, Johann Heinrich, Christian philosopher, was born at Hamburg in 1808, died there in 1881. He studied theology at the Universities of Göttingen and Berlin, and soon after started the institution in his native town which has made his name famous. Dr. Schaff says that he is the representative of practical philanthropic Christianity in Germany—a title which he deserves, as will be seen when some account of his efforts has been given. His first work was to institute a Free Sunday-school in the town, which in a short time numbered over 500 scholars. But his greatest achievement was the foundation of what he called his Rhathes Haus. Here he received boys who had been left quite destitute, kept and cared for them; had them taught some useful trade, and then sent them to make their way in the world. It is, in fact, managed very much on the same plan as Dr. Barnardo's Homes in England. He was also one of the leaders of the movement still doing much work in Germany under the name of the Innere Mission, the object of which is to fight against the heathenism and irreligion still prevalent amongst the lower classes of the large towns. Wichern was offered many posts of honour, but refused them all, and contented himself with superintending the Rauhes Haus [Rough House] to the end of his life, and with editing the paper called Fliegende Blätter, the organ of the Mission. He died at Hamburg, having been helpless from paralysis for nearly ten years.

Wilcliffe. [Wycliffe.]

 Widows of the Church.—Widows who made public profession of their intention to continue in widowhood were, if they satisfied certain conditions, enrolled in an Order which went by this designation. These conditions were that they should have been widows for some years, and should have lived without reproach, ruling their own households well. A special place was assigned to them in the Churches, and if need so required they were supported out of Church revenues.

Wilberforce, Henry William [b. 1809, d. 1873], son of William Wilberforce. He graduated with high honours at Oriel College, Oxford, in 1830. He was vicar of East Farleigh, but in 1853 became a member of the Roman Catholic Church, in which communion he died at Woodchester, in Gloucestershire. In early life he gained some celebrity as author of An Essay on the Parochial System of the Church. For some years after his secession he was proprietor and editor of the Catholic Standard, subsequently called the Weekly Register. He was a man of great intellectual power, and deeply beloved by his friends. Cardinal Newman wrote a very touching obituary notice of him.

Wilberforce, Robert Isaac, second son of William Wilberforce, was born in 1802, died in 1857. He entered Oriel College, Oxford, as a commoner in 1819, and took his degree with a double first-class in 1823. He was elected Fellow of his college, became Public Examiner in 1830, and Select Preacher in 1849. He was vicar of East Farleigh, removing in 1850 to Burton Agnes, in Yorkshire, when he became Archdeacon of the East Riding. In 1854 he went over to the Church of Rome, and spent almost all the rest of his life in Italy. He died at Albano on his way to the English College at Rome for re-ordination. Two works of his written in the English Church have won a permanent place in our theology, namely, the treatise on The Incarnation of the Son of God, and On the Holy Eucharist: The Principles of Church Authority was written to vindicate his adoption of the Roman faith, and two other interesting volumes of his are The Five Empires and Rutulus, a tale of the early Church.

Wilberforce, Samuel, D.D., Bishop successively of Oxford and Winchester, was the third son of William Wilberforce, born at Broomfield House, Clapham Common, Sept. 7th, 1805; died July 19th, 1873, from a fall from his horse while riding on the Surrey hills near Dorking. He commenced his education at Edgbaston, near Birmingham, and then entered as a Commoner at Oriel College, Oxford, that time enjoying a great reputation under Copleston, afterwards Bishop of Llandaf. While there, Wilberforce was a constant and fluent speaker at the Union Debating Society. He took his B.A. in 1826. He was ordained in 1828, and in 1830 was appointed to the living of Brightstone in the Isle of Wight. In 1841 he was promoted to the rectory of Alverstoke, near Gosport, and here he had a time as his curate Dr. Trench, the lat Archbishop of Dublin. He was already Archdeacon of Surrey, to which a canony in Winchester Cathedral was attached, and in the same year was chosen by the authorities of Oxford to deliver the Bampton Lectures the delivery of these was, however, prevented by the death of Mrs. Wilberforce. Preferences were now showered thickly on Archdeacon Wilberforce; in 1843 he was nominated one of the chaplains to the Prince Consort in 1844 he was appointed Sub-Almoner to the Deanery of Westminster, but he was not destined to stay there long, for before the close of the year he was offered the Bishopric of Oxford, and consecrated in Lambeth Chape by Archbishop Howley on St. Andrew's Day. As Bishop of Oxford he became also Canon of the Order of the Garter, for shortly before that time Windsor and St. George's Chapel had been transferred to that diocese from the see of Salisbury. In 1847 Bishop Wilberforce received also the appointment of Lord High Almoner to Her Majesty. Joining with the See of Oxford at that time was the rectory of Cuddesdon, near Oxford, and, as at Alverstoke Dr. Wilberforce had R. C. Trench, a future Archbishop, as his curate here he had Dr. Thomson, afterward Archbishop of York.

As a Bishop, Samuel Wilberforce lost no time in showing himself earnest, zealous, and indefatigable, confirming not only in the larger towns but in the village churches, mixing personally with his clergy, and stirring up their dormant energies by taking part in "special services" in Lent, in Advent, and at other sacred seasons. He was active also in preaching on behalf of new and old religious societies, which he regarded as useful handmaids to the Church, and in promoting all well-considered measures of school improvement, of Church extension, and of Church restoration. He also established, almost under his own eye, at Cuddesdon, a Training College for clergymen, in order to bridge over the years which young men who intended to take orders too often wasted, after taking their degree at Oxford and Cambridge, while not yet of canonical age for ordination as deacons.

He had not long taken his seat on the bishops' bench in the House of Lords before he began to make his presence felt there, speaking frequently on subjects in which the Church was more or less directly interested, such as the religious education of the young, the admission of Jews into Parliament, the Bill for legalising marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and the revival of the active powers of Convocation, which had been long dormant at the time of his consecration to the episcopate. In 1848 some bitter controversy was excited by the part he took in reference to the nomination of Dr. Hampden [q.v.] to the Bishopric of Hereford, and it must be confessed that the Bishop in this matter did not appear to advantage. When Lord John Russell nominated Hampden, Bishop Wilberforce joined the opponents. But suddenly he went over to the other side, and printed a sermon which he preached in favour of Hampden, and a letter in which he implied that the latter had made concessions to him. Hampden immediately published another denying this in a curt manner, and Bishop Philpotts of Exeter wrote his brother of Oxford a letter of vehement sarcasm and invective, which Wilberforce's candid biographer, Canon Ashwell, has printed. The Bishop was one of the most active opponents of the Bill passed at the instance of Lord Palmerston to enable Bishops Blomfield and Malby to resign their respective Sees. Another important controversy in which the Bishop was engaged was that on the Essays and Reviews [q.v.], and again the Bishop showed himself more versatile than discreet, and took up untenable positions, to the injury of his own reputation. In 1869 he accepted the See of Winchester on the resignation of Dr. Sumner, having been before that time engaged on the subject of clerical resignations, and become the most active promoter, if not the actual author, of the Act passed to enable aged incumbents to resign their livings, and retire on a pension when incapacitated for further work.

Bishop Wilberforce was a man of talents so great and varied as to constitute genius; his versatility, indeed, was at once his strength and his weakness; it enabled him to do everything, but it debarrd him from that complete unity and concentration of purpose which are necessary for the highest achievements. He was, however, before all things, a hard-working bishop. He was a thoroughly accomplished preacher, and it was one of his characteristics that he took as great pains and achieved as great success with the simplest village congregation as with the most distinguished audience in London. He really acted as the spiritual chief of his diocese, and did his utmost to awaken religious life in every corner of it; he was not content with acting as a mere overseer; he was its motive power, and his clergy learnt to look to him for constant encouragement and support.

In the Church at large he held a very distinct and valuable position; his early life imbued him with the religious views of the Evangelical school, and his veneration for his father would alone have been sufficient to maintain their influence in his mind throughout life. But as a man who thoroughly shared in the thoughts and feelings of Oxford, he was not likely to hold aloof from that remarkable development of thought which marked the first fifteen years of his ministry. He was in consequence regarded as belonging to the High Church school, though he always held back from the extremes of that party; but he saw that its followers were at least reviving the organisation of the Church, and he turned their principles to great account in practical administration. It says much for his moderation that, coming to his diocese just when the Tractarian storm was at its height, he guided it through the crisis without a breach with any party among his clergy. Party feeling ran high for a time, but the Bishop's manifest earnestness and the twofold sympathies which he embodied, formed a bond of union amid the discord, and he probably rendered the Church a great service by guiding and harmonising the confused movements of the day.

In Convocation he spoke with energy and fervour on all subjects connected with the Church. He was a very popular man; whatever he undertook did with grace, ease, and heartiness. As a platform orator he has rarely been equalled; in the best sense of the term he was a "many-sided" man, and into his active career, many careers, so to speak, were crowded together. He was indefatigable in work, and in the management of two very important dioceses he showed great administrative ability and energy of personal character. His was an eloquence which never failed; it shone equally in his pastoral charges, in his confirmation addresses, and in those spirit-stirring appeals which he would deliver in Cuddesdon Chapel to the candidates for Holy Orders. He excelled also as a parliamentary orator. As an author he has left us no deep theological work, but his name will be remembered for a History of the Episcopal Church in America, and by two or three charming religious allegories, the most popular of which are Agathos and The Rocky Island. His sermons are some of them models of eloquence, and the personal influence which he exerted upon those who were brought into contact with him shows him to have been a good as well as an able man.

Wilberforce, William [b. 1759, d. 1833], one of the noblest philanthropists in the history of the world, was born at Hull. He went first to the Hull Grammar School, and on his father's death in 1768 lived with an uncle at Wimbledon, who sent him to school near there. He went with his aunt to hear Whitfield's preaching, but his mother, fearing he would become a Methodist, recalled him to Yorkshire, and his education was carried on at Pocklington till he was seventeen. He then entered St. John's College, Cambridge, and remained there for three years. He resolved on entering a public life, and before he had attained his majority was elected member for his native town. William Pitt, who had already made a great mark in the House of Commons, was his intimate friend. His kindly manners and polished wit soon made him very popular in London society. In 1784, before he was twenty-five, he was chosen member for Yorkshire, a great triumph in his parliamentary career, as that seat was usually fiercely contended by the aristocracy. He took his seat in May, and entered into all the triumphs of his friend, who was now Prime Minister. In the autumn of that year he made a Continental tour, in which he was joined by his old Cambridge tutor, Isaac Milner, from whom he imbibed those earnest religious impressions which directed his actions for the remainder of his life. In 1786 he resumed his parliamentary life for awhile, but after 1787 he gave up his whole time to the great work of his life, the abolition of the slave trade. THOMAS CLARKE [q.v.] and some other Quakers had already formed an association for this purpose, and William Wilberforce soon became their foremost champion. He and Pitt discussed the subject together under a tree at Holwood, near Keston in Kent, and Wilberforce set to work to collect all possible information on the subject to lay before the House of Commons. A serious illness prevented him from attending Parliament in 1788, but in 1789, in a powerful speech lasting three and a half hours, he laid the matter before the House, but was met with decided opposition, and a long delay occurred before further steps could be taken. John Wesley wrote to him from his death-bed in 1791, encouraging him, and exhorting him not to lose heart. On April 18th in the same year, the motion came on once more, but was rejected in consequence of the resistance of vested interests. Clarkson and others then established the Sierra Leone Company, of which Wilberforce became one of the directors. George III. and the royal princes were always opposed to the movement; Pitt and Fox both supported it. In 1793 Wilberforce endeavoured to stir up the nation to its duty as regarded Christian teaching amongst the natives of our colonies, but Government could not see its way. William Carey and his associates, however, undertook the task. [CAREY, WILLIAM.] In 1797 Wilberforce published his Practical View of the Prevaling Religious Systems of Professed Christians in the Higher and Middle Classes in this Country contrasted with Real Christianity, which went through five editions in six months. In 1797 he was engaged in those discussions which two years later resulted in the formation of the Churc missionary Society. In 1798 he helped to start the Christian Observer, and also an association for the better observance of Sunday, and he gave much time and money to the formation of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The French Revolution made it impossible for a time to do any thing in furtherance of his favourite scheme and it was not till 1804 that the Abolition of Slavery Bill was first carried through the Commons; it was rejected by the Lords, an in the following year lost in the Commons on the second reading. At last, by an Order in Council in 1806, the importation of slaves to new colonies was prohibited, and in 1806 the abolition of the foreign slave trade was carried. On Feb. 23rd, 1807, his Bill, havin passed the Lords, was sent down to the Commons, and carried by a majority of 28 to 26. The Solicitor-General, Sir Samuel Romilly, carried the House by storm when in his speech which followed this triumph, he contrasted the feelings of Napoleon with those of the honoured man who would that night "lay his head upon his pillow and remember that the slave trade was no more." The Royal assent was given on March 29th. Wilberforce then sought to secure the abolition of the slave trade abroad, and, indeed the total abolition of slavery itself. In 1812 he resigned his seat for Yorkshire, and was elected to the borough of Bramber, which he held till 1825, when failing health obliged him to give up his parliamentary life. He never lost an opportunity of speaking in favour of abolition, and one country of Europe after another, and the United States, was led to abolish the slave trade. In 1823 he published an Appeal against it, and the Anti-Slavery Society was formed. In 1829 he made his last public appearance at a large meeting of Abolitionists in London, and then entrusted the cause to Sir T. Fowell Buxton. Three days before his death news was brought to Wilberforce that England was ready to pay twenty millions for the abolition of slavery. He died July 29th, 1853, and was accorded a public funeral at Westminster Abbey.

Wilfrid, Sr., Archbishop of York, was born of noble parents, and was early sent to court, where he soon became a favourite with Queen Eanifleda; following her advice, he determined to devote himself to a religious life. He spent some time at Lindisfarne under the discipline of the Scottish monks; but being dissatisfied with the simplicity of their rule, he asked and obtained permission to go to Rome, where he spent some years in study. After his return to England he became Abbot of a monastery at Ripon, and at thirty years of age was appointed to the See of York. As the primacy was vacant, Wilfrid went to France to be consecrated by Agilbert, Bishop of Paris, and did not return till about five years later, when he found St. Chad in possession of his See. The latter, however, vacated it in his favour, and Wilfrid set to work to restore the minster, which had fallen into disrepair; and he built also a minster at Hexham and one at Ripon, at the dedication of which he made a feast to King Egfrid and all the chief persons in the kingdom, which was a striking contrast to the simplicity of the former bishop, St. Chad. For some time the King and the bishops were on friendly terms; but the zeal of Wilfrid to enrich the Church, to the detriment of Egfrid's revenue, and the magnificence of his retinue and monasteries, excited the King's anger, and Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, was summoned to hear the accusations against him. He proposed that the diocese should be divided into the Sees of York, Lindisfarne, Hexham, and Whithern, but as Wilfrid would not consent to this Theodore declared him deposed, and he started for Rome to appeal to Pope Agatho, returning victorious with a letter to the King. Egfrid declared that he had bribed the Pope, and imprisoned him for nine months, first in Northumberland, then at Dunbar; being released, he went to Sussex, the most barbarous kingdom in England, which was not yet converted to Christianity, and which was suffering under a severe famine. Wilfrid first gained the friendship of the people by teaching them to fish, so that they were all the more ready to hear him when he began to preach to them. He founded a bishopric at Selsey, which was afterwards removed to Chichester. He went up the Moon Valley, in Hampshire, between the two kingdoms of Sussex and Wessex, which was inhabited by a colony of Jutes, and here he founded the church of Warnford, as an ancient inscription on the wall still testifies. The ancient church of Corhampton in the same valley was also probably built by him. About 690 Egfrid died, and Wilfrid was recalled to York; but his uncompromising manner gave offence, and he was again declared deposed. He was restored, however, after King Aldfrid's death, and died in 709 at the monastery of Oundle, which he had founded in Mercia.

Wilkins, John, Bishop of Chester [b. at Fawsley, Northamptonshire, in 1614; d. in 1672]. His father was a citizen of Oxford, but he was born at the house of his mother's father, John Dods, a noted Dissenter, and here he spent his earlier years. At the age of thirteen he entered as a student at New Inn Hall, Oxford, and afterwards Magdalen Hall. He took his B.A. in 1631, and his M.A. in 1634, and was then ordained and became successively Chaplain to Lord Say, Lord Berkeley, and Charles, Count Palatine of the Rhine, who resided in England for some time studying mathematics with Wilkins. His Puritanical principles led him in the Civil War to join with the Parliament and to uphold the Solemn League and Covenant. In 1648 the Committee for the Reformation of the University of Oxford made him Warden of Wadham College. In 1656 he married a sister of Cromwell. Richard Cromwell made him Master of Trinity College; but he was ejected at the Restoration, and, coming to London, became Preacher at Gray's Inn, and soon after Rector of St. Lawrence Jewry. In 1663 he was chosen one of the council of the Royal Society, which was then incorporated; and, through the influence of another member, Seth Ward, Bishop of Exeter, he was introduced to Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury, and was soon promoted to the deanery of Ripon, and on the death of Bishop Hall, in 1668, became Bishop of Chester. Wilkins is said to have been a man of inconstant mind and unsettled principles, ready to swear allegiance to the ruling power; but he was benevolent, and according to his biographer, Anthony Wood, "a person endowed with rare gifts, a noted theologian and preacher, a curious critic, an excellent mathematician and experimentalist, and one as well seen in mechanisms and new philosophy as any of his time." He is the author of many scientific works. Among his theological publications are: Ecclesiastes, or a Discourse on the Gift of Preaching [1646]; Discourse concerning the Beauty of Providences, in all the Rugged Passages of it [1649]; Discourse concerning the Gift of Prayer [1651], and after his death Tillotson published an unfinished treatise of his Of the Principles and Duties of Natural Religion [1673], and a volume of Sermons [1682]. He died at the house of Dr. Tillotson in Chancery Lane, and is buried in St. Lawrence Jewry.

Will.—That faculty of the soul by which it chooses or refuses anything which is offered to it. It is therefore distinct from the understanding. "I see and approve the better things," said the heathen moralist, "and I follow the worse." Herein he confessed that his will was not in accord with his intellectual faculties. Nor is the Will synonymous with the desires and appetites. These may be spontaneous and either good or bad, but other motives acting on the Will may lead it to resist them. That the Will is free is implied in the very term, "for if a man acts in any given manner because he is forced, it is no longer an action of the Will." The Will indeed is finite, because man himself is a finite being, but within the extent of its capacity it is and must be able to choose. The great question about Free Will, regarded theologically, is stated in the article on Free Will. We may put it broadly thus: according to the Roman Catholic view, man lost control of his Will by sin, and recovers it by supernatural grace conveyed in the Sacraments. The Reformers of the sixteenth century, following Augustine, held that since the Fall man is totally depraved, and can do no spiritual good save through the special grace of God, given according to God's sovereign Will.

The tendency of modern materialistic philosophy is towards what is called Determinism [q.v.], the belief that the Will depends like the physical constitution upon a chain of causes, so that all future volition might be predicted by any one who knew all the present facts. But this is in fact to blot out the soul from existence, and repeat the sinful cry which the prophets denounced, "We are delivered to do these abominations." In opposition to it is the Christian belief that we are placed in the world by the Creator for the very purpose of fighting against the sin which doth most easily beset us, and of being conquerors by His grace. Another form of Determinism is very different, that of Jonathan Edwards, who dwells upon the power of habits to enfeebles and even destroy the Will. This is the determinism of character. But neither does this fix the destiny of a human soul. The grace of God is offered to apostates and reprobates, for the very purpose of restoring the enfeebled and powerless Will. The same voice which cried to the paralytic "Rise, take up thy bed and walk," is saying to us when we are bound and enslaved by sin. "Arise and be free, shake thyself from the dust." The work of the Holy Ghost, and the grace of Christian ordinances, are perpetual miracles, a continual work of restoration to those who believe, and have faith to be healed. [Free-Will; Predestination.]

Will of God.—What God has determined from all eternity, and what must certainly come to pass, though as yet we know it not, is His secret will. What He has prescribed to us in His written Word, and in the universal conscience of mankind, is His revealed will. How shall we know that will? There are certain rules which we may rest upon concerning what we ought not to do, as well as what we ought to do. Thus: [1] We should not make our inclinations the arbiter. "Do not determine that to be truth which you wish to be so, nor make an idol of cherished anticipations," are the memorable words of a great writer of our own day. [2] We should not make our particular frames of mind the rule of our determination, nor be guided by unaccountable impulses and impressions. But there are three courses to be adopted by him who would learn the will of God.

[1] Deliberation. Our present station is to be regarded as that in which God has placed us. He may intend us to make our way out of it. But unless there is that in our present situation which we see clearly to be hostile to our soul's health, we are not to be inveterately desirous of change.

[2] Consultation. If the conviction comes irresistibly upon us that such change is needful and we have to choose a new path, then it be moves us to compare one thing with another and to act upon such maxims as these:—Of two natural evils choose the least; of two moral evils choose neither; of two moral goods choose the greater.

[3] Supposition. When Providence does not make our way immediately clear we have to abide where we are in suspense. "Stand still and see the salvation of God." We must wait upon the Lord in constant prayer avoiding temptation and shrinking from all sin; reverencing the Word of God and seeking it daily; remembering always that the highest object at which we can aim is the promotion of the glory of God.

William of Malmesbury. [Malmesbury, William OP.]

William of Wykeham, the greatest of the Bishops of Winchester, was born of obscure parents, John and Sibyl Longe, at Wickham, in Hampshire, in 1324. He was educated at Winchester School, and then became secretary to Uvedale, Lord of the Wickham Manor, through whom he was introduced to King Edward III. In 1356 he became surveyor of the castle and park at Windsor, and superintended the building of the present castle. He received the tonsure in 1356, and was ordained priest in 1362. On the death of Bishop Edyngdon in 1366, Wykeham was elected to succeed him. He had already held the Privy Seal, and now became Chancellor till 1371. He died in his eightieth year in 1404, at Bishop's Waltham. He repaired the bishop's palaces, did away with many abuses at St. Cross, founded New College, Oxford, and the Winchester School [q.v.], and restored Winchester Cathedral. His masterly work in the nave of the Cathedral stamps him as one of the greatest architects that ever lived. His benefactions to the parishes of his diocese were also very munificent.

Williams, Isaac, was born in Wales in 1802, died in 1865. He was educated at Oxford, and after his ordination held several curacies, and finally was appointed to the living of Stinchcombe, Gloucestershire, where he died. He wrote some very beautiful poetry, though he was a little too fond of using irregular and peculiar rhythm. He, with Keble and Newman, wrote the Lyra Apostolica, and was also the author of Tracts 80, 86, and 87 of the famous Tracts for the Times. Other noted poems of his are Thoughts in Past Years, The Cathedral, The Baptistry, and the Christian Scholar. In 1839 he published a book of hymns translated from the Latin, under the title of *Hymns from the Parriain Breaviary.

Williams, John, Archbishop of York, was born at Aberconway in Carnarvonshire, in 1582, died in 1650. He went to St. John's College, Cambridge, in 1598, was ordained, and became a proctor of the university. He then removed to London, and was chaplain to Lord Chancellor Egerton, upon whose death, in 1619, he was made Dean of Salisbury, whence he was in 1620 preferred to the Deanery of Westminster. In the following year he became Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, and in 1626 was consecrated Bishop of Lincoln. He soon afterwards rendered himself unpopular at court because he refused to comply with all the wishes of Buckingham, which occasioned him to lose the Great Seal, and he was ordered not to appear at the coronation of Charles I. He also angered Archbishop Laud by his opinions concerning the position of the Communion table. The dispute broke into a formal controversy, and occasioned the so-called Coal from the Alter, answered by Williams. Soon after a Bill was brought before the Star Chamber accusing him of revealing the King's secrets; he was heavily fined, and in 1636 imprisoned in the Tower. He remained there for four years, but was released by the Long Parliament in 1640. The King was reconciled to him, cancelled the records of his trial, and raised him to the Archbishopsric of York, allowing him to hold the Deanery of Westminster for three years u commendam. He only survived the King's death a year, dying at Glodded on his sixty-eighth birthday.

Williams, John, a famous Nonconformist minister [b. 1796, d. 1839] sent by the London Missionary Society to preach to the South Sea Islanders. He was born at Tottonham, and having been a short time at school was apprenticed to an ironmonger in the City Road. When he had served his time, he determined at once to fit himself as far as he could for the work of a missionary. With his wife and three other ministers he left England in November, 1816, and just a year later landed on one of the Society Islands. They succeeded in converting many of the natives to Christianity, and as a rule were treated with great kindness even by those who refused to listen to their preaching. He came to England once for a few weeks, and also paid a visit to Sydney, for the purpose of consulting a doctor about his health, which was very bad at the time, and which he was afraid would force him to give up his work. With these two exceptions he worked among the people of these islands till 1839, when he was cruelly murdered by the natives of Erromanga the first day he landed on their shores.

Williams, Roger.— A Puritan writer, and founder of the State of Rhode Island, U.S., who deserves mention as the first to publicly promulgate the doctrine of entire liberty of conscience and worship, without any qualification whatever, and to act upon it consistently through his own life in the midst of many provocations. He was born at Conwyl Caio in Wales, in 1599, was befriended and educated by Sir Edward Coke, and ordained to the ministry of the Church of England; but soon adopting Puritan views, was compelled to emigrate to America, and arrived at Boston in 1630. At this early age of thirty, as Bancroft says, "his mind had already matured a doctrine which secures him an immortality of fame. . . . In the capacious recesses of his mind he had re-volved the nature of intolerance, and he, and he alone, had arrived at the great principle which is its sole effectual remedy. He an-nounced his discovery under the simple proposition of the sanctity of conscience. The civil magistrate should restrain crime, but never control opinion; should punish guilt, but never violate the freedom of the soul. The doctrine contained within itself an entire reform of theological jurisprudence. It would blot from the statute-book the crime of nonconformity; would quench the fires that persecution had so long kept burning; would repeal every law compelling attendance on public worship; would abolish tithes and all forced contributions to the maintenance of religion; would give an equal protection to every form of religious faith."

When Williams arrived in Boston, therefore, he could not unite heartily with Churches which, in spite of their own bitter experience of persecution, violated every one of these principles nearly as much as that Church from which they had fled, and he found himself involved in hot and bitter controversy for what, to him, were the first rights of the human soul. The magistrates compelled every man to attend worship: Williams reprobated that law. They com-pelled men to maintain that worship, and demanded of Williams if the labourer was not worthy of his hire? "Yes," he replied, "from them that do hire him and from no other." Magistrates themselves were to be chosen from church-members; he said this was as proper as to select a doctor or pilot for his skill in theology. And so on every point. Such views could not but give deep offence, and in 1835 he was summoned to Boston to stand examination on his grand principle that "the civil power has no jurisdiction over the conscience," and was actually threatened by the one-time fugitives with transportation back to England! To avoid this he fled to the territory of Narraganset, where he purchased land for himself and a few companions, calling the new settlement Providence, and engaging specially in mission-work among the Indians, with whom he acquired greater influence than any other man of the time.
Owing to this he was enabled on two occasions to save the colony which had cast him out from Indian attacks, being on one of these occasions applied to for such assistance, and never manifesting the least bitterness, or being led into the least act of retaliation. His later years were chiefly occupied in preaching to the Indians, in which he engaged till nearly his eightieth year. He died at the age of eighty-four, in 1688, the neighbouring colonies refusing to the last to admit his State into their league, in spite of the services he had rendered them.

Williams' chief work is, The Bloody Tenet of Persecution for the Cause of Conscience Dis-cussed, followed later by The Bloody Tenet yet more Bloody by Mr. Cotton's endeavour to wash it white in the Blood of the Lamb. He refused to persecute Quakers like the other Puritans, but disputed with them, writing a tract called George Fox digged out of his Burrowes. He also wrote a Key to the Languages of America, and other works of less importance.

The following additional remarks of Bancroft are worth quoting: "He was the first person in modern Christendom to assert in its plenteous the doctrine of the liberty of conscience, the equality of opinions before the law; and in its defence he was the harbinger of Milton, the precursor and superior of Jeremy Taylor. For Taylor limited his toleration to a few Christian sects: the philanthropy of Williams compassed the earth. Taylor favoured partial reform, commended lenity, argued for forbearance, and entered a special plea in behalf of each tolerable sect; Williams would permit persecution of no opinion, of no religion, leaving heresy unharmed by law, and orthodoxy unprotected by the penalties of penal statutes. Taylor still clung to the necessity of positive regulations enforcing religion and eradicating error, and he resembled the poets, who in their folly first declare their hero to be invulnerable and then clothe him in earthly armour; Williams was willing to leave truth alone, in her own panoply of light, believing that if in the ancient feud between truth and error, the employment of force could be entirely abrogated, truth would have much the best of the bargain. If Copernicus is held in perpetual reverence because, on his deathbed, he published to the world that the sun is the centre of our system; if the name of Kepler is preserved for his sagacity in detecting the laws of planetary motion; if the genius of Newton has been almost adored for dissecting a ray of light and weighing heavenly bodies in a balance: let there be for the name of Roger Williams at least some humble place among those who have advanced moral science, and made themselves the benefactors of mankind."

Willibrord, Sr., was born in Northumberland about 658. A short time before, the monastery of Ripon had been founded by St. Wilfrid [WILFRID], and there Willibrord was sent by his parents when he was only seven years old. His father, Wilgis, became a hermit, and founded a small monastery on the banks of the Humber. When twenty years old Willibrord went to Ireland to the missionary college of which St. Egbert was the head. This saint had sent out several parties of missionaries to attempt the conversion of Friesland, but their work was not crowned with great success. At the age of thirty-one Willibrord petitioned that he might be allowed to organise a further effort. Egbert gave him leave, and, accompanied by eleven other monks, he set sail for Europe. They landed at the mouth of the Rhine, and were well received by Pepin, the mayor of the palace and Duke of the French, who had lately conquered Friesland. Before attempting any definite work, Willibrord went on a pilgrimage to Rome to beg the blessing of Pope Sergius. This being given, Willibrord preached the Gospel successfully in Friesland for six years. At the end of that time Pepin sent him again to Rome, with a petition that the Pope would allow him to take the office of a bishop. Sergius consecrated him in St. Peter's, giving him the title of Archbishop of the Frisons, and permission to fix the Metropolitan See in whatever part of the diocese would be most convenient for the carrying on of his work. He returned in 696, and determined to have his cathedral at Utrecht. He built there two churches, one of which he dedicated to our Saviour and the other to St. Mary, choosing the latter for the cathedral. When he had worked for some years in that part of Friesland which belonged to France, he turned his attention to West Friesland, governed at that time by a man named Radbod, who, in spite of all persuasions and entreaties, remained a heathen; he, however, allowed the Archbishop to preach in all parts of his kingdom, and severely punished any who ventured to interfere with him or any of his band. He then went to an island called Walcheren, belonging to Zealand, and caused several churches to be built there. In the year 731 he was joined by Boniface [q.v.], who stayed with him three years, and then went into Germany. Willibrord died in 739 or 740, in extreme old age. He lived to see the nation which he had found in a state of barbarism one of the most cultured in Europe at that time. He was buried at Epternac, in the monastery he had built and endowed there.

Willihad.—When news came of the martyrdom of Boniface [q.v.], many wished to go at once to try to convert those who had opposed and killed him. The head of the little band was Willihad, a native of Northumbria, who, in spite of great difficulties and fierce opposition, preached in all parts of the country. At one place the chief wished to put him to death for daring to despise the national idols, and it was agreed that lots should be cast whether he was to die or be set free. The lot was in Willihad's favour, and he reached a place called Drenthe safely. After several years Charles the Great suggested to him that he should turn his attention to the people of Wymodia, who up to that time had not had the chance of giving up their heathen religion for a better missionary having visited them. At first the people seemed to listen to him gladly; but in 782 a man named Wittekind incited the people to rebel, and Willihad had secretly to make his escape. He determined before entering on any new work to go on a pilgrimage to Rome, and to seek an interview with the Pope. He went for two years to the monastery of Epternac, and there, in 787, the news came to him that Wittekind wished to be baptised, and that the country was quiet and ready to listen to him again. Charles the Great thought this a favourable opportunity to make Wymodia a diocese, and persuaded Willihad to be consecrated Bishop of Eastern Friesland. He constantly journeyed through his diocese, baptising and preaching, and was everywhere well received. He chose the town of Bremen as the site of his cathedral church, and watched its progress with great interest. He did not live to see it finished, or in the year 789, when holding a Visitation, he was seized with a fever at a place called Blexen, and died. He was buried in the cathedral at Bremen.

Wilson, Thomas, Bishop of Sodor and Man, one of the holiest of English prelates, was born at Burton, in Cheshire, 1663, died in 1758. After he had graduated at Dublin, he was appointed chaplain to the Earl of Derby, who, as Lord of the Isle of Man, made him Bishop of that diocese in 1797 at the early age of thirty-four. He found the inhabitants of the island far behind both as regards civilisation and religious life. Being a man of great energy and possessing wonderful powers of organisation, he set to work in good earnest, and in a very short space of time had improved their condition in both matters. In 1707 he drew up a sort of Catechism for the people, which was the first book ever printed in Manx. Its English title was Principles and Duties of Christianity, later changed to The Knowledge and Practice of Christianity made easy to the Meanest Capacities. It was not only published in English, but also translated into French and Italian. He took the keenest interest in all missionary efforts, and at different times of his life presided over various societies. He was Bishop nearly fifty-eight years, and he left his diocese under wise and strict rules for the maintenance of good Church discipline. His life was so active that he wrote comparatively few books. What he did write, however, are regarded as some of the greatest treasures in the way of devotional books in the English language—notably Parochialia, Sacra Privata, and Short and Plain Instructions for the Better Understanding of the Lord's Supper. He gave instructions for the Bible to be translated into Manx, but did not live to see it completed. It appeared in 1772. His life was written in 1781 by the Rev. C. Cruttwell. Several editions have since been published, the most important being that by Keble, as part of the Library of Anglo-Catholic Theology, (1847-52).

Winchester, Bishopric of.—In the year 633, Birinus, a Benedictine monk of Rome, offered himself to Pope Honorius to penetrate into the innermost parts of Pagan Britain, “to sow the seeds of the holy faith.” He was consecrated by Asterius, Bishop of Genoa, and, landing on the West Saxon coast, took up his abode there, and preached diligently before King Kynegils and his people. His efforts were aided by King Oswald, who had come to seek the hand of the daughter of Kynegils, and the latter was baptised in 633; the place of baptism is not stated, but it may be assumed that it was Winchester. The ancient city of Caer-Gwent had been laid in ruins by Cerdic, but had risen again, and was now the chief residence of the Court, its name passing into Went-Ceaster. It is said that on the occasion of his baptism, Kynegils gave land to the clergy for seven miles round.
Winchester. Yet Winchester was not made the first seat of the Bishop of the West Saxons; that honour was conferred on Dorchester, near Abingdon. [Dorchester, Bishopric op.] Hedda, who became Bishop in 676, removed the "bishop's stool" to Winchester, as the need no longer existed for having a See near the Mercian border. On his death, in 705, the diocese was divided: Hampshire, Surrey, Sussex, and the Isle of Wight were kept to Winchester; the western parts were committed to a See established at Sherborne [q.v.]. In 711 Sussex was placed under the newly created See of Selsey. Surrey also was placed under that See, but before long reverted to Winchester.

King Kynegils began to build a church at Winchester, which was finished by his son Kenwald, and hallowed on Christmas Day, 643, being dedicated to St. Birinus, the Holy Trinity, and to the honour of St. Peter and St. Paul. Around this church sprang up a great religious community, and Helmstan, one of the monks, became Bishop about 837. He was succeeded by St. Swithun [q.v.], who built and repaired many churches in the diocese, and obtained from Ethelwulf a charter for the general establishment of tithes throughout the kingdom: he was the educator and adviser of King Alfred. King Alfred, for the use of the learned monk St. Grimhald, founded a new monastery known as Hyde Abbey, which was at first tenanted by secular canons, but Bishop Athelwold, at the bidding of Dunstan, turned them out in 964, and replaced them with Benedictines from the great Abbey of Abingdon. This Bishop rebuilt the church, which was completed in 980. It is doubtful whether the Saxon cathedral was on the site of the present one, or a little to the northward of it; at any rate, whatever Saxon work there may be in it has been completely incorporated. The existing cathedral was commenced in 1079 by Bishop Walkelin, and finished in 1093, being consecrated with much pomp on St. Swithun's Day. In 1107 the tower fell in, but was rebuilt with funds left by the Bishop, and is called Walkelin's Tower; it was finished in 1120. To Bishop Giffard belongs the honour of founding, in 1129, the first Cistercian monastery of England (at Waverley, near Farnham), which was followed by others, and through this means a great religious revival was brought about. Henry of Blois, among many acts of munificence, built Farnham Castle, as an episcopal residence, and also Wolvesey Castle in Winchester, the beautiful hospital of St. Cross, and the abbey church of Romsey. Bishop Godfrey de Lucy [1189-1205] instituted a confraternity for the renovation of his cathedral, and the result was the present beautiful east end, beginning from the back of the apse, and including the Lady Chapel; his work is a charming example of Early English architecture. Bishop Peter des Roches [1205-1244] introduced the Preaching Friars into England, and in 1225 built them a house near the east gate of Winchester. Bishop William of Elyngdon, between 1360 and 1366, carried out extensive alterations in the cathedral; he completely changed the facade at the west, introducing the strict Perpendicular style, and extensive restorations in the nave were carried on by his successor William of Wykeham [q.v.], a great benefactor to his See and to the nation. Cardina Beaufort [1405-1447] did much for the Hospital of St. Cross, and left many benefactions in his will. Bishop Waynflete [1447-1486] continued the repairs of the cathedral. Bishop Langton [1493-1501] transformed the Early English chapel on the south side of the Lady Chapel into a chantry for his own burial place, decorating it with wood-carving and making a groined roof; his successor Bishop Fox [1501-1528], decorated the choir and rebuilt the clerestory above the middle-pointed chancel arches. He was the founder of Corpus Christi College at Oxford. In the time of these two last-named bishops, Priors Hunton and Silkstone extended the Lady Chapel some twenty-six feet. Since that time there have been no great structural changes in the cathedral. In 1541, in the time of Bishop Gardiner [q.v.], an important change came to Winchester Cathedral: it was put upon the new foundation; that is, a dean and chapter were substituted for the Benedictine house. By letters patent, Henry VIII. ordered that the cathedral should no longer be called that of St. Swithun, but that of the Holy and Undivided Trinity, and established the new foundation on the ruins of the old. He nominated William Kingsmill, the Prior, to be primus origina et modernum Decanum, and appointed twelve prebendaries. He also appointed twelve Students in Divinity, six at Oxford and six at Cambridge; twelve "Pety Cannons, to sunrise in the Church"; twelve "Laye men to singe and serve in the Quey dayly, Anglice, Vycars"; ten "Querestes"; one Master of the Choristers; one Gospeller; one "Pisoler"; an upper and an under Sexton; one "Obsonator to by their diet"; an upper- and an under-Butler; a Cook and an under-Cook; a Porter; two Bellringers; and twelve "pore men" who had been about the King's Court or person, or engaged in public affairs, or had been worn out in the army or navy.

Bishop Lancelot Andrewes [q.v.], 1619-1628, is the greatest Bishop of Winchester since the Reformation.

The present chapter of Winchester consists of a dean, five canons, three archdeacons, five minor canons, and twenty-four honorary canons. The income of the See is £6,500 per annum. The diocese comprises the entire county of Hants, the Channel Islands, part of Surrey, and small portions of adjacent counties. The number of benefices is 547.

Winchester School.—The College of St. Mary of Winchester was founded by WILLIAM OF WYKEHAM [q.v.], Bishop of Winchester. He made the special wants of the age his study. He saw how the religious instruction of the people had fallen off in consequence of the decreasing number of the clergy, and he determined to remedy this evil by helping poor scholars in their clerical education, and establishing two colleges of students for the increase of God's worship, for the propagating of the Christian faith, and for the improvement of the liberal arts and sciences. He had planned this soon after coming to the See, and had already bought the land in Oxford. In Winchester he agreed with one Richard Horton that for ten years he should diligently instruct in grammatical learning so many poor scholars as he should send him, and the Bishop agreed to provide him with a good assistant. His plan was already complete in his own mind: it was to provide for the perpetual maintenance and instruction of 200 scholars, to afford them a liberal support, and to lead them through a perfect course of education—from the first elements of knowledge through the whole circle of the sciences. Two establishments, one subordinate to the other, were to compass all this. He resolved to build the College at Oxford first, and began to deal with it as with Winchester; he would not wait till his buildings were finished, but gathered his students, found a governor for them, provided their lodgings, and laid down their code of management. The King's patent giving him leave to build is dated June 30th, 1379. He published his charter of foundation the November following, in which it is called Seint Marie College of Wynecestre in Oxenfor. But it was popularly called "New College," and that name still remains. The building was finished in six years, and was opened with much solemnity, April 14th, 1386. In the charter of St. Mary's, Winton, bearing date Oct. 20th, 1382, Thomas Cranley is nominated as the first warden. The first stone was laid March 26th, 1387, and it was opened March 28th, 1393. It had at once its full complement of scholars, and continued all along to furnish members to New College. At first it was ruled by a master and undermaster, then it was committed to a warden. The first nomination of fellows was made by the founder in 1394.

The situation of the college is singularly good, standing as it does on the south side of the city, without the walls, between two branches of the Itchen, which flow through the cathedral precincts. The open meadows on the south stretch down to St. Cross and Twyford. There is no useless ornamentation in the buildings: indeed, it is a characteristic of Wykeham's work everywhere that all his decoration was made to serve some useful purpose. In the present case it was needful to make his foundation safe from attacks. The east was secured by the brook; on the north he drew a wall of 300 feet; to the west was the back of the stables and another long wall which turned at the south to the brook again. The northern wall, facing the king's highway (which had the conventual garden of St. Swithun's Priory on the opposite side), had one entrance only, a gateway, which led into a large fore-court. Round this were the brewhouse and bakehouse, malt and flourrooms, slaughter-house, stables; for the ancient monastic economy provided for all articles of use and consumption within its own walls. Opposite the first gateway was another, which led into a quadrangle, 120 feet by 110 feet, around which the college buildings were grouped; between these buildings and the river were gardens. The outer walls are bare of ornament, because they were for defence; but the school buildings form a beautiful and dignified feature in the view, especially from the Giles Hill side. At the south-east portion of the quadrangle is the chapel, adjoining which is the muniment tower; west of this was the school, and refectory above it, and again west of this, forming the south-west corner, the cellar, the buttery, the bursary, audit-room, library, rose one above the other, and reached the entire height of the chapel. Thus all the offices of the college formed one imposing line of some 200 feet long. Over the inner gateway was the Warden's house, thus commanding a view of both quadrangle and fore-court.

Twenty-six years after Wykeham's death, his steward, John Fromond, completed the cloisters south of Wykeham's buildings.

The government of the college was carried on in entire conformity with the founder's statutes, except so far as the Reformation brought changes, until the year 1537. At that time the Oxford University Commission recommended the substitution of competitive examinations in place of the old nomination system, and this was done, but with a manifest disregard of the founder's proviso that the benefits of his foundation should be for those who could not otherwise obtain their education——the "pauperes et indigentes"——for now it is impossible for boys to gain a scholarship in competition with those whose parents are able to pay for a good preparatory course of training for them.

The Public School Commissioners have reconstructed the Constitution of the College, retaining the Warden and Fellows under the name of "the Governing Body," but relieving them from all duties connected with it, excepting those of managers. They were to administer the revenues, present to the livings, elect the two statutable masters, appoint the examiners to conduct the elections, and take cognisance of any complaints relating to the management of the school which might be laid before them. The Fellows are not now, as formerly, all Wykehamists. Of the eleven persons who form the Governing Body, two, the Warden of New College and the Warden of Winchester College, are _ex officio_ members; one each is chosen by the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, one by the Fellows of New College, one by the Royal Society, one by the Lord Chief Justice, one by the Masters at Winchester, and the remaining three by the other members of the Governing Body.

We cannot enter into all the customs and peculiarities of Winchester School, but will only mention the singing of _Dulce Domum_ on the eve of breaking up for the summer vacation; the origin of the song is doubtful, but tradition says that it was composed by a scholar who for some offence was punished by remaining at school during the holidays. A great curiosity is the famous picture of the _Trusty Servant_, dating from the sixteenth century; it is in the west side of the inner quadrangle, painted on a board, and represents him in a closely-buttoned blue coat and bands, with a pig's head, an ass's ears, a deer's feet. His mouth is padlocked; his right hand held up open; his left hand has a broom, dust-pan, labour-fork, and shovel. A belt round his waist carries a sword, and on his left arm is his buckler. By his side is the founder's arms, with his famous motto beneath, "Manners maketh man." Underneath are some curious Latin verses which have been thus translated:

"A trusty servant's portrait would you see,
This emblematic figure well survey.
The porker's snout not nice in diet shows;
The padlock shut, no secret hell discloses.
Patient, the ass his master's rage will bear;
Swiftness in errand the stag's feet declare;
Loaden his left hand apt to labour saith;
The vest, his neatness; open hand, his faith.
Girt with his sword, his shield upon his arm,
Himself and master he'll protect from harm."

Among the most celebrated Wykehamists we may mention Archbishops Chichele, Warham, and Howley; Bishops Waynflete, Lowth, Maltby, and Mant; the Nonjurings prelates Ken and Turner; the poets Otway, Collins, and Young; Sydney Smith; Drs. Arnold, Hook, and Christopher Wordsworth; Lord Cottenham, Lord Selborne, Lord Hatherley, Chief Justice Erle, etc.

Wine.—One of the most important social movements of the present century is that of abstinence from intoxicating drinks. But total abstainers comprise two classes, who take very divergent lines. The one side holds that wine, though lawful, is not expedient in the face of the terrible evils which affect modern society through strong drink. These abstainers take the pledge of total abstinence as an example to others, following the example of St Paul, who said that he would rather not eat meat at all than cause his brother to offend. But the other class of abstainers maintain that wine is an evil in itself, that it is a sin to drink it, as it is to indulge in any other forbidden pleasure.

It is manifest that they who hold this view must also hold that the wines which our Lord created at Cana and which He used at the Last Supper were non-alcoholic, were in fact unfermented liquor, and not what we commonly know as "wine." It is quite conceivable that though Christ may have given wine which would intoxicate when used in excess, it may be desirable under present conditions to forego the right to drink such wine, just as St Paul recommends abstinence from marriage under certain circumstances [1 Cor, vii.]. But it is impossible to believe that Christ gave what is in its very nature an evil thing. Accordingly those who hold the essential evil of all intoxicating drinks expound the various passages in which wine is commended in Scripture as referring to unfermented liquors.

The commonest Hebrew word of the Old Testament which is rendered "wine" is יין, and it is derived from a word signifying to ferment. It is used for intoxicating drinks in Gen. ix. 21; xix. 34; 2 Sam. xiii. 28, and many other places. It is spoken of with implied commendation in Gen. xiv. 18; Num. vi. 20; Ps. civ. 15; Deut. xiv. 26; etc.
Its evil use is condemned in Prov. xx. 1; xxiii. 31; Is. v. 22, etc. Another word is th�, from a root signifying "to possess," and so called, says Gesenius, "because it gets possession of the brain and inebriates." This is the word used in Gen. xxvii. 28, 37; Deut. vii. 18, etc.

In the New Testament the commonest word is oinos, a word closely connected with the English equivalent "wine." This is the word used in John ii. 9, and that it was fermented and intoxicating is shown by reference to Mark ii. 22; Eph. v. 18, where the same word is used. Another word, glyukos, "sweet wine," is also used in Acts ii. 13 of intoxicating drink. The argument which is sometimes brought forward that the wine used at the Last Supper was unfermented, because the Jews at that season rejected all things leavened, fails from the fact that the Jews have never been in the habit of putting away wine, though at the Passover season they are most rigid in abstaining from the taste or touch of any drink into which grain has entered, and to use only the fermented juice of the grape, prepared by their own hands.

On these grounds it is very strongly contended by strict rubricans that the use of what is called "Unfermented Wine" in the Holy Communion is altogether inadmissible as being contrary to the use of the whole Church from the beginning, and that such matter is not in the scriptural sense wine at all. It is further contended, not unreasonably, that the innovation is but a renewal of the old Encratite heresy. But there is no reason to be urged against those abstainers, who regarding abstinence in common life as in the highest sense expedient, desire also to keep the Holy Communion as far as may be free from that which may intoxicate, and therefore use a wine which, though fermented, and therefore genuine wine, contains but little alcoholic strength.

Winer, George Benedikt, one of the many great German writers on Biblical criticism in this century, was born at Leipzig in 1789, died there, 1838. Having passed through the course of education at Leipzig with great honours, he was appointed Professor of Theology in 1839, and kept the post till his death. He wrote an almost endless number of books, nearly all treating of the Bible, or of subjects connected with it. His great desire was to give a new direction to Biblical criticism, being convinced that writers were too fond of theories, and did not give enough attention to facts. His critical abilities were great and his judgment was sound. Of his many works there are three which deserve special mention—a Bible Dictionary; a Grammar of New Testament Greek regarded as a sure basis for New Testament Exegesis; and a Grammar of the Chaldee Language as contained in the Bible and the Targums. The two latter have been translated into English.

Wiseman, Nicholas, Cardinal and Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster [b. of an Irish family at Seville, 1802; d. in London, 1865], was educated at Waterford, and at St. Cuthbert's College near Durham, and in 1818 entered the English College at Rome. In 1823 he received Holy Orders, was made Vice-Rector of the English College and Professor of Oriental Languages at the Roman university, and was made a D.D. His first writings were published in 1828, the earliest being Homo Syriacce, from MSS. in the Vatican; and in 1836 the Doctrines of the Catholic Church appeared, which had already been delivered as lectures, and which was the first step towards his reputation in England. In 1840 he was appointed Coadjutor Vicar-Apostolic of the Central District of England, with the title of Bishop of Melipotamus in partibus Infidelium; and President of St. Mary's College, Oscott. In 1849 he became Vicar-Apostolic of the London district, and in September of the following year, at the new distribution of the kingdom into twelve Sees, he was nominated Archbishop of Westminster and a Cardinal Priest. The appointment was regarded in England with strong suspicion and dislike, as it was looked upon by Church of England members as a blow aimed at the Establishment; Cardinal Wiseman partly allayed the panic by an Appeal to the People of England concerning the Catholic Hierarchy, and by other lectures and essays, which gained the admiration of friends and foes alike. He was a genial man, popular in society. He wrote various works on the doctrine of the Eucharist and other matters of Roman dogma; and some books on science and art, The Influence of Words on Thought and Civilisation, etc., which have gained a wide circulation.

Wishart, George, called "The Martyr."—One of the early Scottish Reformers; supposed to have been a native of Forfarshire, though the circumstances of his birth are unknown; he first came under notice as headmaster of a grammar school at Montrose at the beginning of the sixteenth century. It was here that he began to teach the Reformation doctrines, which so roused the anger of the guardians of his pupils that he was obliged to flee for a time to England, where he was seized on a charge of heresy, and publicly recanted at Bristol in 1538. In 1543 he returned to Scotland with the Commissioners who had been employed to treat with Henry VIII. for the marriage of Prince Edward with the infant Queen of Scots. Wishart now openly adopted the profession of Reformer, and travelled about through Scotland stirring up the mob to rebellion, and causing riots and destruction wherever he preached, while he defied all attempts of the authorities to stop the disturbances. In East Lothian he met with John Knox, who became warmly attached to him, and constituted himself Wishart's disciple and champion, as the Reformer was supposed to be in danger of an attack upon his life from Cardinal Beaton. Letters have lately been brought to light which seem to confirm a suspicion that Wishart was engaged in a plot against Beaton which had already been hinted at by two Scottish authors. These letters are to the effect that one Wyshert (or Wysshart), a "Scottishman," had been employed to deliver letters to Henry VIII. from "the Larrie of Brunstone," containing a plan of the method in which the murder of the Cardinal was to be carried out. The Laird of Brunstone was, without doubt, an intimate friend of Wishart, and it is also known that the latter had a private interview with the King immediately after. As Cardinal Beaton knew that a plot was being made against him, this would explain the danger in which Wishart knew himself to stand, and which eventually overtook him. He was seized at Haddington, brought to St. Andrews for trial, and condemned to be burned as a heretic; and the sentence was carried out on the 1st of March, 1546.

Witchcraft may be defined as the claim of the power of producing effects without the use of natural means. The question as to whether these supernatural powers exist or not has been one that has been argued in all ages; the upholders of the belief saying that those who deny it deny the truth of the Bible, while others say that belief in witches and the influence of evil spirits over mankind is not consistent with faith in God. In common with many other superstitions, it had its rise in the ignorance and simple credulity of the people in bygone ages. An old woman, perhaps, living alone with her cat, uttered curses on the head of some neighbour who had offended. Presently the neighbour’s child fell ill, or some other calamity happened, and, remembering the curses, the trouble, whatever it was, was attributed to her. And the poor people especially, who had no education or religion, very often, to teach them better, believed these tales, and so the superstition spread. Innumerable books have been written on the subject, tracing the origin of the belief and describing the various meetings supposed to have been held by the witches. The best account of these is in the famous Brocken scene in Goethe’s Faust. The people seem to have believed the powers of the witches almost unlimited, but not quite. We find Shakespeare, in Hamlet, alluding to the popular belief that at Christmas time “no witch hath power to charm.” In all countries the practice of witchcraft was strenuously forbidden, and in all cases trial by ordeal was ordered. Very often the accused were thrown bound into a pond; if they immediately sank they were guilty, if they rose to the surface they were innocent. Sometimes they were made to repeat the Lord’s Prayer, the belief being that no witch could say it without a mistake. With the improvement of education the belief in witchcraft began to die out, and the cases got fewer and fewer in all the countries of Europe, and in time ceased altogether. In England trial for witchcraft was put a stop to by a law in George II.’s reign. The last known instance of a woman being burned as a witch in Europe was at Posen in 1793. All sorts of preventives were used by the common people, and to this day many of the peasants in Germany burn straw on May 1st, “Walpurgisnacht,” because the witches are supposed to assemble in great force on that night, and the burnt straw is sure to disperse them.

Wither, George, Christian poet, was born at Bentworth, near Alton in Hampshire, in 1588, died in 1667. He studied at Magdalen College, Oxford, and at the age of eighteen he was urged by his family to make his choice of a profession, so he entered at Lincoln’s Inn to read for the law, but soon devoted himself to writing and became known as a poet. After travelling in Ireland, Scotland, and elsewhere, he published several poems which brought him more prominently before the world. His celebrated work, Abuse Stript and Whipt, a volume of political satires, appeared in 1613. This gave so much offence to the Government that he was for a time imprisoned in the Marshalsea. While there he wrote his Satire to the King in 1614. After some months’ imprisonment, Wither was released through the kindly intervention of the Earl of Pembroke.

Amongst his works of greater importance are the Hymns and Songs of the Church, which were published about 1623, and for which he gained a patent or privilege from King James. They were the outcome of a translation of the Psalms, are well known, and are written in a simple touching style. They were set to music by Orlando Gibbons, one of the most distinguished musicians of that day. After a struggle with the publishers, Wither was obliged to give up his right to have the Psalms bound up with all Bibles, and could only have a patent for them separately. In 1646 he was in great poverty, having lost a great deal of money over the Hymns and Songs, and many of his old patrons and friends were dead. This state of things caused the tone of melancholy which pervades the Emblems, written about this time. He settled himself near Farnham, and there enjoyed the friendship of Selden, the most learned linguist and antiquarian of that time. In 1641 appeared the Hallelujah, or Second Remembrancer, which may be said to have ended the poetical life of George Wither, who from that time became actively engaged in the Civil War; and it was while taking part as an officer in the Parliamentary Army that he was made prisoner after the battle of Edge Hill, and, as his property had been seized before by the Royalists, he and his family were in a pitiable state. Up to the time of the Civil War Withers belonged to the Established Church; then he might be said to have relinquished the forms rather than its ordinances. He called himself a "Catholic Christian," and said "he separated himself from no Church adhering to the foundations of Christianity." His political friends were amongst the most noted of those days, and, besides Milton and Dryden, included Michael Drayton, Thomas Cranley, Hayman, and Christopher Brooke. He was engaged in writing a Paraphrase on the Ten Commandments almost up to the last hour of his life. He was buried in the church belonging to the Savoy Hospital.

Wodrow, Robert.—An ecclesiastical historian [b. at Glasgow, 1679; d. at Eastwood, Renfrewshire, 1734]. He entered the Glasgow University in 1691, and was appointed Librarian of the College at an early age; in 1703 he received his licence to preach, and in the same year became minister of Eastwood, near Paisley, where he remained till his death. The intermediate time was spent by him in untiring literary work, and he was also a zealous Church politician, attending all ecclesiastical courts when it was possible, and fulfilling his duty as one of a Committee of Presbyters formed for the protection of the Church of Scotland after the Union of 1707. He was a strict adherent to Presbyterianism, and opposed the Act for re-establishing Patronage; he was appointed, with four others, to go to London to urge its repeal, but, failing in this object, he quietly submitted, and recommended his colleagues to do the same. The work to which he devoted his life was a History of the Church of Scotland from the Restoration to the Revolution, on which he expended the greatest care, and the first edition of which was published in 1721. It is a most valuable work as regards the accuracy of its facts, even to the smallest details; but it is one-sided, badly arranged, and absolutely deficient in all grace of style. Wodrow also wrote The Lives of the Scottish Reformers and Analecta: a History of Remarkable Providences.

Wolf, Johann Christian [born at Breslau in 1679, died at Halle, 1754].—A German metaphysician. He was Professor of Physical Science at the University at Halle, and first came into notice through the opposition of the Pietists, who were shocked at his method of applying the test of mathematics to religion as well as philosophy. His colleagues, Francke and Lange, charged him with being a despiser of religion and a teacher of error, and the Faculty of Halle lodged a formal complaint against him with the king. The chief ground of this accusation was his oration, De Philosophia Sinensium Morali, in which he approved the morality of Confucius, and it was said also that he encouraged social anarchy. In November, 1728, a Cabinet decree was issued ordering him on pain of death to leave the Prussian dominions within forty-eight hours, and Prussian subjects were forbidden under heavy penalties to read his books. Wolf fled to Cassel, and within a year accepted a Chair at Marburg, whence his fame spread rapidly. He adopted the principles of Leibnitz, and endeavoured to popularise them by reducing them to a systematic method by means of mathematics. His system of philosophy grew at length to be considered an indispensable part of intellectual culture, and many German writers adopted his method. In 1740, when Frederic II. came to the throne, he was recalled to Halle, where his return was celebrated with a complete ovation, and he was made rector of the university, a Privy Councillor, and baron of the Empire. Wolf was a voluminous writer, both in Latin and German; he published some German school-books of philosophy, and a number of treatises on special subjects in physics and mathematics, and he did much to create the widespread taste for philosophical speculation which has of late years characterised Germany. He also gave to rationalistic theology its fundamental principle; and Kant, while criticising him sharply, confessed that he was a great dogmatic philosopher. Wolf's disciples have cultivated most zealously his views on natural theology.

Wolfe, Rev. Charles, Christian poet, born at Dublin, 1791, died at Cork, 1823. He was educated chiefly at Winchester, and in 1809 entered Dublin University, took his degree in 1814, and was ordained in 1817. His literary fame rests principally on The Burial of Sir John Moore, but he wrote other poems, which together with fifteen sermons were published after his death by the Rev. John Russell, under the title of Remains of the late Charles Wolfe, A.B., Curate of Donoughmore, Diocese of Armagh. Some of his poetry was of real merit, but is now well-nigh forgotten.

Wolff, Joseph, a missionary, was born near Bamberg in Germany in 1795, died in 1862. He was of Jewish origin, and his father was a Rabbi; but through the influence of some friends he was converted to Christianity, and was baptised into the Roman Catholic Church by a monk in 1812. Three years later he paid a visit to Rome, but there began to be dissatisfied with the teaching and ritual, and was therefore expelled from the city as a heretic by the Inquisition. He came to England and joined the Established Church, and, having studied Oriental languages at Cambridge, was employed as a missionary to the Society for the Conversion of the Jews in the East. He travelled for nearly twenty years in all parts of the world, finishing with America, where he was ordained deacon. He returned to England and was ordained priest. Being tired of a wandering life, he took a curacy in Yorkshire; but in 1843 the rumour coming that two British officers were in the greatest danger in Bokhara, Wolff started off to find them. After many adventures and hair-breadth escapes, he ascertained that they had been murdered there, and then settled down as Vicar of Isle Brewers, in Somersetshire, where he died. Wolff was a most amusing man, original and quaint to eccentricity. Thus he would jump up in the middle of a dinner-party and volunteer a Bokhara song. And it was a favourite boast of his on his visits that he needed no carpet bag, having all his toilet requisites about him. But he was a man of deep piety and of remarkable kindness of heart, as well as of learning and shrewdness. He wrote accounts of his various missionary journeys—Missionary Journal and Memoir, Narrative of a Mission to Bokhara in the Years 1843-5, Travels and Adventures of "J.W.," etc., etc.

Wolsey, Thomas, Cardinal, ecclesiastic and statesman, was born at Ipswich in 1471, died at Leicester in 1530. He was educated at Ipswich School, whence he went to Magdalen College, Oxford. He took his B.A. at fifteen years of age, and was therefore called the "Boy Bachelor." He became Fellow of his College, and was appointed tutor of a school in connection with it. His first preferment was to the rectory of Lymington, in Somersetshire [1500]. He was soon after named as Deputy to Sir John Nafant, Treasurer of Calais, who introduced him to King Henry VII., in whose favour he soon gained a prominent place. He was made Royal Chaplain [1505], and Rector of Redgrave [1506], and was in 1507 chosen to go to Flanders as Ambassador to the Emperor Maximilian. Wolsey transacted the embassy so quickly and well that he was rewarded by the Deanery of Lincoln [1508]. In the following year the King died, and was succeeded by Henry VIII. Up to this time Wolsey, though a rising man, had no great public influence; but now preferments were heaped upon him. He was made King's Almoner in 1509, and rose so rapidly in the King's favour that he soon did anything he pleased. He became Rector of Torrington, Canon of Windsor, and Registrar of the Order of the Garter, Prebendary and Dean of York, Dean of Hereford, Precentor of St. Paul's, Bishop of Tournay, Bishop of Lincoln, and in 1514 Archbishop of York. In the following year he was made Cardinal, and succeeded Warham as Chancellor, and in 1516 Legatus-
a prince whose personal will and appetite was overriding the highest interests of the State, trampling under foot the wisest counsels, and crushing with the blind ingratitude of a Fate the servants who opposed him. But even Wolsey, while he recoiled from the monstrous fame which he had created, could hardly have dreamed of the work of destruction which the royal courage, and yet more royal appetite, of his master was to accomplish in the years to come." [Hist. of Eng. People, p. 324.] It should be mentioned that Wolsey was a munificent patron of learning, and the founder of Cardinal's College, Oxford, now Christ Church.

Woman.—The change effected by Christianity in the position of woman has been of a most marked character. Under the Roman law, women were under the perpetual tutelage of their male relatives, the object being to keep their property in the family. They had no voice in public affairs, nor, legally, in the government of their own household. A child desiring to marry need not obtain the mother's consent—only that of the father. On her marriage her property became that of her husband, and all her earnings were his. In the Oriental world her position was still more debased; she was a slave, not a co-partner with her husband. Mr. George Smith, in his Assyrian Discoveries, tells how a man could pay half a mina to his wife, and say to her, "Thou art not my wife," which freed him from her thenceforth; though, if a woman repudiated her husband, she could be drowned.

It was with the Oriental condition that the Old Testament found its points of contact. It was emphatically proclaimed in the first book of the Scriptures that monogamy was the original intention of the Creator, and though polygamy was practised, it was discouraged; while, as our Lord said, divorce was only permitted for the hardness of men's hearts. It was one of the darkest features of the growth of Hebrew civilisation that royal polygamy became frequent in the days of David and Solomon, and was the chief cause of the troubles of each of those reigns. As the Old Testament moves onwards, the sacredness of marriage is more and more dwelt upon. The times of the New Testament brought religion into contact with European civilisation. Roman law had undergone a change. There had arisen another form beside the ancient one, called "Free Marriage," recognised by law, and of which the children were held to be legitimate, but not always held to be a respectable connection. It was a form established in the interest of the woman, for she was allowed to keep her own property, worship her own gods, and keep up intercourse with her paternal family. Such a wife was called exor and matrona, a name less honourable than the materfamilias of the old law. The "Free Marriage" had almost superseded the older form in the first Christian century, and under it there was the utmost freedom of divorce, and morality had sunk to a terrible depth. Juvenal tells of a woman who had had eight husbands in five years. When Christianity became the national religion, Constantine, although himself further from the Christian standard of morals than some of the Pagan Emperors, proceeded at once to legislation with a view of diminishing the moral evils of the time. By laws passed in 330–331, a wife could be divorced from her husband only under three conditions—viz., when he was a murderer, or a magician, or a violator of tombs. A wife repudiating her husband was banished with loss of her property. A husband could be divorced on proof of his wife's unfaithfulness, but was prohibited from having a concubine. The mischief, however, had eaten too deeply into the public life for the then-existing type of Christianity to be able to end it; and to this fact is to be attributed the piecemeal and ineffective legislation of succeeding emperors. "It need not be said," writes Mr. Brace [Gesta Christi, p. 29], "that the Christian system of morals demanded the utmost purity of life, as well from the man as from the woman. In regard to masculine purity, it is still in advance of the current opinion of the civilised world. So strongly is this elevation of morals characteristic of Christ's life, that we do not look for or expect direct teachings against vice. No direct denunciation is transmitted from Him against one of the most terrible organised evils of ancient or modern times—prostitution—or against the unnatural vices which were eating out the heart of Roman and Greek society. The impression, however, which an impartial reader would get from the narrative is of a person so pure and elevated that such vices could not even be thought of when under His influence. His power goes to the back of organised vices, and touches the sources of character. His relations to abandoned women; the story of the adulteress which, whether true or imagined, shows the popular conception of His character; and the few words reported from Him on these and related topics, together with the character of His early followers, all point to the unique elevation and nature of His influence on the great weakness and sin of mankind. He required absolute purity from man as from woman. He was not, however, alone in this. The stoical moralists had done the like; yet but few of their followers had ever practised this high self-restraint, and no great example stimulated them to it. Even the stoical jurists alluded to the principle, but there is little question that, before Christianity entered the world, comparatively few persons felt this obligation of morals. Had the Founder of Christianity simply taught purity as some of the early Fathers taught it— as meaning absolutely asceticism and celibacy—the world would have been comparatively little benefited. The nature of man would have reacted against it. We should have had even more celibate sects, greater reactions, a more unnatural condition of society, and a falling again into vices and habits as bad as those of the Imperial era. Such a system of morality could not have met some of the first conditions of a divinely sanctioned system; it would have been only temporary and incomplete. But it is evident that Christ set the highest value on marriage. The only human institution in regard to which He departed from His ordinary habit was that of marriage. He lays down here a direct and positive rule. The words are so clear and definite, that a mistake of the historian or transcriber seems hardly possible. He evidently felt the bond as one which more than any other binds human society together. He foresaw the boundless evils which would arise to the world from a looseness of its ties; the breaking up of homes; the neglect and ruin of children; the low position which freedom of divorce would give to woman; the temptation to man to choose and to throw aside; the destruction and degradation of family life which must ensue where marriage is taken up and broken at every whim. He either foresaw these evils, now so familiar to moralists, or He felt the sacredness of the union so deeply, as to command that only one cause should break it—unfaithfulness to the tie, or its moral equivalent." [MARRIAGE; DIVORCE.]

It is an interesting question to consider, what are the proper religious functions of women in the ministry of the Church. What they have done in one direction of that ministry we have considered under SISTERSHOODS; but what are we to make of their work as public teachers? St. Paul in 1 Cor. xiv. forbidden women to speak in the congregation. Some divines hold that the prohibition was intended to apply only to certain conditions, others that it was intended for all time. Those who hold the former view dwell on the fact that the Apostle gives directions [1 Cor. xi. 5-6] as to the dress of the women who "prophesied," and that St. Peter quotes Joel ii. 28, 29, declaring it to be a part of the Pentecostal gift that the daughters of men should prophesy as well as the sons, and that God would pour out His Spirit on the handmaids. Professor Godet, in his valuable commentary on 1 Cor. xiv. 33-36, reconciles this direction with the passage in chapter xi. by supposing that the latter refers to exceptional cases of a special revelation. In support of his contention, he adduces 1 Tim. ii. 11-14; the appeal to Gen. iii. 16, indicating in his opinion that the divine sentence was never to lose its binding force. By way of example, he cites the Montanist prophetesses and the women of the French Protestant Church after the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes, as sources of weakness. Speaking of more modern instances, such as those of Mrs. Fry and Miss Marsh, he says that the Gospel does not lose its life-giving power, even when preached in a manner not altogether in accordance with Apostolical prescription; but thinks these devoted women might have laboured still more usefully in some other manner. It seems very difficult to take such a view of work so obviously honoured of God; and those who hold a different opinion reason that St. Paul simply dealt with the conditions of his day. In that day it was "a shame" for a woman to speak in public assemblies, and accordingly, they say, He forbade a public scandal; in these days, when it is no longer shameful, it is argued that his judgment would be very different. See on this side an article by Dean Plumptre in The Nineteenth Century for January, 1884.

Woolston, Thomas, Deistical writer, born at Northampton, 1669; died 1731. He was educated at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, of which he became a Fellow, was ordained, and took his B.D. He studied greatly the works of Origen, which imbued him with the love of allegorical interpretation of the Scriptures, which was shown in his first published work, The Old Apology of the Truth for the Christian Religion Against the Jews and Gentiles Revised [1705]. He treats Moses and the miracles recorded in the Pentateuch as allegorical, and the miracles of Christ in the same way. In 1720 he published three Latin tracts, one to prove that a letter attributed by the Fathers to Pontius Pilate was a forgery, and the others addressed to Whitby, Waterland, and Whiston, on the subject of interpretation. These he followed with another, Whether the Quakers do not the nearest of any other sect of Religion resemble the Primitive Christians in Principles and Practice. These publications exposed him to much suspicion from the clergy, and when, in 1721, he published The Moderator between the Infidel and the Apostle, mocking at the Gospel miracles, he narrowly escaped a public prosecution for blasphemy, and was deprived of his college fellowship. Later on he developed his views in Six Discourses on the Miracles of Christ, which, from their tone of ridicule and banter, gave great offence. He characterised the Gospel narrative as a tissue of absurdities, and fiercely denounced the order of clergy. For this he was prosecuted in 1729 by the Attorney-General, tried and found guilty at the Guildhall, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment in the King's Bench, at the end of which time he was to pay a fine of £100. Being unable to pay this sum he remained in prison, where he died in a short time. He is buried in St. George's Churchyard, Southwark.

Worcester, diocesan of.—Worcester, on a Roman road, and near a great river, became naturally a bishop's seat when the great province of Mercia was divided into five bishoprics. It was the ancient Wigmoraceaster, a stronghold of the Hwicas. Its first bishop, Bosel, was consecrated in 680. St. Dunstan was Bishop from 957 to 961. Oswald, who succeeded him, was a great friend of the monks in opposition to the secular clergy; he built a church to St. Mary to the north-east of the present cathedral, containing twenty-seven altars for his monks. No traces remain either of the church or monastery; they were ruined by Hædicam’s soldiers, and Bishop Wulfstan began the existing cathedral in 1084; in 1089 the eastern part was ready for consecration. He built also the crypt, which is one of the glories of Worcester, and in 1092 held a synod in it. Within a quarter of a century the roof was destroyed by fire, and in 1202 it was again greatly injured by fire. Many miracles were said to be wrought at the tomb of Wulfstan; it was visited by King John in 1207, and that King, by his own special request, was buried beside St. Wulfstan in 1216. In 1218 the cathedral was reconsecrated with much pomp by Bishop Sylvester, in honour of St. Mary, St. Peter, St. Oswald, and St. Wulfstan, in the presence of the young King Henry III. The choir, retro-choir, and Lady Chapel were commenced in 1224 by Bishop Blois, and are in the Early English style. Bishop Giffard, in 1269, added the gilt rings round the columns, probably to hide the iron clamps which welded the stonework together. In the fourteenth century Bishop Cobham [1317–1327] revaulted the north aisle of the nave, and in 1377 Bishop Wakefield revaulted the nave itself; he also, in 1380, built the present north porch. The central tower had fallen in 1175, and was rebuilt about 1281. In 1502 Prince Arthur, the eldest son of Henry V11., was buried here, and an exquisite little chapel marks the spot. The cathedral suffered much in the Rebellion from Essex’s and Cromwell’s troopers. During the Commonwealth no services were allowed; they were resumed April 13th, 1661.

Traces of Norman work are to be found now in the walls of the transepts, in the western part of the choir, the eastern arch of the north transept, and elsewhere. The piers of the tower enface a Norman “core.” Outside there are two Norman doorways surmounted by Norman windows, and a central doorway, which was decapitated by a great west window in 1830. The chapter-house’s Transitional Norman; its upper walls were rebuilt in the fifteenth century. The loisters are in the Decorated style; near their entrance is a small door, famous archaeologically as the “Messirimus” door: at the foot of the steps leading to it is a stone with the single word Messirimus, “most wretched one,” engraved on it as an epitaph. Many have been the imaginations of hopeless lover or half-despairing penitent lying below—one of which is enshrined in a well-known sonnet of Wordsworth; but local history has dispelled these more romantic associations, and revealed in him the Rev. T. Morris, vicar of Upton-on-Severn, an old loyal Jacobite, who died in 1748, aged eighty-eight, sorrowing to the last for the fallen dynasty.

One of Worcesters most celebrated bishops was HUGH LATIMER [q.v.].

A complete restoration was commenced in 1857 by Mr. A. G. Perkins, the cathedral architect, and continued on his death by Sir Gilbert Scott, who superintended the whole of the interior work. It was reopened after restoration in April, 1874.

The chapter includes a dean, two archdeacons, four canons, four minor canons, and twenty-four honorary canons. The income of the See is £5,000 a year. The diocese comprises the whole counties of Warwick and Worcester, part of Stafford, and portions of adjacent counties, and includes 482 benefices.

Wordsworth, Christopher, D.D., youngest brother of the poet, was born in 1774, at Cockermouth; died 1846. He was educated at Hawkshead and at Trinity College, Cambridge, of which he became Fellow in 1798. He was made Chaplain to Dr. Manners Sutton, Archbishop of Canterbury, and became successively Rector of Ashby and Oby-with-Thirne [1804]; Dean of Bocking, in Essex [1808]; Rector of St. Mary's, Lambeth, and of Sundridge, in Kent [1816]; Master of Trinity College, Cambridge [1820], in which year he also exchanged his livings of Lambeth and Sundridge for the Rectory of Buxted-with-Uckfield, in Sussex. He was the author of a work in six volumes, Ecclesiastical Biography; or, the Lives of Eminent Men connected with the History of Religion in England.

Wordsworth, Christopher, Bishop of Lincoln, the son of the preceding, was born in 1807, died in 1885. He was educated at Winchester, and went thence to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he won the Chancellor's English medals in 1827 and 1828, the Porson prize, the Brown's medals, the Craven scholarship, and was Senior Classic Medallist in 1829. Soon after taking his degree he gained a Fellowship, took orders, and in 1836 became Public Orator at Cambridge. He succeeded Longley as Head Master of Harrow in 1836, which post he held eight years, being nominated by Sir R. Peel to a canonry at Westminster in 1844. He acquired great fame as a preacher, and in 1847 and 1848 delivered the Hulsean Lectures at Cambridge. In 1865 he became Archdeacon of Westminster, and in 1869 was nominated Bishop of Lincoln in succession to Bishop Jackson, translated to the See of London. He resigned only a few weeks before his death, living just long enough to carry his project of the Southwell bishopric. [q.v.]

Bishop Wordsworth was an eminent classical scholar. He visited Greece several times, and embodied his observations in two very charming works, Athens and Attica, and Greece, Pictorial, Descriptive, and Historical. Even in the last years of his life he showed that in the midst of his untrerving labours he had not forgotten his old tastes, for he published a very excellent edition of Theocritus. But it is as a theologian that he will be remembered. His Commentary on the Bible is one of the most remarkable works of this century, whatever opinion may be formed of the soundness of the Bishop's views, which may be summed up at once in the expression "High Anglican." It amazes the reader to open one of the volumes at hazard and see how the notes bristle with references to the Fathers and to the great English Divines, and there seems no limit to the Bishop's acquaintance with them. He was the most uncompromising of men against Rationalism and Freethought, the strenuous asserter of verbal inspiration. And he was equally fierce against Romanism, maintaining that the Babylon of the Apocalypse is the Roman Catholic Church. He was one of the writers against Essays and Reviews, in the volume edited by Bishop Wilberforce, being pitted against Professor Jowett on the subject of inspiration. When Dr. Stanley was appointed to the Deanery of Westminster, Dr. Wordsworth, as one of the canons, protested on the ground of Stanley's opinions. However, the friendship which grew up between them was warm and sincere. Another work of the Bishop's which must not be forgotten is his Theophilus Anglicus, a manual, in catechetical form, of Church doctrine and government from the Bishop's Anglican standpoint. It has been widely circulated, and is the most complete work of its kind. But no account of Bishop Wordsworth could be just which left out of sight his untiring energy as a bishop, his geniality and hospitality, his self-sacrifice and munificence. It was said of him as Canon of Westminster, that poor curates were as frequent and as heartily welcomed at his table as rich men, and to him and Lord Hatherley it was mainly owing, that a great number of churches were built and endowed in Westminster. Judged by his writings, Bishop Wordsworth might be thought one of the narrowest of theologians, but his life proved him to be one of the most generous and large-hearted men that have ever graced the English Episcopate. Several volumes of his Sermons in Westminster Abbey were published, chiefly on current topics, and he was the author of some of our best known hymns.

Wordsworth, William, poet, was born at Cockermouth, in Cumberland, 1770; died 1850. His early education was at a public school at Hawkshead in Lancashire, where he remained till 1787, when he entered St. John's College, Cambridge, and continued a student there till 1791. In the preceding autumn he had made a pedestrian tour in France, and on leaving college he returned to that country, being strongly imbued with Republican principles. He however returned to England in 1792, shortly before the execution of Louis XVI. He spent his time in a desultory manner, having taken an aversion to entering the ministry, to which profession he had been destined. He took to writing poetry, and in 1793 published two poems, An Evening Walk, addressed to a Young Lady, and Descriptive Sketches, taken during a pedestrian tour among the Alps. These, however, did not meet with much notice, and as Wordsworth had no private means, he contemplated writing political articles for the newspapers, but just then a legacy of £900 came to him, and on this sum he and his sister lived for seven years, when a further sum of money came in which enabled him to devote himself to poetical composition. In 1797 Wordsworth made the acquaintance of Coleridge, which resulted in the intimate friendship of the two poets. In 1798 they jointly published Lyric Ballads, which was coldly received; they travelled together in Germany, and then Wordsworth took up his residence at Grasmere, whence in 1808 he removed to Allan Bank, both in the Lake Country. Up to 1814 he gave to the public only his minor poems, and for these had to bear severe criticism and ridicule. His style was to the word eccentric, and his language bald even to puerility. But while he only published these short and desultory effusions, his mind was developing his great philosophical poem The Excursion; this he published in 1814, and though not a commercial success, nor at once securing the admiration it merited, yet it found readers able to recognise its worth, and eventually was confessed to be one of the greatest poems in our language. In 1815 came the historical poem The White Doe of Rylstone; in 1822 a volume called Memorials of a Tour on the Continent, and some years later a noble series of Ecclesiastical Sonnets; in 1835 Yarrow Revisited, and other poems. In 1803 he had published his Platonic Ode on Immortality, neglected then, but afterwards given a high place among his compositions. A few years after his death, one of his grandest works, The Prelude, was published, a long autobiographical poem in blank verse. In 1839 he received the honorary degree of D.C.L. from the University of Oxford; in 1842 a pension of £300 per annum was granted to him by Government; and on the death of Southey, in 1843, he became Poet Laureate.

Wordsworth's poetry has exercised a vast influence on the literature and religious thought of England. His firm determination to revolutionise our poetry by casting away the artificialism into which it had sunk, to be the poet and describer of nature and not the repeater of what people said about nature, exposed him, as we have said, to satire and ridicule. "This will never do," was the beginning of Jeffrey's celebrated attack in the Edinburgh Review. But Wordsworth had no doubt of the truth of his views, or of the high responsibilities of the poet, and he kept on his course unmoved until he had brought about the revolution in public opinion which he had sought after, and is confessed by nearly all critics to be the greatest poet of the nineteenth century, indeed the greatest since Milton.

His poetry is open to objection in the eyes of two classes of religious thinkers. The late Archbishop of Dublin, a very enthusiastic admirer of Wordsworth, objects to him that he did not take sufficient count of the sorrows and sins of the world. Living in retirement among the still lakes and mountains, apart from the struggles and agonies of men, he seems to have so given himself to the love and admiration of natural beauty, as to suppose that perfectibility was within man's reach by the culture of nature, and not to have realised the terrible mischief which sin has wrought in the world. His own life was wonderfully pure and blameless, but he was not brought into contact with the rough hardships and temptations which are the lot of thousands. "Whatever," says Mr. Stopford Brooke, "may have been his stated creed, he laid aside as poet the severer doctrine of original sin." The other objection which has been made to Wordsworth is his ecclesiasticism. He was always enthusiastically attached to the Church of England, and while much of his verse transcends all distinctions of party, and even stands in the outer circle of natural religion, outside Christianity itself, the greater part of it contemplates Christianity in its concrete form as a system of Faith, Discipline, and Doctrine, such as it presented itself to him in the Ordinances of the Church of England. The beautiful White Doe of Rylstone is throughout accented by the poet's admiration for the Church as it came forth from the hands of the Reformers in the days of Elizabeth. The muse of Keble was nursed upon Wordsworth, who in his turn was greatly influenced by the Church movement of 1835.

Work of Christ.—This is stated in the Angel's words to St. Joseph, when he said of the Holy Child who should be born, "Thou shalt call His Name Jesus: for He shall save His people from their sins." The Work of Christ is to save from sin.

Although this is the view most frequently put before us in Holy Scripture, it should not be forgotten that there is much and unquestionable support for a belief of the Franciscan divines of the Middle Ages that the first object of the Incarnation was the uniting of God and man in one in holiness; that God the Son would have become incarnate even if man had never sinned, since humanity would not have attained its perfection if Christ had not come into the world. And certainly the promises of glory and honour to man from union with Christ so far exceed his restoration from his fallen state, that we should always bear this view in mind.

In considering, however, the Work of Christ, His Office of Saviour necessarily comes first, and the statement of the manner in which He accomplished our salvation is known as the doctrine of the Atonement. [ATONEMENT.] Christ worked our salvation both by His Life and by His Death.

[1] By His Life. [a] His perfect obedience. Man—the first Adam—fell by disobedience to God; the second Adam came, as He repeatedly said, not to do His own Will, but the will of His Father, and as St. Paul says, "For as through the one man's disobedience the many were made sinners, even so through the obedience of the One shall the many be..." made righteous” [Rom. v. 19]. [3] His resistance to temptation; in the wilderness, through His life, on the Cross, “One that hath been in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin” [Heb. iv. 15]. [4] His doing of all those things which, though distasteful to the natural man, are pleasing to God, and His not doing all those things which, though pleasing to man, are displeasing to God. By His Life as perfect Man, the Second Adam, because He was Perfect God also, wrought out some part of our salvation. The early Church emphasised this side of the Atonement by dwelling on the Incarnation and Life of Christ rather than on His Death. We see this in those of our collects which come from ancient sources.

[2] By His Death. Whilst, however, we bear in mind the necessary and essential connection between the Incarnation and Life of Christ and His atoning work, it is upon His Death that the mind of the Church has been especially fixed in later times, and it is to the effects of this that the term Atonement is more particularly applied. If the early Church a little exaggerated the idea that the Death was but the necessary conclusion of the Life of Christ, we, perhaps, a little exaggerate His Death and depress the doctrine of His Life. It may be well to touch briefly on a few points in the history of the doctrine of the Atonement.

Irenæus, Bishop of Lyons [170], believed that it was only by the Incarnation, by God becoming man, that man could obtain the predestined end of His original creation. That the perfecting of humanity in Christ was, at the same time, a realisation of the true idea of humanity. He viewed the Atonement as the victorious conflict of Christ with Satan, in which Christ maintained, in spite of all His temptations, full and entire obedience to the Father, unmasking Satan as rebel and deceiver and thereby proving Himself the strong one. Besides this, he represented redemption through Christ’s blood as a price voluntarily paid to the devil, and by him voluntarily received as a ransom for us, His prisoners, so that he could not say he had been deceived. This is a rather degraded view, but it did, nevertheless, throw into strong light the idea of God’s justice.

Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria [330], treats of the Atonement in a way something like the modern theory; he regards it from its Godward side. Since God is just, His justice must be satisfied in working man’s salvation; the Law must not be annulled, nor the world left in perdition; therefore righteousness and compassion moved God to give His Son for the redemption of His creatures.

The next distinct theory of the Atonement is that of Anselm, Archbishop of Canterbury [1095], who wrote the Cur Deus Homo, a theory of the Incarnation and the Atonement. He takes the Godward side, and endeavours to show that the Atonement does reconcile God to man, that it not only acts on man’s heart, but that the Life and Death of Christ act on God. He views sin as an infinite debt, and the Death of Christ as having infinite merit. Reconciliation to God is needed, not because He is angry, but because He is just. A ransom has to be paid to God.

Abelard [1079–1142] brings to light the human side of the Atonement. He says that its main feature is the way in which God could touch the human heart; that God’s love is shown in giving His Son; that mankind only needed to be reconciled because they could not believe in God’s love, and that the Sacrifice of Christ is the mightiest instance of self-sacrifice. Abelard would thus reconcile man to God, who is pure unchangeable love, too high, too sublime to require a sacrifice or atonement. This is doubtless a true aspect of the Atonement, but it does not exhaust the truth.

Aquinas [1250], a man of noble mind, takes Anselm’s view of the Atonement, but brings out more fully the idea of Christ’s sufferings and death. He believes that Calvary was the object for which Christ came to earth, and emphasises—to use a sixteenth century phrase—His passive obedience (the obedience which He showed in His sufferings) as distinguished from His active obedience (the obedience He showed in His life). Aquinas points out that salvation depends on a mystical union between the Saviour and the saved.

Bonaventura, General of the Franciscans [1256], thought that although Anselm and Aquinas had shown the necessity of an Atonement, the necessity for the Atonement by the Death of Christ had not been shown, and that there might have been some other method by which God could have redeemed men.

No further speculations were made regarding the Atonement in the Middle Ages. After the Reformation we come to Grotius [d. 1645], a great juris, statesman, and theologian, who considered that punishment corresponding with guilt was not absolutely necessary to righteous government, but that it might be fit and convenient to inflict it, and who carried this legal and political idea into a theory of the Atonement which thus approached closely to that of Bonaventura.

Such are the chief landmarks in the history of the doctrine of the Work of Christ in the Atonement. No important addition has been made to these theories, but it will, perhaps, put the matter in a clearer light to state the chief ways in which that doctrine is now held or stated.

The Catholic Church in its Anglican and Roman branches, and the more important Protestant communions outside that Church, hold, in the main, the views of Anselm and Aquinas, without rejecting what is true in Abelard’s theory. The form in which the truth is expressed is, however, somewhat different within and without the Church.
This statement may be illustrated by a few extracts:

[1] Anglican Church.—"One Christ, very God, and very Man . . . truly suffered, was crucified, dead and buried, to reconcile His Father to us, and to be a sacrifice, not only for original guilt, but also for all actual sins of men" [Article II.]. "Almighty God . . . Who didst give Thine only Son Jesus Christ to suffer death upon the Cross for our redemption; who made there (by His one oblation of Himself once offered) a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction, for the sins of the whole world." [Prayer of Consecration in the Office of Holy Communion.]

[2] Roman Catholic Church.—"We must believe that Jesus Christ, our Saviour . . . offered Himself a Sacrifice for the sins of the whole world, by dying upon a cross to purchase mercy, grace, and salvation for us; and that neither mercy, nor grace, nor salvation can, or ever could since Adam's fall, be obtained any otherwise than through the death and passion of the Son of God."

"By this one offering we were completely redeemed, inasmuch our ransom was paid . . . Neither can there now be any need of His dying any more, or purchasing any other graces for us than those for which He has already paid the price of His blood." [Dr. Challoner's Garden of the Soul.]

[3] Congregationalists.—"Christ is described as a propitiation, showing the righteousness as well as the love of God, in the preternatural and pardon of sin, and revealing Him as at once the Just and the Justifier—maintaining law and yet justifying transgressors who believe in Jesus. He dies "for us," and "by His stripes we are healed." He pays the penalty we had incurred, and ransoms us from everlasting destruction. He takes our place; He expiates our offences; He bears the burden of our sins, and endures their penal consequences. From His cross we catch the inspiration of self-sacrifice." [Dr. Stoughton's Doctrine of the Atonement.]

Some follow Abelard in denying that a satisfaction or ransom for sin was necessary, or that we are to regard Christ's death in that light. Archdeacon Farrar says: "What Christ came to reveal was the love of God to man, seeking man's salvation. Of a need of compensation on God's part neither He nor His Apostles breathed a word . . . Is it not enough to say that Christ's death is the means of our life; that it is a reconciling sacrifice: that it is but one act of that sacrifice which marked the submission of His whole will to that of His Father; that it has redeemed us from the power of sin and Satan; that it was the appointed means of our regeneration, of our new life, of our ransom from the bondage of Satan, of our satisfaction for the debt of sin, of our being reconciled to God, of our hope of glory? If we believe all this . . . we may rest in the words . . . of the English Prayer Book [Art. xxxii.] and need enter no further into the transcendent and inconceivable aspect of the Atonement."

The Rev. John Page Hoppes, the Unitarian preacher, considers that "not the reconciliation of God to man, but of man to God," is needed. That "in a very profound sense it might be said that the Atonement is all that Christ is to any one—not only all that He was but all that He is." He takes the words of St. Paul, "in Christ," as going to the very heart of the subject; and says that the new moral and spiritual creation which comes of being "in Christ" is of God, as the result of the reconciling work of Christ.

There is a value in all reverent attempts to explain the Atonement, since they all help to throw light upon it; the mistake is to select one view as containing the whole truth.

It will be seen from what has been said thus far, that the different views about the work of Christ in the Atonement fall into two classes:—[a] The view of those who consider that God does not need to be reconciled to man, but man to God; and that the phrases and words which would imply the necessity for any "propitiation," "ransom," "redemption," etc., etc., are altogether metaphorical, and only variously describe the effect of the Atonement in its relation to us, that they are a condensation to our limited power of understanding the mysteries of God, and that we had better keep to the Scriptural term "reconciliation," and not use the ambiguous word "Atonement," which has been discarded in the Revised Version. [b] The view of those who consider that although man needs to be reconciled to God, God must also be reconciled to man, and that the words implying ransom, sacrifice, etc., do describe, in human terms it is true, actual verities. These terms are chiefly four:—

[1] a sin offering, an atoning sacrifice, implied in Heb. i. 3; John i. 29; xix. 36; Rev. v. 7; [2] a reconciliation, Rom. v. 11; 2 Cor. v. 19, 20; Gal. iii. 19, etc.; [3] a ransom from slavery, 1 Tim. ii. 6; [4] Satisfaction or the discharge of a debt, involved in Gal. v. 3; 2 Cor. v. 21; 1 Pet. iii. 18. We use the three last of these expressions in speaking of sin or indebtedness between man and man, and, because language possesses no better terms, the sacred writers use or imply them in describing our sin against God. Obviously they are all inadequate, since we do not understand the mystery of evil, or even of the least sin, much less the light in which they appear to God. But we cannot doubt that the terms are true as far as they go, and within the limits which the analogy of the faith places upon them.

The first phrase, that of sin offering, or atoning sacrifice, is altogether a religious one. Mankind has felt from the earliest ages the need of some sacrifice or offering either to God or to some false deity, which would put away the sense of sin. The objections brought against taking these phrases in any way literally are chiefly two: first, that this would imply a difference of will in the Persons of the Godhead—the Father willing to punish, the Son willing to pardon; and, secondly, that the punishment of an innocent man for a guilty one is immoral. To the first it may be replied that the Atonement is always represented as the outcome of the love of God the Father: “God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son” for it, and that to speak of God the Son appeasing the wrath of God the Father is, to say the least, irreverent, as well as contrary to Scripture. There can be no difference of will in the Persons of the Godhead. [TRINITY.] To the second it may be replied that the case is not that of a man who voluntarily offers himself as a substitute for a condemned criminal, but of the Incarnate Son of God who voluntarily died, apparently by the natural course of events, by civil punishment, and whose death in heaven pleased as the sacrifice that taketh away the sin of the world. There was no apparent substitution; the evil passions and the jealousy of men brought about His death in the eyes of the world: the true purpose of that death being a matter of revelation. It is simply a great and entirely unscriptural error to represent a wrathful God as smiting His innocent Son in punishment for the sins of mankind.

The Relation of the Eucharist to the Work of Christ.—The Eucharist is a continual witness to the belief of the Church in the atoning work of Christ on its sacrificial side; and in it earnest Christians have, since the time of Gregory the Great, believed that not only is the Sacrifice of Christ commemorated, but that the merits of His death and passion are pleaded in a special way for the worshippers present and for those for whom they pray. There is no repetition of the death of Christ who was “once offered,” nor any mediation again, since His sacrifice was “full, perfect, and sufficient,” but a continual and effectual pleading of His atonement before God, “for as often as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord’s death till He come” [1 Cor. xi. 26].

This pleading of the One Sacrifice of Christ, upon earth, is the counterpart of His present work in heaven, where, as “a Priest for ever” [Heb. vii. 21, 24], “He ever liveth to make intercession” [Heb. vii. 25] by continually setting forth before God the Father the one great sacrifice of His death.

The close connection between the atoning work of Christ and the Incarnation must always be remembered. [INCARNATION.] As far as we can read the Gospel scheme, unless God the Son had become incarnate He could not have been our Saviour.

Worship.—The Hebrew words so translated are from the following roots:—[1] segad, “to prostrate oneself;” a Chaldaic word found in Is. xliv., and in Daniel, and applied to obeisance done to an idol; [2] abad, “to labour for as a servant ;” [3] shachah, “to bow down before.” This last is by far the most commonly used word, from Gen. xxii. 5 to Zech. xiv. 16.

In the Greek we have [1] latreuō and the noun latresia. This is from latres, “a hired servant,” and came to mean both in heathen and Christian phraseology “to serve with sacrifices and prayers,” used in Acts xxiv. 14, Phil. iii. 3, Heb. x. 2; [2] threskeia, derivation uncertain, but probably signifies “religious fear” [Liddell and Scott.] Used very seldom [Col. ii. 18, Acts xxvi. 3, James i. 26, 27]. [3] Proskunein, lit. “to kiss the hand as a token of obeisance or homage,” and so “to prostrate oneself.” This is the most usual word in the New Testament. [4] Sebomai, “to feel awe,” applied in classical authors to honour due to parents and to the gods. Used in Matt. xxi. 9; Acts xvi. 14; xviii. 7; xix. 27, etc.

Worship comprises two elements, the inward feeling of the heart, and the outward expression of it in outward sign. The emotions of the heart towards God are manifold. Thus there is gratitude for goodness received, which is expressed in praise; there is adoration and love for the beauty of the Divine character revealed to us, which is expressed in such words as “We give thanks to Thee for Thy Great Glory,” and this we call Adoration. There is also supplication—the approach to God with requests to supply our needs, and this is Prayer.

The outward worship, therefore, is intended to express the emotions, and also to kindle them. This is admirably expressed by Canon Hoare in the following words:—

"Worship kindles emotion. I can understand a man going in to the throne of grace with a heart unmoved by deep emotion, but I cannot understand how it is possible that he should come out from it with his heart still cold, after the experience of such wonderful mercy. If love prompts worship, it must surely follow that worship will kindle love. David teaches us the twofold effect in a comparison of Psalm xviii. and Psalm cxvi. In both he declares his love for Jehovah, and in both he connects it with his worship. But there is this difference. In Ps. xviii. the love leads to the worship, and in Ps. cxvi. the worship calls forth the love. In Ps. xviii. he first says, ‘I will love Thee, O Lord,’ v. 1, and then adds as a consequence of that love, v. 3, ‘I will call upon the Lord who is worthy to be praised,’ whereas in Ps. cxvi. 1, he says, ‘I love the Lord because He hath heard the voice of my supplication.’ He loved as he went in, but he loved still more as he came out. Now if we are permitted to draw near to the throne of God, we who are not worthy so much as to gather up the crumbs under His table; we who only deserve to be outcasts from His presence for ever; if we are permitted to have the sacred privilege of speaking to Him, of drawing near to Him through the atoning blood; of calling Him Father, of being treated by Him as sons, of being admitted into the blessings of sacred intercourse, of feeding at His table, and of being ever loved by Him with an everlasting love, are we to come back just as if nothing had happened? Are we to be so cold as before? Is there to be no joy in the heart, no glow on the countenance, and no evidence either to ourselves or others that we have had the sacred privilege of being with Jesus? Surely such worship must kindle emotion.

The notices which we have of Christian worship in the New Testament are fragmentary. Brethren used to assemble together, especially on the first day of the week. The fullest passage bearing on the subject is in 1 Cor. xiv., a careful exegesis of which throws much light on Apostolic practice. After the days of the New Testament, the first notice we have of Christian worship is in the letters of the heathen Pliny [q.v.], and we get additional particulars from Justin Martyr [q.v.], who tells how in his time, "on the day called the Day of the Sun," the Christians meet to read the Gospels and the Prophets, how a sermon is preached exhorting to holy living, how prayer is said, to which the people respond with loud "Amen's," and how the Sacrament is distributed to those present and sent to the sick, and a collection is made for the poor. There is no doubt that the Holy Communion was regarded as the highest and most essential act of Christian worship, and we have given in its place an account of the earliest forms which have come down to us of that service. The liturgical use of the Old Testament Psalms is also a clear fact, and there is little doubt that distinctive Christian hymns also were in use from the beginning. The addition of these from age to age to the treasures of Church worship, forms a very striking and beautiful chapter of religious history. [HYMNS; MUSIC.]

Tastes will no doubt vary as to the admissibility of complicated music in public worship. On the one hand there are those who hold that no music should be used in the church but such as all the congregation can join in; while others maintain that, while some music should undoubtedly be of this character, so that all may be enabled to join, it is not inconsistent with the true spirit of worship that the congregation should listen to an anthem. If the thoughts are elevated and calmed by listening to such a strain as Handel's "Comfort ye," this may fairly be called "edification" such as St. Paul bade us seek. We have heard it said especially of the Nicene Creed, that to sing it is like singing a proposition of Euclid, to which it was responded that this Creed is verily a magnificent hymn, and that men can listen to it devoutly in the same spirit that they can look at a picture of the Crucifixion, or listen to the narrative of the event solemnly read. Christian people, however much their tastes and prejudices may vary, will find themselves drawn closely together in spirit so long as they pay earnest heed to the great Apostle's exhortations, "Let all things be done to edifying," and "Let all things be done decently and in order."

Worship of Angels.—It has often been asserted that the Jews used to implore the intercession of angels, the text quoted in support of this statement being Gen. xlviii. 15; and in some Jewish commentators the writers say that invocation of angels was allowed. But modern learned authorities declare that the angels referred to in this passage were no other than Christ, and they absolutely deny that worship of any kind is given to angels. We find St. Paul warning some of his converts against it, notably the Colossians, which shows that the practice was already beginning to show itself; and all through the days of the early Church the different writers, such as Augustine and Irenæus, are constantly uttering protests; and the Council of Laodicea put forth this Canon: "Christians ought not to forsake the Church of God and go aside and hold conventicles, to invoke or call upon the names of angels; which things are forbidden. If any one, therefore, be found to exercise himself in this private idolatry, let him be accursed; because he hath forsaken our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and gone over to idolatry." The Roman Catholics, nevertheless, are taught to ask the angels to intercede for them, and Zech. i. 12 is quoted in defence. But Protestants hold that this by no means justifies them in addressing prayers to the angels; and that the prayers offered by the four-and-twenty elders [Rev. v. 8], another passage constantly quoted, are their own and not those of the Church.

Wotton, Sir Henry, scholar and poet, [b. at Boughton-Malherbe, Kent, 1568; d. at Eton, 1639], was educated at Winchester, and New College, Oxford, afterwards removed to Queen's College in 1586, and took his M.A.; here he gave some Latin lectures, and won great applause from the professors for the knowledge which they displayed. He became the friend and pupil of Albericus Gentilis, then Professor of Civil Law at Oxford, who taught him mathematics, and gave him a thorough instruction in the Italian language. He travelled in France, Germany, and Italy for nine years, studying various arts and sciences, and making the acquaintance of many of the most learned men of the age. After his return to England he became secretary to the Earl of Essex, with whom he travelled in Spain and Ireland; he is said to have been a party to the plots in which Essex was engaged, but there is not sufficient ground for the accusation. After the death of Essex Wotton went to Italy, and there wrote The State of Christendom, giving an account of the intrigues carried on in the Courts of Europe. James I. sent him three times to the Continent as ambassador, but at Augsburg he wrote his famous definition of an ambassador, Legatus est vir bonus peregre missus ad mentandum reipublica causa ["An ambassador is a good man sent abroad to lie for the good of his country"], which gave offence to the King and caused his recall. In 1623 he was made Provost of Eton, and, believing himself called upon to take orders, he was ordained deacon in 1627. Izak Walton collected his works under the title of Reliquiae Wottonianae. He is now chiefly remembered by his religious Meditations, Letters, and Poems.

Wulfran, Sr., a monk of the Gallican Church, born at Maurilly in 650, spent his early youth in the court of King Clothaire III., but determined to devote his life to God, and so entered the monastery of Fontenelle, in Normandy, on which he bestowed his estate. In 682 he was made Bishop of Sens, and two years and a half afterwards journeyed with some monks of Fontenelle to Friesland, which he hoped to convert. He baptised the son of King Radbod, and several of the Frisians were converted, chiefly, legend says, on account of the miracles which the Christians worked. These so astonished Radbod that he also wished to be baptised; but on hearing that his ancestors must be in hell, having died heathens, he refused to go on, declaring that he would not be separated from them. St. Wulfran died at Fontenelle, April 29th, 720. His relics were removed to Abbeville, of which town he is the patron.

Wulfstan, Sr., Bishop of Worcester from 1062 to 1095. He is regarded as the patron saint of Worcester, being the founder of the present cathedral. He built it in place of one erected by St. Oswald, which, together with the monastery, had become too small for the needs of the monks. He died at an advanced age, and was buried in his cathedral. The fame of miracles said to be wrought at his tomb caused Hubert, Archbishop of Canterbury, and other ecclesiastics, to pay it a visit of inquiry, and, on their report, Wulfstan was canonised by Innocent III. in 1203.

Wycliffe, John.—Wycliffe's biographers have not discovered the exact date of his birth, but most probably he was born in 1324, near Rokey, in Yorkshire; died at Lutterworth, 1384. We know very little of his early days—surprisingly little when compared to the full and detailed account his biographers are able to give of him when he had attained middle age. He left home when he was about sixteen for Oxford, not to return. The college at which he studied is uncertain, some saying Queen's, some Merton, and others Balliol. That he was elected Master of Balliol in 1361 no one seems to doubt, and he held some office in Oxford till the end of his life, in addition to various livings. At this time he began to be famous on account of various Latin treatises, but he comes especially into prominence in 1366. In that year the King's Council absolutely refused to pay the annual tribute to Rome which had been promised by John in 1213, and Wycliffe's influence was mainly the cause of this decision. He was always in disfavour with the Roman Court afterwards, but at the same time he gained a powerful patron in John of Gaunt, the third son of Edward III. The next matter to which he turned his mind was that of limiting the power of the clergy—more especially with regard to secular affairs. In consequence of their being the only class of educated men, the custom had sprung up of allowing all offices in the State to be filled with clergy. Wycliffe published a protest against this custom which said: "Neither prelates nor doctors, priests nor deacons shall hold secular offices; that is, those of Chancery, Treasury, Privy Seal, and other such secular offices in the Exchequer; neither be stewards of lands, nor stewards of the hall, nor clerks of the kitchen, nor clerks of accounts; neither be occupied in any secular office in lords' courts, more especially while secular men are sufficient to do such offices." In 1373 he went to Bruges with John of Gaunt, who was at the head of a commission appointed to inquire whether the Pope had the right of filling up vacant Sees and livings in England. Wycliffe came back to England very bitter against the Pope and the way in which he exercised his power, and determined to destroy that power in England in every way he could. His preaching became bolder, and he attacked unflinchingly the corruption of the Church. He denied the supreme power of the Pope in a tract called Dominions founded in Grace; did not deny that the Pope was God's representative on earth, but asserted the right of each individual conscience to think and act for itself. These doctrines drew upon him the anger of many of the Bishops; and in 1376 he was cited to appear before a special Council of them at St. Paul's. He was accompanied by his faithful patron John of Gaunt, and Lord Henry Percy. Before the inquiry began, a quarrel arose between Percy and the retainers of the Bishops, which soon ended in an unseemly brawl. the result of which was that the Court was obliged to rise, and Wycliffe was dismissed without having any questions put to him. In the following year a Bull arrived in England ordering Wycliffe to be excommunicated; but, owing to the death of King Edward III., which occurred in this year, Parliament was prorogued before having given its consent. The Bull was, therefore, sent to Oxford with instructions to the authorities to see that the conditions were carried into effect. The University asked time for consideration, and ended by taking no notice of the Bull. The matter then fell into the hands of the Bishops, who showed themselves more anxious to put a stop to Wycliffe's teaching, and in April, 1378, he was summoned to appear at Lambeth. He had no influential supporters with him; but a throng of citizens, who had been led to adopt the new doctrines, would not allow the sentence of excommunication to be passed. They shouted out continually, "The Pope's briefs shall have no effect in England without the King's consent;" and they proved themselves so powerful that the Archbishop was obliged to dismiss Wycliffe with only a warning against preaching obnoxious doctrine. The schism in the Court of Rome, when Urban VI. reigned in Rome and Clement VII. at Avignon, shocked many faithful Catholics, and the result was a greater inclination to listen to the teaching of Wycliffe. He had now begun to attack the evils of monasticism. In order to make a firm opposition to the various orders of Preaching Friars, Wycliffe started a school at Oxford for graduates, whom he taught himself, and then sent them to all parts of the country. These "poor preachers," as they were called, had no power to sell pardons, or take confessions, but simply went from village to village preaching and visiting the sick. At the same time Wycliffe was writing several tracts on the Roman doctrine of Transubstantiation, which he had come to look upon as erroneous, and was also preparing for his translation of the Bible. The New Testament was ready first, and this part is entirely his own work. The Old, which followed soon after, was brought out under his eye; but the actual translation of some parts was done by a faithful follower of his—Nicholas Hereford. By this time he had a large number of followers, and a Romanist chronicler writes: "A man could not meet two people on the road but one of them was a disciple of Wycliffe." He was now ill and broken in health, so he retired to his quiet village of Lutterworth, where he died. The Council of Constance in 1415 declared his writings to be heretical, and commanded that "his body and bones, if they could be distinguished from those of the faithful, should be disinterred and cast away from consecrated ground." This decree was disregarded for thirteen years, but at the end of that time was carried into effect by express command of the Pope. The bones were burnt and thrown into the river Swift. "Thus," says Thomas Fuller, "this brook did convey his ashes into Avon, the Avon into the Severn, the Severn into the narrow sea, and this into the wide ocean. And so the ashes of Wycliffe are the emblem of his doctrine, which is now dispersed all the world over."

Wykeham, William of. [William of Wykeham.]

 Wynwaloe, St., Abbot, born in the fifth century in Brittany, of pious Welsh parents, who consecrated him to God from his birth. He was placed in the monastery of St. Budeo, in the island of Brehat; under him he made such progress that he was sent at the head of eleven other monks to lay the foundation of a new monastery. For this purpose they chose Landevance, near Brest, and here they lived in great austerity. In 818 their Order was united with that of St. Benedict. St. Wynwaloe died in 529 at an advanced age, just after celebrating the mass. March 3rd is the day on which he is commemorated. He was buried in his own church, but when Brittany was ravaged by the Normans, his relics were removed from place to place, and are now at Ghent and Montreuil. We have given his name as known in England; in Brittany he is called Guignole or Venole; in Picardy, Vignevaly or Walovo, and in other parts of France, Guingalols.

Wythburga, St., daughter of Anna, King of East Anglia, sister to Saint Ethelburga [q.v.]. She led an austere life, first at Holkham, and afterwards at Dereham, in Norfolk, where she laid the foundation of a church and nunnery, but did not live till their completion. She died in 743, and in 974 her relics were translated to Ely, and buried near those of her sisters.

Xavier, Francis.—One of the noblest names in the history of missionary enterprise. He was born April 7th, 1506, in Castle Xavier, Navarre. His father was a nobleman at the Court of the King of Navarre; his mother, the beautiful heiress of the Xavier family. Both parents were pious as well as wise. Francis was their youngest son, and as he grew up was behind none of his brothers in athletic accomplishments. But he soon announced his intention of becoming a scholar, and at the age of seventeen was sent to the college of St. Barbara at Paris. He showed the strength of his resolution, for he took the first place in each study to which he applied himself, whilst he still enjoyed the pleasures and excitements of bodily exercise. When he was twenty he became Professor of Philosophy at Beauvais, and soon won for himself a high name. After he had been there a year and a half his classes were attended by a new pupil, mean-looking, lame, uncouth, slovenly. He was older than Xavier, and in spite of his mean appearance seemed to have that in him which called for respect. His name was Ignatius Loyola. Xavier did not like him, but the pupil seemed much attracted to his master, and gradually gained an influence over him which he used in the endeavour to wear him from his merry and pleasure-loving life. As often as Xavier spoke of any amusement Loyola responded with the question, "What shall it profit a man if he shall gain," etc. Xavier at first treated this as one of his pupil's eccentricities, but at length, after some five years' intercourse, yielded himself altogether to the new influence, especially as his pleasure-hunting life had involved him in difficulties out of which Loyola had helped him. The latter then proceeded to tell him his own previous history. [LOYOLA.] And thus the order of things became reversed, and Xavier became the pupil of Ignatius Loyola, and entered heartily into his scheme for the foundation of his new Order. The history of this Order belongs elsewhere. [ Jesuits.]

Xavier and his friend were ordained in 1534, and desired to go to evangelise Palestine, but it was not until seven years after that the Pope's doubts as to their usefulness were removed.

During these years, however, Xavier's labours seem to have been wonderful. He preached in one Italian town after another from church steps and market-crosses, by roadsides and in crowded fairs, and, when not so occupied, learned nursing in hospitals, or studied artisan labour, such as might be turned to account in distant lands.

At length on April 7th, 1541, he set sail for the East Indies, in friar's frock, crucifix on his heart, Bible and Breviary in his hands. All the time of the voyage he made the ship his parish, preached as often as he might, prayed with the crew, and both by day and night for them. The ship wintered at Mozambique, and Xavier, whilst ministering in the hospital there, caught a malignant fever, which nearly cost him his life. On May 6th, 1542, he arrived at Goa, the Portuguese capital of India. There was a nominally Christian colony there, even a bishop, but of real religion there seemed none. The Portuguese were frightfully profligate, and the natives who had been made converts had in disgust fallen back for the most part into heathenism. But Xavier knew who was on his side, and addressed himself to what many men would have regarded as a hopeless task. He resolved to reform the colonists first, went in and out of hospitals, and begged almost from door to door for the sick. Then he got a bell, and rang it through the streets like a crier, until he had gathered an audience to whom to preach.

"Parents," he would cry, "I have a message to you; send me your children, and I will teach them how to be obedient; send me your slaves and I will teach them how to serve you more faithfully. Come to me yourselves, for I have glad tidings of great joy to you. But now send me your children." The children came, and he addressed them: "Come, my children, that I may tell you of One who loves you dearly, who has prepared for you in His own beautiful country a home of joys past all understanding. I will tell you the way to it. I will tell you also stories of that same good Lord, who was once a little child like you, and all that He did and suffered for your sakes." So a year passed. Many of the evildoers hated his solemn speech about the judgment to come, but the children all loved him, and the simple holiness of his life and his burning eloquence began to tell effectually upon the parents. Morals sensibly improved at Goa under his ministry. But a call came to him to visit the pearl-fishers 600 miles away, a miserable race who had been baptised, but then left alone, no one willing to go near them. Among these he settled himself, lived as they did, on rice, preached to them by signs till he could learn their language, taught them to read and write, and persuaded them to build themselves chapels. Writing to Ignatius Loyola he poured forth his delight at the success he was receiving. Then he returned to Goa, and having organised a college for native teachers there, he returned to the pearl-fishers with a staff of helpers. He found his poor flock in dreadful misery. A neighbouring tribe had attacked them, and carried off all their substance. Hundreds had died of starvation, and the rest were homeless. He sent to the nearest station for provisions, which he distributed among the sufferers, whilst he resumed his simple life among them. Each morning he called them to worship, all day he taught the children, visited the sick, or went into neighbouring villages; at twilight he once more called them to worship, then he betook himself to study and prayer far into the night. He only took three and a half hours of sleep. After a while, leaving some of his companions there, he pushed on to the kingdom of Travan- core, and in one month baptised 10,000 persons. The people, on his persuasion, destroyed their idols, and built thirty churches. The angry Brahmins waylaid him with arrows, and burned down houses that he frequented, but the people, who called him "the great father," organised themselves into a perpetual body-guard to protect him, and the work of evangelising still prospered. He next fixed on Malacca as a centre of labour, choosing it because it was (as it is still) the great mart between India, China and Japan. He thought that it was "the wickedest place in the world." Again he was seen with his bell morning and evening, calling with a loud voice on his hearers to "pray for those who were living in sin." But he was not to remain here long. He made a convert of a young Japanese named Angerso, who entreated him to go and work in Japan. It was 3,000 miles off, but Xavier, having left five friends newly arrived from Europe to carry on his work, arrived in Japan in August, 1549, though friends had warned him that he would be surely put to death. He had learned Japanese on the voyage. He found the people, as St. Paul had found the Athenians, very sharp-witted and clever, but wholly given to idolatry. Christianity was entirely unknown. When he had made a few converts he placed them in charge of Angerso, whom he had baptised by the name of Paul, and went on through the country barefooted, with a staff, a mat, and a wallet, and the sacred vessels, as his only possessions. He had never suffered so much privation as here, and never was so happy. Conversion everywhere followed his preaching. Persecuted in one city be fled to another, and still God visibly blessed his labours. He built chapels and ordained elders, and at length left a flourishing mission, and returned to Malacca in 1552, full of an even greater project than he had yet undertaken. This was to attempt the conversion of China.

But at Malacca he found a plague raging, and with magnificent skill as well as courage he used his medical knowledge so well that soon the sickness abated, for he put heart into the terror-stricken. But on applying for a convoy to China he failed. The Portuguese feared the loss of trade, and would not give him a passage. When at length he obtained a small ship at an exorbitant price, they found it out and stopped him. He contrived, indeed, to reach Sancian, an island opposite Macao, but he could get no further. Whilst he was still looking for fresh opportunities he was seized with fever, and, foreseeing his approaching end, he was taken to the ship's hospital; but finding his prayers hindered here, he begged to be taken back to the shore. A sailor put up a rough tent of tarpaulin to shelter him from the burning sun, and left him. There unattended, alone with the Good Shepherd, he died on the 2nd of December, 1552. His body was carried to Goa for burial.

Xerophagia [Gr. xeros, "dry," and phagio, "I eat".—The name given to a fast kept by the early Church during the six days of Holy Week, in which nothing was eaten but bread and salt, though afterwards pulse, herbs, and fruit were added. This fast was not compulsory, and we find the Church condemning the Montanists, who not only made it so but also added other fasts.

Ximenes de Cisneros, Francis, Cardinal, a celebrated Spanish ecclesiastic and statesman, was born at Torrelaguna in Castile in 1436, died 1517. He was educated at Alcalá de Henares, Salamanca, and Rome, where he obtained from the Pope a prospective nomination as Prebendary in Toledo Cathedral. The Archbishop refused to allow the claim, and, when Ximenes persisted in it, put him into prison, where he remained for six years. On his release, in 1480, he was made Vicar-General to Cardinal Mendoza, Bishop of Sigüenza. He showed great administrative talent, but, in 1482, suddenly gave up his office and entered a Franciscan monastery at Toledo; but becoming famed for his asceticism, retired to a lonely monastery at Castañar. In 1492 he was recalled to become Confessor to Queen Isabella, over whom he gained great influence, and three years after she appointed him Archbishop of Toledo, which post he refused till ordered to accept it by the Pope. This preformament was, next to the Papacy, the richest in the Church; but Ximenes, though obliged openly to maintain great splendour, lived privately with as great asceticism as when a monk, and devoted the whole of the revenues of his See to charitable and religious purposes. In his seventieth year Pope Julius II. gave him a cardinal's hat. On the death of King Ferdinand, in 1516, he became Regent till the arrival of Charles V., and died on the way to meet him at Boceguillas, near Aranda de Duero, in 1517. Ximenes held extreme views, and was a strong Ultramontanist. He was Grand Inquisitor of Spain, and strongly opposed the translation of the Scriptures into the vulgar tongue on the principle of not giving holy things to the profane. He was harsh in his measures towards the Moors, and it was by his advice that they were finally ordered to leave Spain in 1492. But he was sincere and patriotic, and clear of all suspicion of self-aggrandisement in his public life. He founded the University of Alcalá, and, assisted by other eminent scholars, undertook the grand Complutensian Polyglot. [Polyglot, Complutensian.]

Year, The Ecclesiastical.—The Christian Year is that arrangement of seasons which commemorates one by one the great facts in the life of Christ, and the doctrines which spring out of them. Some account of these seasons will be found under their respective headings; it remains for us here to set forth a conspectus of them as a whole.

The first is Advent, which commemorates the coming of Christ into the world in His great humility, and also bids us look for His second coming. The two subjects are closely blended together in the Advent services, especially in the Epistles and Gospels. There are four Sundays in Advent, which is followed by Christmas, the great festival of the Incarnation, to which are appended three commemorations, respectively of one who died in the prime of life, of little children dying in infancy, and of the Apostle who died in extreme old age—all ages alike sanctified and redeemed by the Incarnation. On January 1st, that being the eighth day after Christmas, is kept the feast of the CIRCUMCISION. The Epiphany season, starting with the visit of the wise men, brings before us the Manifestation of Christ during His sojourn on earth. Thus the Gospel for the first Sunday after Epiphany shows us Christ in His boyhood, sitting among the doctors, and declaring that He must be about His Father’s business; they are the first recorded words of His that we have. On the second Sunday we have His first miracle, a simple act of creation, almost the only miracle of His that has nought to do with suffering, carrying us back in thought to the original Eden. The third Sunday shows Him the healer of sickness; the fourth the restorer of peace after disorder, both in the natural and spiritual world; the fifth and sixth, the future judge. The Epiphany season varies in length according as Easter comes early or late. A marked change then follows, as is shown by the names for the three Sundays, Septuagesima, Sexagesima, Quinquagesima (‘Seventieth,’ ‘Sixtieth,’ ‘Fiftieth’), so called because they are in round numbers so many days before Easter. Though these are not a season of fasting, there is a sombre hue upon them. The special portions of Scripture speak of self-denial and of judgment; the first lessons begin with Genesis, and show us man in his original state, and man fallen. Quinquagesima, the Sunday before Lent, brings before us the supreme necessity, in all religious exercises and works of cultivating love as the most needful grace of all. Then comes the season of Lent, in which are blended most closely the humiliation and sufferings of Christ, and the Christian work of repentance for sin. EASTER [q.v.] follows, the Queen of Festivals, and then the Sundays after Easter, covering the great forty days during which Christ showed Himself before His Ascension. On the fortieth day comes ASCENSION DAY, or Holy Thursday, and ten days after that WHITSUNDAY. The series of festivals closes with TRINITY SUNDAY. These seasons together make up, as nearly as possible, half the year; they are followed by the Sundays after Trinity. It has been pointed out by commentators on the Liturgy, that whereas in the first half, the Gospel for the Sunday shows us the special event commemorated, and the Epistle is the comment upon it, in the second half the Epistle seems to have been first selected as setting forth some Christian duty, and the Gospel to have been chosen as the commentary upon it. Further information will be found under the heads FASTS, FESTIVALS, MOVABLE FEASTS, ETC., DIONYSIUS EXIGUS, PASCHAL CONTROVERSIES.

The Civil Year in the Old Style ended on the 25th of March, though the old Parish Registers show that the present mode of computing had come greatly into vogue before the alteration of styles. During the Stuart period it is very common to find the registers between January and Lady Day marking both methods, and so leaving it an open question whether Feb. was [e.g.] in 1649 or 1650.

Yezidees.—A singular sect who inhabit the neighbourhood of Mosul and Nineveh. It is difficult to ascertain what their religious tenets really are, owing to their fear of persecution from the Turks, who will not allow the free exercise of religion to any who do not possess sacred books, so they pass themselves off as Mohammedans, Christians, or Jews, as most convenient at the time. Their name is derived from Azad, the ancient name for God, and they say Yezidees means worshipers of God. They believe in a supreme Creator, and they look upon Satan as the chief angel, suffering punishment for a time, but hereafter to be restored to favour, and from their superstitions regarding the necessity of propitiating him have been considered devil-worshippers. They practise circumcision, keep a fast of forty days in the spring, use Jewish names for the archangels in whom they believe, have four orders of ministers, reverence the Koran, the Pentateuch, the Psalms, and the Gospels, and on New Year’s Day hold a propitiatory service to Satan. They guard their real tenets with the greatest mystery.

Yogis, the followers of a particular form of philosophy among the Hindoos. The name is derived from Sanskrit “yuy” to join (cognate with Lat. “junx.” and Greek ευξευ), and the object aimed at is the being joined to the Divine Being, by keeping the mind unmodified by passion, and overcoming all desires. The methods are many. Thus one philosopher held that union with the Supreme might be attained by pondering on one single accepted truth; another, by practising benevolence, tenderness, complacency, disregard of either happiness or grief. By such means the mind becomes clear, as the pure crystal is seen to be free from colour when a coloured object is removed from behind it. Then came certain ascetic practices, for the purpose of securing concentration. They comprise regulations of respiration, long-continued holding of the breath, sitting in different attitudes (of which eighty-four are enumerated), fixing the eyes on the tip of the nose, etc. Such practices were a fruitful source of hypocrisy and imposture.

York, ARCHBISHOP OF.—There is no doubt that Christianity was introduced into the north of England during the period of the Roman power, but no authentic records of its progress have been left, and it is usual to place Paulinus at the head of the list of prelates of York. Paulinus was one of those missionaries sent over by Gregory the Great with Augustine to convert the Anglo-Saxons. Edwin, King of Northumbria, married Ethelhursa, daughter of King Ethelbert of Kent; and Paulinus, being duly consecrated to the Episcopate, accompanied her to her northern home that she might have the free exercise of the Christian religion in which she had been brought up. It was some time before Edwin was converted to Christianity, but at length he and the heathen high-priest Coifi, having listened to Paulinus’s story of the Gospel, were so impressed with its truth, that Coifi himself destroyed the great pagan temple at Godmündham; and on Easter Day, 627, Edwin, Coifi, and many nobles were baptised at York, then called Eboracum. The King caused a small stone church to be erected on the place, and this became the forerunner of the present glorious minster. Paulinus then went about preaching through Northumbria, which embraced all the country between the Humber and the Forth and Clyde. He is said to have built a church on the present site of Lincoln Cathedral, and also to have founded the minster of Southwell. Edwin was killed while fighting against Penda in the battle of Hatfield Chase in 633. Ethelhursa had to fly for safety to Kent, and she was accompanied by Paulinus, who was shortly after made Bishop of Rochester, where he died in 644. Northumbria under these untoward circumstances fell back into Paganism; Oswald, the grandson of Edwin, on regaining his kingdom, applied to Iona, in whose monastery he had learned Christianity, to send him some monks to evangelise his people. Accordingly, in 635 St. Aidan was consecrated Bishop and sent over, the small island of Lindisfarne being given to him as his episcopal seat. [AIDAN, ST.; LINDISFARNE.] On Aidan’s death, in 651, another monk, Finnán, from Iona, filled his place; then Colman, 661, and Tuda, 664; but these must be regarded as bishops of the Northern Province, and not of Northumbria as a whole. In 664 the famous ST. WILFRID [q.v.] was chosen Bishop of Northumbria, and went to Gaul to be consecrated; during his absence of three years King Osy appointed St. CHAD [q.v.]; but on Wilfrid’s return he resigned the See, and was soon after appointed by Archbishop Theodore to the See of Mercia [LICHFIELD]. [For the division of the See in Wilfrid’s time by Theodore see WILFRID, ST.; LINDISFARNE; HEXHAM; WITHERNE.] John, called also St. John of Beverley, from his having found that monastery, became Bishop of York in 705; he is one of the most famous of northern saints, and was the pupil of St. HILDA [q.v.]. He was canonised in 1037 by Benedict IX. Egbert [732–766] was the first Archbishop of York, receiving the pall in 753 from Gregory III., and all other bishops of the Northern Province were considered as his suffragans. He wrote several books, the chief one being a Pontifical; or, Book of Episcopal Offices. Bede's Ecclesiastical History was dedicated to him. He founded the School of York and the library connected with it. ALCUIN [q.v.] was educated in this school. From 812 to 928 little is known of the ecclesiastical history of York beyond the record of the names of its prelates. Then came Wulstan, appointed to the See by Athelstan; but he afterwards allied himself to the Danes. In 956 we find both Archbishops to be men of Danish blood—Odo of Canterbury and Osykel of York. In 972 came ST. OSWALD [q.v.], who was also Bishop of Worcester. Aldred [1060–1069] held at various times the Sees of Sherborne, Hereford, and Worcester. He was the first English bishop who made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem. In 1066 he crowned Harold, but transferred his allegiance to the Conqueror, whom he also crowned at Westminster. Next in 1069 came the first Norman Bishop, Thomas of Bayeux; he and Lanfranc disputed as to the supremacy of Canterbury over York. It was decided that the northern archbishops should swear allegiance to Canterbury and be consecrated in Canterbury Cathedral. The minister of York had been destroyed by fire in the devastation caused by the Conqueror; this, Thomas rebuilt and completely reorganised, appointing archdeacons to assist him in the supervision of the clergy. He re-established the Benedictines, and restored Whithby Abbey and St. Mary’s, of York. Thurstan [1114–1140] was a remarkable man, the great restorer of monastic discipline and organisation in the north. For five years the dispute between Canterbury and York was renewed. Thurstan refused to acknowledge the supremacy of Canterbury, and went to Rome to get the matter settled. Pope Calixtus II. consecrated him there, and on his return to York Henry I. was furious and dispossessed him of all the property belonging to the See; but in 1119 the Pope determined that York should be freed from all submission to Canterbury, and published a Bull to that effect. Thurstan took part in the battle of the Standard in 1138. Six new Augustinian houses were founded in Yorkshire in his time, and he introduced the Cistercians into the north, founding the abbeys of Kivavaux and Fountains, the latter on his own property. William Fitz-Herbert [1140], known as St. William of York, was Archbishop but a short time; he was canonised on account of his supposed murder by the mixture of poison in the chalice, and of miracles said to be wrought at his tomb. Roger de Pont l’Evêque [1154–1181] was a great politician; it is said to have been through his representations of Becket’s conduct that Henry II. uttered the words which caused St. Thomas’s murder. He rebuilt the choir of his minster and his palace at York. Geoffery Plantagenet, an illegitimate son of Henry II., held the archbishopric from 1191–1207. In that year he fled from John, who seized on the temporalities of the See for himself, and no archbishop was appointed till 1215, when Walter de Gray was consecrated. He was employed by Henry III. on important diplomatic service, and was a great benefactor to his See. Among other things he bought Bishopthorpe, where he built a palace. A list of bishops will be found at the end of this article. We need only particularise John Thursby [1352], of whom a short life is given [Thurbsay, John] and Richard Scroope [1398], who was executed for high treason in 1405.

A little wooden hut was the beginning of York Minster, over which, as we have seen, rose a larger church of stone finished by Oswald in 642. This was repaired by St. Wilfrid about 720, and destroyed by fire in 741, rebuilt by Bishop Egbert [732-766], and demolished by the Danes. Thomas of Bayeux rebuilt the church, but it was again partially burnt in 1137, in the time of Thurstan. Roger took in hand the work of restoration, and rebuilt the choir and crypt on a larger scale. Walter de Gray [1215-1255] in all probability built the south transept as it now exists. The central tower was built in 1260 by John Romaine, the treasurer. In 1291 Archbishop Romaine removed the early Norman nave of Thomas of Bayeux, and began to build the present one, which was finished by Archbishop Melton in 1335. In 1361 Archbishop Thoresby began the Lady Chapel and Presbytery, which were finished in 1373, and between that time and the close of the century the Norman choir was taken down and the present one built. In 1472 the church was re-consecrated and dedicated anew to St. Peter the Apostle. In 1829 the choir was set on fire by a maniac named Jonathan Martin, and so much damage was done that it cost £65,000 to repair it. Another fire, in 1840, destroyed the south-west tower and entire nave roof, which were repaired at a cost of £22,000. It is impossible, in the narrow limits of such a work as this, to give more than the dates of the building of the principal parts of what Sir Walter Scott calls “the most august of temples, the noble Minster of York.”

The Diocese of York consists of York City, the entire East Riding, part of North and West Riding, and comprises 631 benefices. The chapter consists of a dean, four archdeacons, four canons, five minor canons, and thirty prebendaries. The income of the See is £10,000 per annum.

The Province of York comprises, speaking roughly, the ancient kingdom of Northumbria. Its two original Sees were York, founded in 625, and Lindisfarne in 634. York, in course of time, branched out into York, Carlisle [1133], and Ripon, 1836. Out of Chester have been formed the two new Sees of Manchester [1847] and Liverpool [1879]. Wakefield is arranged for. Lindisfarne changed to Chester-le-Street, and this again into Durham.

Chester was transferred from the Province of Canterbury to York in 1541.

Zanchi, BASILIO, Latin poet [b. at Bergamo, 1501; d. at Rome, 1558]. He gave himself to the study of theology, and entered the order of Regular Canons in 1524. He, like many others of his order, lived away from his convent, and when, in 1558, Paul IV. issued an order that this liberty would no longer be granted, Zanchi refused to return to seclusion, and was therefore imprisoned at Rome, where he died the same year. He wrote comments on the Bible, and among his Latin poems is one called De Horto Sophici, in which he explains the chief dogmas of Christianity.

Zanchi, GIROLAMO, theological controversialist, cousin of the preceding, was born at Alzano, in the province of Bergamo, in 1516; died at Heidelberg, 1590. He entered the Order of the Regular Canons at the Lateran in 1531, but having studied the writings of the German Reformers, he embraced their doctrines, and, in consequence, was obliged to flee from Italy. He went to Heidelberg, where he taught divinity. He was particularly attached to the doctrines of Calvin, and in 1560 took a zealous and assiduous part in the great controversy at Strasbourg between Zwingle and Calvin on the doctrine of Predestination. In 1572 he also bore an energetic part in the Anti-Trinitarian controversy, and wrote De tribus Elohim. His theological and controversial works were collected and published in eight volumes at Geneva in 1619.

Zend-Avesta. [Parsees.]

Zeno, founder of the Stoic Philosophy [q.v.], born in Cyprus, in the latter part of the fourth century before Christ. He is said to have adopted the Cynic doctrine of contempt for riches through having been shipwrecked at the age of thirty, and losing all his property. Coming to Athens, near to which his misfortune happened, he attached himself in turn to the various schools of philosophy there, and at length opened one of his own, in order to set forth the results of his inquiries, and develop his own peculiar system. For this purpose he selected "the Painted Porch" (Stoa) in which to lecture, whence the name "Stoic." And here he held his school, it is said, until his ninety-eighth year. The Athenians honoured him with a golden crown, and gave him a public burial at his death, and his countrymen erected a monument to his honour. And indeed, in spite of its weaknesses and drawbacks, the Stoic philosophy had noble elements in it, inculcating courage, manly energy, endurance, simplicity, reverence for goodness. Much that was noble in the Roman character is to be traced to it, and the finest character among the emperors, Marcus Aurelius, was a Stoic philosopher. None of Zeno's writings, beyond the titles, have been preserved.

Zeno, Sr., Confessor, Bishop of Verona, supposed to have been born between the baptism of the Latins and an African, was consecrated Bishop in 382, in the reign of Julian the Apostate. St. Zeno devoted himself earnestly to the extirpation of heresies, and attacked with great zeal the Arians and Pelagians; he also baptised every year numbers of converts from idolatry. The cause of the Church prospered at Verona under his episcopate to such an extent that people flocked to hear him, and it is said that he had so impressed upon his people the duty of hospitality, that no one ever came to ask alms or to lodge at Verona without being generously entertained. After the defeat of the Romans at Adrianople by the Goths, the victors brought numbers of captives to Verona, who, through the charity and solicitations of the inhabitants, were many of them released or rescued from a cruel death. Mention is made of the numerous ordinations held by St. Zeno, and of the virgins whom he consecrated to God. He died at Verona in 380, on April 12th, on which day he is commemorated in the Roman Martyrology. The works ascribed to Zeno are Sancti Zenonis Episcopi Sermones, and a Catechism.

Zinzendorf, Nicolaus Ludwis, Count von.—The founder of the present sect of Moravian Brethren [q.v.] [b. at Dresden, 1700; d. at Herrnhut, Upper Lusatia, 1760]. His father died while Nicolaus was in his infancy, and he was brought up by his grandmother, the Baroness von Gersdorf, who sent him, in 1710, to be educated at Halle, under the care of Francke, the philanthropist. Here he spent six years, displaying much industry and talent in his studies; and he founded among his schoolfellows a religious society, to which he gave the name of Der Orden von Senfkorn, "The Order of the Grain of Mustard-seed." A strong feeling of Pictism was then existing at Halle, and influenced the boy's whole life. He was sent in 1716 to Wittenberg, and afterwards travelled through Holland and France, remaining some time at Paris, but careful to avoid, as far as possible, the temptations of the Court. Upon his return to Dresden he was made a member of the State Council of Saxony; but he had little liking for political life, and retired with his newly married wife to his residence in Upper Lusatia. Here he found a settlement of some of the Moravian Brethren, who had fled thither from persecution, and to whom he gave permission to build a house on his estate, which was afterwards increased, and called the Herrnhut, "Tabernacle of the Lord." Zinzendorf now devoted all his spare time to furthering the welfare of the sect, for whom he wrote hymns, preached, and translated the Scriptures. In 1734 he was ordained a minister of the Lutheran Church; but was banished from Saxony two years later, on a charge of introducing new and strange doctrines. He went to Holland, and there founded a Moravian colony. He was made Bishop of the Moravians, and founded colonies in Livonia and Esthonia. In 1737 he came to England, and made the acquaintance of John and Charles Wesley, and in 1741 he went to North America, where he founded the colony of Bethlehem. He returned to Herrnhut in 1747, and remained there till his death, with a few interruptions for missionary work in North America. Zinzendorf wrote numerous works both in prose and verse, and composed many hymns for the use of the Moravian Congregation; his writings abound in passages of deep thought and beauty, but occasionally become incoherent in their mysticism.
Ziska, or Zizka, John, of Trocznow.—The leader of the Hussites (b. at Trocznow in Bohemia, about 1360, the son of a Bohemian nobleman; d. at the siege of the castle of Przibislav, in 1424). He was first a page at the Court of King Wenceslas of Bohemia, and afterwards fought for a time as a volunteer in the English army in France; he then went to Poland and served under King Ladislas against the Teutonic Knights. He distinguished himself at the battle of Tannenberg, and was loaded with high honours; and at the battle of Agincourt in 1415 he also acquitted himself honourably. He was now a zealous follower of John Huss, and was roused to indignation by the cruelties heaped upon his leader and colleagues; a party was formed by several of the more patriotic and religious nobles, one of whom was Ziska, who endeavoured to rouse the King to oppose the cruel decisions of the Council of Constance. In 1419 Ziska headed an outbreak of the Hussites at Prague, where the rebels avenged themselves with interest for the wrongs done by the Roman Catholics; and the news proved fatal to the weak-minded King Wenceslas, who had never summoned up sufficient courage to take any steps to prevent a catastrophe. Sigismund, brother of Wenceslas, arrived with a large army to take possession of the throne, but was defeated by the Hussites, who followed up their advantage by the capture of the castle of Prague [1621]. Their chief stronghold, Tabor, procured for them the name of Taborites. Ziska became totally blind by a wound received while besieging the castle of Rabi; but he continued to hold the command of the Hussite army, and gained a series of victories which have had few parallels in history. Sigismund's second army was defeated in 1422, and driven back into Moravia; in the same year the German army, headed by Frederick of Saxony and the Elector of Brandenburg, was routed at Aussig; and Ziska gained ten other battles, convincing Sigismund that it was hopeless to attempt the conquest of Bohemia. He therefore proposed to make a treaty with the Hussites; but before matters were brought to a conclusion Ziska was seized by the plague at Przibislav, and died there. The glory of his conquests was to some extent marred by the cruelty with which he treated his enemies; but the circumstances under which the war was carried on, and the causes which led to it, are almost sufficient excuse for the accusation.

Zoe, Sr.—A Roman lady, wife of one of the chief officers who was martyred under the persecution of Diocletian in or about the year 286. Her husband, Nicostratus, was charged with the safe keeping of two Christians, and Zoe happened to be with them one day when they were visited by their priest. She was much impressed by what she heard, but could not say what she felt owing to her tongue being palsied. The priest, St. Sebastian, is said there and then to have performed a miracle on her, so that she henceforth had full use of her tongue, and she was from that time one of Sebastian's most faithful adherents. She, her husband, and their family, were baptised, and spent their time in cheering those of their brethren who were doomed to death. But they were not long allowed their liberty. Zoe was the first to suffer, the other members of the family, however, following soon after.

Zoharites.—A sect of modern Jews, so called from the high esteem in which they hold the Cabbalistic book Zohar. [CAHABA.] They believe that in the Elohim there exists a Trinity of Persons, that the Incarnation of God took place in Adam, and will be repeated in the Messiah, whom they allow will be the God of the Gentiles as well as the Jews.

Zoroaster or Zarathustra, the founder of the old Persian religion. We can speak with no certainty about the life of Zoroaster; so much that is told us is mythical, and even the period at which he lived is so variously stated. Some say that he lived 5,000 years before the Trojan War; others that he reigned over Babylon 2,200 B.C.; the Parsees place him at about 550 B.C., in the time of Darius Hystaspes; others even deny that he ever existed. Legend says that he was born in Bactria; that his father Pourushaspa and his mother Daghda were in lowly circumstances, though of princely origin, and that the future greatness of Zoroaster was foretold to his mother before his birth. When he grew to man's estate he spent many years in retirement, and then Ormuzd, the good spirit, appeared to him, and gave him this command: "Teach the nations that my light is hidden under all that shines. Whenever you turn your face towards the light, and you follow my command, Ahriman [the evil spirit] will be seen to fly. In this world there is nothing superior to light." He then handed him the sacred book, Avesta, and bade him take it to Vishtasp (Hystaspes); he did so, and this prince became a powerful propagator of his faith.

Zoroaster was probably one of the Soshyant's, or fire-priests, amongst whom the religious reform began which he afterwards carried out so boldly. The religion of Iran had become mixed with that of the Hindoos and Chaldeans, the worship of elements had been introduced, and Zoroaster restored the religion of his ancestors to a state of greater purity; but after his death many schisms were introduced, and at length it degenerated into an idolatrous worship of the sun and fire. The leading features of his religion have already been stated in the article PARSEES [q.v.].

Owing to the different dates assigned to Zoroaster, some writers have maintained that there were no less than six men of that name; others have identified him with Moses, Elia diah, Esdras, and the servant of Ezekiel. It is said that he was a great magician and astro genist.

Zosimus, Pope [417–418], was by birth a Greek. Celestius, a disciple of Pelagius, whom had been condemned by Pope Innocent I. and the African Bishops at a synod at Carthage in 412, made his appeal from that Council to the See of Rome. He came to Rome in the beginning of Zosimus's papedom, hoping to prepossess him in his favour by lodging the final issue of the cause in his hands. Zosimus convened a synod in St. Clement's Church to examine the articles of impeachment against Celestius, who presented a confession of faith renouncing the heresodoxy with which he was charged; and Zosimus wrote to the African Bishops, first to ask them to reconsider the matter, and secondly to pronounce Pelagius and Celestius innocent and acquitted. But the Bishops ultimately proved to the Pope that he had been deceived, and he summoned Celestius to appear before him and renounce in plain and more decisive terms the errors with which he was accused: but instead of coming he ran away from Rome, and Zosimus then confirmed the sentence of his predecessor.

Zwingli, Ulrich, the celebrated Swiss Reformer, was born in 1484, at Wildhaus, in St. Gall; died in 1531. He was educated at Basle, Berne, and Vienna, where he studied philosophy, and then returned to Basle to study theology under Thomas Wyttenbach. He was ordained priest in 1506, and was appointed pastor of Glaaurus. Here he stayed for ten years and learned Greek, studied the Scriptures in the Hebrew and Greek text and the early Fathers, also the writings of Wycliffe, John Huss, etc. He seems early to have realised the many abuses of the Church, and in his sermons always avoided the subjects of the invocation of saints, images, pilgrimages, etc. At that time many of the Swiss people were hired out to foreign countries as mercenaries, and Zwingli attended as chaplain when they fought with the Italians against the French. On his return to Switzerland he remonstrated with the Government against the practice. In 1516 he was invited as preacher in the monastery of Einsiedeln, famous for its pilgrimages. Here he stayed for nearly three years, preaching more freely than at Glaaurus against indulgences and other abuses, and calling on the Bishops of Constance and Sitten to reform them. In 1518, Luther, of whom Zwingli had never heard, affixed his theses against indulgences against the doors of the Wittenberg church. Bernardin Samson, a Franciscan friar, commissioned to sell indulgences in Switzerland, appeared in Einsiedeln. He told the people that not only would the indulgences remit the guilt of past sins, but would procure also an immunity for future sins that they might commit. He was opposed by Zwingli, who refused him admittance to the Abbey, and preached to those assembled against the glaring abuses made of indulgences. The Reformer was upheld by Faber, Vicar of the Bishop of Constance, who forbade Samson to sell indulgences within the diocese.

Meantime he had been invited to become preacher in the cathedral of Zurich, a post which he accepted on the condition that he might preach the pure Gospel. He preached his first sermon on January 1st, 1519, and, a few months after, Samson, arriving at the gates, found his old enemy there and was refused admittance. Having successfully preached against indulgences, Zwingli now turned his attention to other matters, as—the number of external forms in worship, the need of clear religious instruction and of services in the vernacular tongue, etc. He corres dponded on the subject with Capito, Epocamardius, Bullinger, Wyttenbach, Haller, etc., and in 1522 the first steps towards the Reform ation in Switzerland were made. The Bishop of Constance and the monks accused Zwingli of sedition and impiety, so, in 1522, he wrote a defence called Apologiae Architites. In January, 1523, the Legislative Council of Zurich called together a conference at the town-hall, to which were invited all the ecclesiastics of the canton. Sixty-seven Articles of Faith were discussed, as—Papal authority, colibacy of the clergy, auricular confession, purgatory. All these, which are the chief subjects in which the Swiss Reformers differed from the Roman Church, were declared by Zwingli to be contrary to the teaching of the Bible. His chief opponent was John Faber, afterwards Bishop of Ravenna. Six hundred clergy and laity were present, who decided that "Zwingli having neither been convicted of heresy nor refuted, should continue to preach the Gospel as before; that the pastors of the town and territory of Zurich should ground their discourses on the words of Scripture alone, and that both parties should avoid all personal reflections and recriminations." Thus the old religion remained for the present unchanged; but some of Zwingli's followers, in their zeal, destroyed a crucifix which stood at one of the gates of Zurich. Zwingli was blamed for it, and returned answer that they had committed violence, but had done no sacrilege, as images ought not to be worshipped. This led to a second conference, held in October, 1523, in which Zwingli, before 900 people, maintained that the worship of images was unauthorised, and that the Mass ought not to be retained. He was again victorious, and early in 1524 all pictures and statues were removed from the churches. In the same year Zwingli married, a full year before Martin Luther.

Early in 1525 Mass was finally abolished, and the Lord’s Supper was celebrated in the same manner as it is still in the Reformed French and Swiss Churches. A new Liturgy was drawn up, and the monasteries and nunneries were destroyed. Thus Zurich was the first reformed Swiss canton. It was soon joined by Schaffhausen, Berne, and Basle, and half of St. Gall and Appenzell. In 1524 the first controversy broke out between the German and Swiss Reformers, who agreed on many points, but differed on the subject of the Eucharist, Luther maintaining the doctrine of the Real Presence, while Zwingli held that the outward symbols undergo no supernatural change in the Eucharist. At this time also Anabaptism found its way into Switzerland, and fanatics not only destroyed the altars and images, but parodied the Sacraments. Zwingli had many conferences with the leaders, in which he defended Infant Baptism, and urged them to discontinue the insurrections and disturbances which they created, but made no effect till the Government took the matter up, and used the more powerful weapons of imprisonment and exile. In 1526 the Bishops of Basle, Constance, and Lausanne called a general meeting of all the cantons to Baden to consider the new doctrines. Zwingli was not allowed to attend, but was represented by John Ecolampadius. The majority of the meeting being Roman Catholics, a decree was passed declaring Zwingli to be a heretic, and excommunicating him and his followers. However, the Reformed cantons refused to accept the decree, and a Council was called at Berne in 1528. The greater part of the Roman Catholics refused to attend, saying the matter was already settled, and the Reformers being thus in a majority, gained an advantage over their opponents, the important canton of Berne publicly embracing the Reformation. In September, 1529, the Saxon and Swiss Reformers met at Marburg through Philip, Landgrave of Hesse. The conference lasted for three days, but no progress was made towards a union. In 1531 open war broke out between the Evangelical cantons, with Zurich at their head, and the Catholic cantons of Uri, Schwytz, Unterwalden, Zug, and Lucerne. They met at Cappel on Oct. 11th, and after a fierce struggle the Reformers were beaten, and Zwingli was killed. He was wounded by a stone, and a Catholic of Unterwalden, without knowing him, exhorited him to see a priest and call upon the saints, and when he refused beat him to death with axes, calling him an obstinate heretic. His last words were: "They can kill the body but not the soul." Zwingli’s chief works were: Exposition of the Christian Faith, Of the True and False Religion, On Baptism, On Re-baptism, and On Infant Baptism, written against the Anabaptists; and several works on the Eucharist, written during his controversy with Luther.

Zwingli’s followers are called Zwinglians, or sometimes Sacramentarians, but they themselves assumed the name of Evangelicals. They did not at first form themselves into one Church, spiritual matters being left entirely to the pastors; but at last the want of a common bond was felt, and a Confession of Faith, drawn up by Bullinger, was accepted by all the Reformed cantons. This is known as the Helvetic Confession [q.v.], and was signed also by Knox and other Scotch ministers, the Church of the Palatinate, and those of Poland and Hungary. The Zwinglians have sometimes been called Calvinists, but, though they hold nearly the same doctrines, Calvin was not their founder, as the Reformation had been established before his time. The distinctive doctrine commonly connected with his name is the assertion that the Sacrament of the Lord’s Supper is a memorial only, and the denial in all forms of the doctrine of the Real Presence.
